Brasidas chanced to finde a mouse among certeine dried figs, which bit him so, as he was glad to let her go; and thereupon faid to those about him: See how there is nothing so little, but is able to make a shift and save the own life, if it have but the heart to defend it selfe against those who assaile it. In a certain skirmish his hap was to be hurt with the head of a partilan, or javelin, which went through his shield; and when he had drawn it out of his wound, with the very staffe and steile of it, he flew his enemy: now when one asked him how it came to passe that he was thus wounded? Forlooth because my shield deceived and betraied me. His fortune was afterwards to dye in the Countrey of Thrace, whither he had been fent to deliver and fet free the Greeks who inhabited those marches and the embassadours, who were sent from the said parts to Lacedamon, went to visit his mother: who at the first asked them whether Brasidas her some did vallantly and like 2 man? the embassadors highly praised him, infomuch as they said; That there would never be his like man, but Lacedemon hath many better men then he by far. King, Agis was wont to fay, that the Lacedemonians used not to ask how many their enemies were, but in what place they were. At Mantua he was forbidden to strike a battel, because the enemies were many in number to one: It must needs be (quoth he) that whosoever would rule and command many, should likewise fight with many. Unto them who greatly commended the Eliens for observing such good order and formality at the Olympick games: What great marvel is it (quoth he) if the Eliens in four years space use justice one day? but when they continued still in their praise and condemnations: What wonder is it (quoth he) if the Eliens use a good thing well, to wit, juftice. A naughty sellow there was and a trouble some, who importuned him exceeding much, by asking him oftentimes, who was the best man of all the Spartans? Marry even he (quoth he) that is most unlike to thee. To another who questioned with him and would needs know how many the Lacedemonians were in number: Enough (quoth he) to drive out alllewd and wicked persons: And when another asked him the same question, he answered; Thou wouldst say they were a great number if thou fawest them fight, Lylander would not accept of the rich and sumptuous robes, which Dionysius the Tyrant sent unto his daughters, faying : I am afraid that these garments will make them look the souler. Some there were who reproved and blamed him, for that he exploited the most part of his acts by crast and subrilty, as if it were an unworthy thing for one who vaunted himselfe to be of the race of Hercules: unto whom he answered: That where the Lyons skin would not serve, it were good to sew therto a little piece of a Foxes case. There was some difference and debate between the Argives and Lacedemonians about their confines; and it seemed that the Argives alledged better reasons, and brought forth more pregnant evidences for the land in question; but he drawing out his sword: They (quoth he) who are the better men at handling this, are those who plead the better for the bonds of their Territory. The Lacedemonians found much difficulty in affaulting the walls of Cobonds of the state occasion thus to say: why make you doubt to give the assault unto the walls of those men, who are fo idle as to inffer Hares to fleep within the very precinct of their walls? There was acertain Megarian, who in the general affembly of all the States of Greece, spake unto him his mind freely and boldly: unto whom he answered thus: Thy (n) words have need of a Gity, that is a Bare to say, that Megard, whereoshe was a Citizen, was not able to make good and maintain his words with words.

Agesilaus used to say; That the inhabitants of Asia (to speak of free men) were but bad, and are won namely folong as they enjoyed liberty: marry they be palling good flaves (quoth he.). These Air and had a cultom to call the King of Persa the Great King: And why (quoth Agessaw) is hee a greater King then I, if he be not more just and temperate? Being demanded his opinion as touching Fortitude, and Justice, whether of them was the better vertue : we have no need or use (quoth he) of Fortitude if we were all Just. Being enforced to break up his Camp, and dislodge one night in great hafte out of his enemies Country, and feeing a boy whom he loved well, weeping and all blubbered with tears, for that he was left behind, and could not follow by reason of weaknesse: It is(quoth he)an hard matter to be pitiful and wile both at once. Menetrates the Physician who would cantel himselfe with the name of Jupiter, wrote a letter unto him with this superictiption: Menerates Jupiter unto King Agesslaus long life, &c. Unto whom he returned this answer: King Ages filaus unto Menecrates better health : meaning indeed that he was brain-fick. The Lacedemonians, having defeated those of Athens with their allies and consederates neer unto the City of Corinth; when he heard what a number of enemies lay dead in the field: O unhappy and unfortunate Greece, (quoth he) that hath destroyed so many men of her own, as had been able to have subdued all the Barbarians in the world, Having received an aniwer from the Oracle of Jupiter at Olympia, according to his mind; the great Lords Controllers, called Ephoni, willed him also to confull with the Oracle of Apollo as touching the same: when he was therefore at Delphos, he demanded of the laid, god, whether he were not of the fame mind as his father was? When he fued for the deliverance, of a friend of his who was taken prifoner, and in the hands of * Idvienta Prince of Corps, he wrote * or sentence. unto him about it in this manner: If Nicias have not trespassed, deliver him for julice take: if he have transgressed, deliver him for my sake; but how soever it be, in any wile deliver him. When Demades mocking at the Lacedemonian Courtilasses, said merrily; That they were so little and short, as that the juglers and players at leger-demain, were able to swallow them down whole as they be. Agis the younger answered very fitly and faid: Yet as short as they be, the Lacedemonians can reach their enemies very well with them. Antalcidas answered unto an Athenian who termed the Lacedemonians ignotant persons: Indeed (quoth he) it may well be fo, for we are the only men who have learned of you no evil. Another Athenian contested with him and faid; we have driven you many a time from the River Caphilus, which is in Attica: but he replied again and faid: And we never yet chafed you from the River Eurotas which is neer Lacedemon. There was a certain Rhetorician would needs reheatse an Oration which he had made concerning the praise of Hercules; Why (quoth he) was there ever any man

So long as Epathinondas was Captain General of the Thebans, there was never feen in his Camp any of the lefudden foolish hights, without any certain cause, which they call Panique Terrores, He any oruneen nount in passes, manufacture in the man fore to fight with those enemies who were corpulent; and such souldiers as he found in his owne fore to fight with those enemies who were compilent: and such touldiers as he found in his owner bands grosse and at, he would be sure to cashire and displace them, if it were for nothing elses, Fon he was wontto say of them; that three of four bucklers would hardly cover their grand-pansh, which have out to bight at they could not see for it their prive parts. Moreover, so strict and precise he was in his living, and hated so much all excelle and superfluinty, that one time above thereft being bidden to supper by one of his neighbors, when he saw in the house great provision of visuals, cares, junquets; comfutures and sweet perfluints, he said unto him: I had, thought you made a sacrince, and not an expense of superfluinty, and so went his way and would not say supper, When the head Cook or Clerk of the Kitchengave up his account unto him, and other his companions in government. Of their cashiral training that a so the same of the same should be the same of the s vernment, of their ordinary charges for certaine dayes; he milliced nothing in his fill but the great quantity of Oyle that was fpent; and, when his Collegues wondered that hee should fare to at that; he said unto them: That it was not the cost and expense that hee stood upon, but onely this, that so much Oyle should go down mens throats. The City of Thebesupona time madea great publick feaft, and besides, privately they were all in their banquets, inviting one another, and meeting in companies to make merry together: he contrariwise all this while, without being either annointed with oyland sweet perfumes, or clad in his best cloaths, all pensive and sad, walked alone thorow the City; and when one of his familiar friends who met him, wondered thereat, and would needs know why he went to alone and out of order and formality; Marry (quoth he) that you all might in security follow your drinking and good cheer, and not to be troubled with thinking of any other cares. He had caused a mean man and of base condition to be put in prifon for some light trespasse that he had committed, and Pelopidas requested him for to let him at large, but he denied him flatly; howbeit afterwards a woman whom he loved, intreated him, and at her fuit he granted his liberty, faying: That in such petty favours and curtefies as these it became him to gratifie Concubines and Harlots; but not Generals and great Warriours. When the Lacedemonians came with a puissant power to make cruel war upon the Thebans, there were brought Oracles unto the Thebans from fundry parts, some promising the victory, others menacing an overthrow: he went up therefore into the tribunal feat and commanded, that the Oracles of Victory should be set upon the right hand, and those of discomfiture on the left: when they were thus disposed and bestowed, he stood up, and in this wife spake unto the Thebans: If you will be directed by your Captains, shew obedience to them, and withall, put on a resolution and good heart to encounter your enemies; these here, (shewing the good Oracles on the right hand) be yours; bu if for want of courage you cast doubts and start back for sear of perils, those there (pointing to the bad Oracles on the left hand) are for you. Afterwards as he led the Army into the field, for to meet with the Lacedemonians, it began to thunder; whereat they that were neerest unto him asked, what he thought this might prefage and fignifie: Surely (quoth he) it betokeneth thus much; that God hathaftonished our enemies, and put their brains out of temper, who having fuch commodious places neer unto them for to encamp in, have pitched here where they are. Of all the honourable and happy fortunes that ever befell unto him, he faid; This was most to his hearts joy and contentment; that he had defeated the Lacedemonians in the battel at Lenttres, whiles his own father that begat him, and mother who bare him were both alive. Being a man who otherwise all his life time used to be seen abroad, fine, near, and well annointed, with a cheerful and merry countenancealfo; the morrow after the faid battel, he came forth into the publick Place, all foul, fullied, heavy and penfive; whereupon his friends by and by were in hand with him to know, whether any finisher accident was come unto him: None (quoth he) but I perceived yeflerday that for the joy of my victory, my heart was lifted up more then it ought, and therefore to day I do (r) abate and correct that which was the day before too excellive and out of order know- r Excelling ing full well that the Spartans used to cover and hide as much as they could such missfortunes, and series as being defirous to make them fee and acknowledge the great losse and overthrow which they had to be abased fustained, he would not in any wife permit them to gather their dead all together, and pile them up in one entire heape; but to every City hee gave leave one after another to enterre them; by which it appeared, that there were more of the Lacedemonians flain by a thousand. Jason a Prince and Monarch of The falia, being allied and confederate with the Thebans, came one day into the City of Thebes, and sent to Epaminondas a present of two thousand pieces of Gold, knowing that indeed he was exceeding poor: this Gold would not he receive at his hands; but the first timealter that he faw Jason, he came unto him and said: You begun twice to offer me in jury; and in the mean while he borrowed of a certain Burgesse of the City silvy drams of Silver, for to defray the charges of a journey, or expedition which he intended; and therewith entred in Arms and invaded Pel ponnesus. After this, when the great King of Persia sent him thirty thousand prieces of Gold called Dariques, he was displeased highly with Diomedes, and sharply checked him, asking him if he had undertaken so great a voyage, thinking to bribe and corrupt Epaminondas; and with that commanded him to deliver this mellage back unto the King his Master; That so far forth as he intended and procured good unto the Thebans, heshould make reckoning of him to be his friend without any penny cost; but if he wrought or practiced any losse or displeasure unto them, he would be his enemy. When the Argives were entred into league and amity with the Thebans, those of sthemsent their Embassadours into Arcadie, to assay if they could draw the Arcadians to fide with them: So these Embassadours began to charge and accuse unto them, as well the Argives as the Thebans, infomuch, as Callifratus the Orator, who was their speaker, upbraided both Cities, and hit them in the teeth with Orestes and Oedipus: then Epaminondas who sat in this assembly of Councel, roseup and said : We consesse indeed (my masters) that in times past there was in our City one parricide who killed his own Father, like as another in Argos who murdered his own Mother; but when we had chased and banished them for committing these facts, the Athenians received them both. And when the Spartans had charged the Thebans with many great and grievous imputations: Why my Masters of Sparta (quoth Epaminondus) these Thebans, if they have done nothing else, yet thus much they have effected, that you have forgotten your manner of short speech and using few words. The Athenians had contracted alliance and amity with Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Theffalia, a mortal enemy of the Thebans, and who promiled to the Athenians for to serve them flesh in the market at halfe an obolus a pound weight: And wee (quoth Epaminondas) will furnish the Athenians with wood enough for nothing, to roaft and feeth the faid flesh: for if they begin bushy to intermeddle more then we like of, wee-will fell and cut down all the trees growing in that Country, Knowing well enough that the Bootians were lost for idlenesse, he determined and advited to keep them continually in exercise of arms: now when the time approached for the election of Governours, and that they were minded to chuse him their Baotarches, that is to say, the Ruler of Baotia: Be well advited my Masters (quoth he) what ye do, whiles it lieth in your hands; for if you elect me your Captain General, make this reckoning, that to war you shall. He was wont to call the country of Bastia, because it lieth plaine and open, the stage and icassold of war, saying that it was impossible for the inhabitants to keep and hold it, folong asthey had not one hand within their shield, and the other on their sword. Chabrias the Captain of the Athenians having put to foile and defeated some few Thebans about Corinh (who for heat of fight had run disbanded and out of array) made a bravado: for which exploit, as if he had won some great field, he caused a Trophee to be erected in memorial of this victory : wheras Epaminondas scoffed and said: That he should not have set upa tropheam there, but rather an hecatesium, that is to say, the Statue of Proserpina, for that in times past, it was an ordinary thing to fet up the image of Proferpina in manner of a croffe, at the first carrefour or meeting of croffe-ways which was found neer unto the gate of a City. When one brought him word that the Athenians had fent an Army into Peloponnesus bravely fet out and appointed with new armour: Now surely (quoth he) Antigenidas will weep and figh when he knoweth once that Tellis hath gotten him new flutes and pipes to play upon: now this Tellis was a bad minftrel, and Antigenidas an excellent mufician: He perceived upon a time that his Esquire or shield-bearer had received a good peece of money for the ransome of a prisoner, which was in his hands; whereupon he said unto him: Give me my shield, but go thou thy wayes and buy thee a Tavern or Victualling house, wherein thou mayest lead the rest of thy life, for I see well, that thou wilt no more expose thy selfe to the dangers of war as before-time, fince thou art now become one of these rich and happy men of the world. He was once demanded the question, whom he reputed to be the best Captain, himselfe, Cabrias, or Iphicrates, his answer was: It is hard to judge, so long as we all (f) be alive. At his return out of the Country of Laconia, he was judicially accused for a capitol Crime, together with other Captains joined in Commission with him, for holding their charge longer by four months then the Laws allowed: as for his Companions and Collegues abovefaid, he willed them to derive all the fault from themselves, and lay it upon him, as if he had forced them so to do; but in his own desence he pleaded thus : (1) Albeit I cannot deliver better words then I have performed deeds, yet if I be compelled (as I (se I am) to fay fornewhat for my felfe before the Judges, I request thus much at their hands, that if they be determined to put me to death, they would command to be engraven upon the square column or pillar of my Sepulchre, my condemnation and the cause thereof, to the end that all the Greeks might know how Epaminondas was condemned to dye; for that he had forced the Thebans against their wills, to waste and burn the Country of Laconia, which in five hundred years before had never been forraged nor spoiled; also that he had repeopled the City of Messer two hundred and thirty years after it had been destroyed and left desert by the Lacedimonians: Item, that he had reunited, concorporated and brought into one league all the States & Cities of Arcadia; and last of all that he had recovered and restored unto the Greeks their liberty; for all these acts have been atchieved by us in this voyage; The Judges when they heard this speech of his, rose from the bench, and went out of the Court laughing heartily; neither would they so much as

Pelopidas joint Captain with Epaminondas in the charge of Pelopidas joint Captain with Epaminondas in the charge of Baotia, when his friends found fault with his neglect in one thing right necessary, to wit, the gathering of a masse of money together: Money indeed (quoth he) is necessary, but for such an one as this Nicomedes here, shewing a poor cripple, maimed, lame and impotent in hand and foot. When he departed from Thebes upon a time to a battel, his wife prayed him to have a regard unto his own fafety: This is (quothhe) an advertilem nt fit for others; as for a Captain who hath the place of command, he is to be put in mind for to fave those under his charge, and not himselfe. To one of his souldiers, who said unto him: We are fallen among our Enemies! And why (quoth he) are we fallen among them more then they among us. Moreover, being trecherously held priloner, and kept in irons during a Truce, against the law of Arms, by Alexander tyrant of the Phereans, he grew to heat, and gave him some hard words, calling him perjured Traitor: whereupon the Tyrant asked him if he made fo great hafte to die : Yea (quoth he) to the end that the Thebans may be more provoked against thee, and that so much the sooner thou mayest be punished for thy dislocalty. Thebe the Tyrants wife came to visit him in prison, and seeing him, said that she marvelled how he could be so jocund, being as he was, a prisoner and bound with chains : Yea, but I rather wonder at you, that being as you are, at liberty and not bound, you can endure such a wicked wretchas Alexander. When Epaminondas had delivered him out of prison, he faid that he took himselfe much beholden to Alexander: For now (quoth he) by his means. Manius Curius, when one of his fouldiers complained, that of the lands conquered from the Roman enemies, he had given to every fouldier very little, but had incorporated in the Common-weale the greatest part of the said demeanes: I would it were Gods will (quoth he) that there were not a Roman who thought that land but little, which is sufficient to nourish and maintain one man. The Samnites, after that he had vanquished them in a battel, sent unto him as a present, a good sum of gold : him they found fitting by the fire fide, tending the por, wherein he boiled certain Raperoots : and when the Samnite Embassadors tendered unto him the said present, he made them this answer: That he who could content himselfe with such a supper, had no need at all of gold: also that hee thought it more honourable to command them who had the gold, then to have gold himselfe.

C. Fabricius hearing of the overthrow that King Pyrrhus had given the Romans, * faid: That Pyr- * Some reade thus had overcome Levinus, and not the Epirotes vanquished the Romans. Being sent unto Pyrthe Levinus, thus to treat for the deliverance of certain Romanstaken prisoners, the King offered him a great sum that you had been considered the constant of the c of gold, but he would not receive it; the next morrow Pyrrhus commanded that the greatest E- and not the Epicocej had lephant which he had, should be brought and set just behind Fabricius without his knowledge, presconne and that suddenly he should be forced to bray, which was done accordingly: whereat Fabricius turning him about, and looking behind him, began to smile and say: Neither thy gold yesterday, nor this beaft thy Elephant to day, hath once aftonied me. Pyrrhus thought to have perswaded him to take his part and itay with him, with promife that he should have all the authority in managing of the affairs next unto himselse; but he answered him in this sort; This would not be good and expedient for you: and why? when the Epirotes shall know us both well, they will rather have me then you to be their King. When Fabricius was created Conful of Rome, King Pyrrhus his Phylician wrote unto him a Letter, whereinhe made promise unto him for to kill the King his Master with poylon if he would. Fabricius sent the very same letter incontinently unto King Pyrrbus, willing him to fee by that, how his judgment ferved not him well to differn and to make choice of his enemies and his triends. When this amoush was discovered and directed thus unto Prirbus. which was laid for his life, he caused the said Physician to be apprehended, and sent back those Romans whom he had prisoners, unto Fabricius without any ransome paid: howbeit Fabricius would not receive them from him as in free gift; for he returned likewife as many of his men who remained prisoners with him; which hedid, for that he would not be thought to take any thing at his hands by way of reward, or recompense for disclosing the foresaid Treason: for hee did it not so much to gratise King Pyrrhus and do him a pleasure, as for seare it should be shought that the Romans practifed his death by treachery, whom they could not vanquish by ver-

Fabius Maximus not willing to fight a fet battel with Annibal, but by tract of time to spend his Army; which by that meanes grew to a great default of victuals and money: went alwayes as though he dogged and tollowed him, keeping the rough places and hilly grounds, coasting him otherwhiles, but evermore having him in his eye; for which manner of fervice many mocked him, and called him the Pædagogue of Annibal; but hee nothing at all regarding such words, persisted still continually in his designes and counsels particular to himself, saying thus to his friends, Thathe who could not abide a scotte, but feared frumps and reviling words, was a greater coward then he who fled before his enemy. When his Collegue, or Brother in office Minutius, had discomfitted certain of his enemies, in such fort, as there was no talk of him any more, but every man gave out of Minutius, that he indeed was a man worthy of Rome; he faid: That he feared more the prosperity than the adversity of Minutius: and within a while after, when Minutius was fallen into the danger of an ambush that Annibal had set for him, so as he and all his menhad like to have left their bodies dead behind them, Fabius came speedily to his rescue, and not only delivered him out of this peril, but also slew a number of his enemies; whereupon Annibal said then unto his familiars about him; Did not I foretel you many times, feeing as I did this cloud hovering upon the tops of the mountaines, how it would one time or other poure down a good showre upon our heads? After the overthrow at Canna, when he was chosen Consul of Rome, together with Claudius Marcellus, a valiant and couragious man, who defired nothing more then ever to bee fighting with Annibal; he was of a contrary mind, and hoped, that if he were not fought with his Army within a while by delayes onely and holding off, would of it selfe come to nothing; so as Annibal would oftentimes say: That he feared more Fabius that fought not, then he did Marcellus who was ever fighting. It was told him that he had in his Camp a Lucane, who was wont to steal out by night, forth of the Camp, for the love of a woman whom he used to visit, but otherwife he heard fay, that the man was a right good fouldier and wonderful hardy in arms; whereupon he gave commandment that the woman upon whom this fouldier was so enamoured, should be secretly and without the mans knowledge attached and brought unto him : now when she was come, he sent for the souldier aforesaid: I am advertised (quoth he) that thou against the Laws of military discipline, well many times to lie out of the Camp; and I understand likewise full well, that setting that fault aside, thou art a souldier good enough; well, in regard of thy good services, I am content to pardon all that is past, but from hencefoth thou shalt abide and tarry with me, for I have a good pawn and surety within that thou shalt not start; and with that he caused the Woman to come forth and appear, and so he gave her into his hands to be his wedded Wife. When M. After he was stepped far in years, his Son was chosen Consul, and as he was giving audience in open place, and dispatching certain publick affairs in the presence of many, Fabius his Father being mounted on horieback, came toward him: but the Son fent one of his Lictors, or Hushers before to command him to alight from his horie: whereat all the rest there present were abashed, and thought it a great shame and unleemly sight: but the old man dismounting quickly from his horfe, came toward his Son as faft as his years would give him leave, embraced him and aid. Thon haft well done my Son, to know whom thou doft govern, and to shew that thou art not ignorant what the greatnesse is of that charge which thou hast undertaken. Scipio the elder, whensoever he was at any leisure and repose either from military affairs, or politick government, employed all that time in his private study at his book; whereupon he was wont Ittick government, employed an inactinie in inspirate ituly at its books, whereupon ne was wont to fay: That when he was alone, he had the most company; and when he was at leifure, he had greatest businesse. After he had won by assault the City of New Carthage in Spain, some of his souldiers brought a most beautiful Damosel taken prisoner, andher they offered unto him: I would receive her willingly (quoth he) if I were a private person, but being as I am, a Captain General, I will none ofher, Lying at sege before a certain City * simuted in a low place, and over which might be seen the Temple of Venus, he gave order unto them, that by vertue of Writs were to make appearance in Court, that they should come and plead before him within the said Temple, where they should have audience the third day after; which he made good, for before that day he had sorced the City. When one demanded of him being in Sicily, ready to embark and passe over to Africk, upon what confidence he prefumed to much to croffe the Seas with his Armado against Carthage: See you not here (quoth he) 300, men how they disport and exercise themselves armed all in military feats of Arms, along an high Tower fituate upon the Sea fide? Itell you, there is not one of all this number, but if I bid him, will run up to the top of this Tower, and calt himselfe down from thence with the head forward. Being passed over Sea, and soon after Master of the neld; when he had burnt the Camps of his Enemies, the Carthaginians sent immediately unto him an Embassing to treat of peace: in which Treaty it was concluded, that they should quit all their vei-sels at Sea, abandon their Elephants, and besides pay a good grosse sum of money: But so soon as Annibal was retired out of Italy into Africk, they repented themselves of these capitulations and conditions, for the trust which they had in the forces and person of Annibal: whereof Se pro being advertifed, faid unto them: That although they would perform the Articles of the forefaid agreement, yet the accord should not stand for good, unlesse over and above they paid 5000. Talents, because they had sent for Annibal to come over. Now after that the Carthaginians had been vanquished by him in open battel, they sent new Embassadours for to treat of peace again; but he commanded them presently to depart, for thathe would never give them audience, unlesse they brought back unto him L. Terentius, a Knight of Rome, and a man of worth and honour, who by the fortune of War was taken prisoner, and fallen into the hands of the Carthaginians: now when they had brought Terentius, he caused him to sit close by his side in the Councel, and then gave he audience to the forefaid Embassadours, and granted them reace. Afterwards when he entred Rome in triumph for this victory; the said Terentius followed hard after his triumphant Charriot, wearing a Cap of Liberry on his Head, like an affranchifed flave, and avowing that he held his freedom by him; and when Scipio was dead. unto all those that accompanied his corps when it was carried forth to Sepulture, Terentins allowed to drink a certain kind of Mede, made of Wine and Honey: and for all other complements belonging to an honourable Funeral, hee took order with great diligence; but this was performed afterwards. Moreover, when King Amiochus faw that the Romans were passed over into Asia, with a puissant Army to make war upon him, he senthis Embaffadours to Scipio, for to enter into a Treaty of peace, unto whom he answered: This you should have done before, and not at thispresent, now that your King and Master hath already re-ceived the bit of the bridle in his mouth, and the saddle with the rider upon his back. The Senate had granted out a Commission unto him that he should take forth certain money out of the publick cheft and chamber of the City: but when the Treasurers would not suffer him that day to open ther Teafury. for to be furnished from thence; he faid, He would be so bold as open it himselfe; Which (quoth he) I may well do considering that by my means it was kept saft shut and locked first, for the great quantity of gold and silver which I have caused to be brought into it. Petilise and Quintus, two Tribunes of the Commons, accused him before the people, and laid many grievous matters to his charge; but he in stead of pleading his own cause, and justifying himselfe, and thus; My Masters of Rome, upon such a day as this, I deseated in battel the Carthagunians and Annibal, and therefore will I go my selfe directly from hence with a chaplet of flowers upon my head, up into the Capito! to facrifice and give thanks unto Jupiter for my victory; mean while, who foever will give his voice either for or against me, let him do as he thinketh good: and having thus said, he went out of the Court, and all the people followed after him, leaving his accusers to plead there their fil to the bare walls. T. Quintins, immediately upon his comming to the management of State affairs, grew to fuel reputation and renoun, that before he had been Ædile, Pratour, or Tribune of the common-weale, he was chosen Consul of Rome, who being sent as Captain and Lieutenant General for the people of Rome, towar against Philip King of Macedonia, was counseled and periwaded to a rate people perional conference first with him: Philip for the better security of his own perion, demanded of him hoftages; Because (quoth he) the Romans have here many aprives besides you, but the Macedonians have none but my selie: No marvel indeed (quoth Quintius) that you are hereby your felfe alone, for you have done to death all your kinsfolk and friends. After that he had vanquished in battel King Philip, he caused proclamation to be made in the solemnity of the Ishmian games: That he restored all the Greeks to their ancient liberties and full freedom, to live from that day forward according to their own Laws; and thereupon the Greeks caused all the Romans to bee fought out throughout all Greece, who had been fold thither for flaves during the wars with Annibal, and having redeemed and bought them again our of their matters hands for 500. drams a poll, they presented them unto him as a free gift; these followed him in his triumph, with Caps upon their heads, as the custome was of such flaves as were newly affranchised and endued with liberty. The Acheans were minded and fully purposed to enterprise the conquest of the Isle Zazinthus: But he admonished them not to go forth of Peloponnesus, utilesse they would put themselves into evident danger, like unto the Tortoises, when they stretch forth their heads our of their shelp. When the brute was blown over all Greece that King Antiochus came with a mighty power, infomuch as all men wondered and were afraid to hear what numbers there were of fouldiers and fighting men, and what diverfity of Armors they brought with them; he made fuch a speech as this in the general Councel of the Acheans: It was my chance (quoth he) upon a time to be lodged in the house of an old host and friend of mine within the City of Chalcies, and as I sat with him at supper, I marvelled how possibly he could come by so many sorts of Venison which I saw served up to the board before me; at last mine holt answered that all was but Swines flesh, and the same altered by sundry kinds of fauces and variety of dreffing ; Semblably (quoth he) be you not difmaid and troubled at this great Army of King Antiochus whom you hear named, his men at Arms, and horsemen armed at all pieces, his light Horse, his Petronels and Archers on horseback, and his footmen, for all these be no more but poor Syrians, men born to servitude and slavery, and no better, differing one from another only in diversity of harnels and weapons. Philopamon was at that time Captain General of the Acheans, who had a number sufficient both of horse and foot, but he wanted money for their pay : whereat Quintius merily icoffing; Philopamon (quoth he) hath hands and feet enough, but he wants a belly; which jest was indeed the more pleasant, for that Philopamons body was in truth naturally so shapen and made so flat, as if he had no belly at all.

C. Domitius, he whom Scipio the great left in his place, next after his brother L. Scipio in the war against King Antiochiu; when he had viewed the Army of his enemies standing in battel-array, the Roman Captains who were about him, counfelled him with all expedition to give them battel, but heanswered them thus: That they had not day enough to massacre and her in peeces so many miliions of men; to spoil also and make pillage of their tents and baggage, and then to return when all was done into the Camp forto refresh and look to themselves; so the morrow after hee charged upon them and flew fifty thousand enemies.

P. Licinius, a Conful of Rome, in one battel of horsemen was vanquished by King Persons, and lost about two thousand and eight hundred men, partly slain, and partly taken prisoners in the field: after which victory, Perseus sent unto the said Consul Embassadours to treat of peace, and attonement; in which Treaty the condition which the vanquished proposed unto the conquerer was: That he should submit himselfe wholly and his whole estate unto the Romans, for to do with them according to their will and discretion,

Paulus Emplius making suit for his second Consulship, was rejected and took repulse: but afterward when it was feen that the war against King Perseus was drawn out in length, and like to hold long through the ignorance, sloth and idlenesse of those Captains which were sent with the Army; the Romans chose him Consulfor the second time; but he said unto them, I con you no thank at all now, for that you have not elected me for to gratifie my felfe (because I sought for no office at this time) but in regard that your selves stand in need of a Captain. Being returned from the common Place into his own house, he found a little daughter that he had, named Terria, weeping and all blubbered with tears. What is the matter (quoth he) that my pretty Girle cryeth and weepeth thus: with that the Child; O Father (quoth fhe) our Perfeus is dead: (now alittle Puppy she had of that name:) In good hour be it spoken my sweet daughter (quoth he) I take it for a good offe and presage of happy fortune. When he was arrived and come into the Camp, he found much bibble-babble there, and vaunting bravery on every hand of those fouldiers, who would bufily intermeddle in the affairs properly pertaining to the Captain, and in more matters then concerned them; he willed (x) them to be quiet and fills, not to be dealing in such things, but only x ceptains to look well to their swords, whether they were sharp-edged and well pointed: As for the rest sweet direct (quoth he) I will provide therefore. Those that kept the night sentinels, he commanded neither ober and transfer of the rest o to beare Lance, nor weare Sword, to the end that knowing they had no meanes to fight, in eute.

case they should be surprized by the enemy, they should be the more vigilant and careful to withstand sleep. After that he had passed over the mountains in Macedonia, and was newly entered into the Camp, he found his enemies ready ranged in battel-array before him: whereupon Scipio Nasica advised him to charge out of hand: If I were (quoth he) as young as you, I should be of the same mind that you are; but now long experience forbiddeth me to advance forward, all weary as I am, upon any journey against mine enemies, being fet strongly in ordinance of battel. After he had fully defeated Perfess in making feafts to his Allies and Confederates, for joy of victory, he faid: That it belonged to one and the same skill and experience to know how to range a terrible battel against enemies, and to set out an acceptable feast for friends. Perseus being his prisoner, made earnest suit, and humble supplication unto him, that he might not be led in his triumph: That lies (quoth he) in your own power O Perseu: by which words he gave him good leave to make him, felfe away. Among the treasures of this King, there was found an infinite maste of Gold and Silver, whereof he touched not one jot for his own proper nie; onely to Tubero his Son-in-law, who had married his Daughter, in honour of his vertue he gave one Silver Bowl, weighing five * Lytres; where (by the way) this is to be noted, that (by report) this was the first piece of Silver plate that ever came into the house of the Anylii. Of our Children-males that he had, two of the eldet he had given away before from himselfe to be adopted into other noble samilies of Rome, and of the two youngest which remained behind in his own house and name; the one (being fourteen years of age) died five dayes before his triumph; the other (twelve years old) changed his life five dayes after: whereat the people for rowed, and took it very heavily, bewailing and pitying his desolate estate: but he himselse went into the common Place to comfort them, saying; That now from hence forthshe thought to be out of all fear and danger in the behalfe of the Common-wealthshoping that no infortunity would befal unto it; for that himselfe for them all, barethe heavy load of the envy attending upon so great prosperities which he had archieved for the weal publick, (7) in that for-

inspected: Cato the elder, in a solemn speech before the people of Rome, reproving sharply absteron; de, there their intemperance, riot, and supersluous delicacies; Iknow sull (quoth he) that it is an hatd matter to speak unto the belly which hath no ears. He said also, that he wondered how such a City could long stand, wherein a fish was sold dearer then an ox. Also inveighing against the overmuch liberty and power, which was generally given to women; All other men (quoth he) do rule their wives, we rule all men, and our wives rule us. It was a speech likewise of his; That he had rather receive no favour and grace when he had done any good fervice, then not be punished when he had committed a fault: I pardon moreover (quoth he) all those, who upon error or ignorance have trespassed, (2) but I except my selfe. Furthermore, in solliciting and moving the Magistrates to chastise those who offended the Laws, he plainly said: That who sever had rule and authority sufficient to represse Malefactors, if they did not execute the same, were themselves the authors and commanders of evil. He delivered these words moreover: That young men who blushed when they were reproved, pleased him better then those that looked pale: and that he could not abide that Souldier, who in his way as he walked, waggeth his hands; in fight stirreth his feet; and when he sleepeth snorteth lowder then he holloweth, as he encountreth his enemy. Item, that he was a bad ruler, who knew not how to rule himselfe. He was of opinion, that every one ought to have more reverence of himselfe, then of any other person whatsoever; for no man was ever from himselfe. Perceiving that many there were who made sute that their statues might be erected: I had rather (quoth he) that men should ask another day, whythere was no image set up for Cate, then why he had any. He counselled them who had power to do what they would, to spare and makemuch thereof, to the end that their liberty might last with them for ever. They who deprive vertue (a) of honour, take away vertue (quoth he) from youth. He was of advice that no man ought to entreat a Magistrate, or Judge in good and just causes to maintain them, nor sue unto them in bad and unright, as matters to passe-by or wink at them. His saying was: That injustice and wrong-doing, if it brought no peril to him that committed it, yet it was dangerous to all others. He admonished old folk not to adde unto their age the foulnesse of vice: for that they had deformities enough besides. His opinion was, that anger and sury differed in nothing, but that the one endured longer then the other. He was wont to say that they were not lightly envied, who knew how to use their fortune wisely and with moderation: Forthat (quoth he) it is not our person that is envied, but that which is about us. Also they who are earnest in ridiculous matters, make themselves laughing stocks in serious affairs. Over and besides, this was one of his Sage Sawes: That fair and commendable actions ought to meet with faire and laudable words to fet them forth, to the end that they never be without the glory to them belonging. He reprehended the Citizens of Rome, for giving alwayes their voices to one and the same person, at the elections of their Magistrates: For it should seem (quoth be) in so doing, that either you do not much esteem the honour of Magistracies, or else that in your judgement you have not men sufficient enough and worthy to bear them. He madesemblant upon a time, that he had in great admiration the Brength of one who fold and made away his lands that lay along by the sea coast, as being a man more mighty and puissant then the very sea: For (quoth he) that which the sea undermineth, eateth, and wasterh by little and little, this good fellow hath swallowed and devoured all at once. When he flood to be chosen Censor, and saw that other of his competitors and concurrents trudged up and down, glavering gloing, and flattering to the people for to infimuate themselves into their good lavour, and gracesher contratt wife went crying our That the State and people had need of a rigorous and hard-hearted Physician, both to dimember and cut off some part, and also to give them a ftrong purgation: and therefore they were not to chuse one who was most gracious, but him that was molt fevere: thus whiles he made these remopstrances, he was himselfe chosen before all the rest. In teaching young men for to fight valiantly and with resolution, he said: That a word oftentimes frighted the enemy more then the fword, the tongue also more then the hand, and caused him to take his heeses and run away. Whiles he warred in Spain against those who inhabit along the River Beris, he was in great danger, by reason of a great multitude of enemies who were in arms against him; neither could he be provided of aids upon a sudden, but from the Celtiberians, who for to Jugcour him demanded two hundred Talents; now the other Roman Captaines would not yeeld, that he should make promise unto those barbarous Nations of this money for their hire and tallary; but Cato faid: They were much deceived and out of the way; for if we win (quoth he) we, finall be able to pay them, not of our own, but of our enemies goods; if we lose the day, there will be none left either to be payed, or to call for pay. Having won more towns in Spain, then he had been dayes there (according as he faid himselfe) he reserved of all that spoile and pulage for his own use, no more then he did eat and drink; but he divided and dealt to every one of his fouldiers a pound weight of filver, faying: That it were better that many should return home out of war with filver in their purfes, then a few with gold; for that Rulers and Captains ought not to of war with meet in the human states of the state of the master had intelligence thereof, before that ever he came in his fight he hung and strangled himselfe. Scipe furnamed Africanus, prayed him to favour the causes of the banished and sugitive Acheans, and to be good unto them, pame y, that they might be recalled and reflored again to their own country; but he made semblance as though he took no great heed and regard to such affairs; and when he saw that the matter was followed horly in the Senate, and that there grew much speech and debate about it he stood up and said : Here is a great stir indeed; and as though we had nothing elle to doe, we fit here and spendall the long day disputing about these oldgray beard Greeks, and all forfooth, to know whether they shall be carried forth to their burial by our Porters and Coarlebearers here, or by those there. Posthumus Albius wrote certain Histories in Greek, in the Preface and Proeme whereof, he prayed the Readers and Hearers to pardon him, if he had committace and Processes uneteron, included in that language; but Cato by way of a mock, seeffed at him, and taid: That he deletived indeed to be pardoned for writing fade Greek, in case that by the (b) Or b Selector. dinance and Commandment of the High Commission of the Amphyctiones, who were the chiefe elle have Estates of all Greece, he had been compelled against his will no enterprise and go in hand with the Scipio the younger, in four and fifty years (for follong he lived) neither bought nor fold nor yet built; and it is for certain reported, that in to great an house and substance as his might frem to be, there was never found but three and thirty pound weight of filver plate, and two of gold, storwithflanding the City of Great Carehage was in his hand, and he had enriched his fouldiers more then exer my Captaine did before him. Observing well the precept which Polybins gave, he hardly and without much ado would not return out of the Market place, before he had affaied to make in fome fort one new friend and familiar or other, of those whom he met withal, Being but yet young he was of fur preputation tor his valour and wifedom; that Cato the elder being demanded his opinion as touching others that were in the Camp before Carthage, among whom he was one, delivered this commendation of him.

Right, wife and Sage indeed alone is he, The rest to him but flitting shadows be.

whereupon after his return to Rome from the Camp, they that remained behind, called for him again, not fo much by way of gratification, and to do him a pleasure, but be aule they hoped by his means more speedily and with greater facility to win Carthage:now when he was entred to the very, walls, and yet the Carchaginians fought from the Castle, Polybus gave counsel to scarter in the Sea between fixhich was not very deep between his Camp, and the faid Castle) certain colthrops of iron, or elfe planks beiet withortal points, to overcast and spread the shallow sheives with sticking upon them, for fear left that the enemies palling that arme, or firth of the Sea, might come to affaire their ramparts; but he faid: It was a meer mockery, confidering that they had already gained the walls, and were within the City of their enemies, to make means not to fight with them. Finding the City full of Statues and painted Tables which were brought out of Sivil, hemade proclamation, that the Sicilians from all their Cities should come for to own and carry away what loever had been theirs; but of all the pillage he would not allow any one, either flave, or newly affranchised of his own train to feize upon, nor fo much as buy ought, notwithstanding that there was driving and carrying away otherwise on all hands. The greatest and most familiar friend that he had Lalima fined to be Conful of Rome I him he favoured and fer forward his fait in all that he could: by which occasion he demanded of one Pompeius, who was thought to make labour for the same dignity, whether it were true that he was a Competitor or no? now it was supposed that this Pompeius was a minstrels sonthat used to play on the flute; who made answer again, that he stood not for the Confulfip: and that which was more, he promited to affilt Latin, and to get all the voices that he could for him: thus while they believed his words, and expected his helping hand, they were deceived in the end; for they were given to understand for certain, that this Pompeius was in the common Hall labouring hard for himselfe, going about unto every Citizen one after another, requesting their voices in his own behalfe; whereat, when all others took stomach and were offended, Scipio laughed apace, and faid; We are even well enough ferved for our great folly, thus to stay and wait all this while upon a fluter and piper, as if we had been to pray and invocate not men, but the gods. Apping Clauding was in election and concurrence against him for the office of Censorship, saying in a bravery : That he nied to falute all the Romans by name and by furname upon his own knowledge of them, without the help of a prompter, whereas Scipioscarce knew one of them all: Thousayet truth (quoth Scipio) for I have been always careful not to know many, but rather not to be unknown of any, He gave counsel unto the Roman Citizens, at what time as they warred against the Celtiberians, for to fend both him and his competitor together into the camp, in quality either of Lientenants, or of Colonels over a thousand foot, to the end that they might have the testimony of other Captains and expert warriers indeed, whether of them twain performed his fervice and devoir berter, Being created Cenfor, he deprived a young Gallant of his horse, for that being given excelfively to feast and make good cheer, whiles the City of Carthage was befieged, he had caused a cerrain marchpaine to be made by pastry-work in form of a City, and called it Carthage, and when he had so done, set it upon the boord to be spoiled and sacked (forscoth by his companions, and when this youth would needs know of him why he was thus difgraced and degraded, as to lose his horse offervice, which was allowed him from the State: Because (quoth he) you will needs rifle and pill Carthage before me. During the time that he was Cenfor, he feeing one day C. Licinius as hee paffed by: Now furely I knew this man (quoth he) for a perjured perion, but for that there is none to accuse him, I will not be both his Judge and a Witnesse also to give evidence against him. Being fent by the Senate a third Commissioner with other Triumvirs, according as Clitomachus

Mens manners to observe and overfee,

Where they dowell, and where they faulty be; to vifit also and look into the States of Cities, Nations, and Kings: When he was arrived at Alexandria, and disbarked, as he came first to land, he went hooded, as it were, with his robecast over his head; but the Alexandrians running from all parts of the City to see him, requested him to discover his head, that his face might be the better seen; and he had no sooner uncovered his vifage, but they all cried out with great acclamations, applauding and clapping their hands in figue of joy, Andwhen the King himselfe of Alexandria strained and strived with great pain, so große (so idle, and delicate he was otherwise) to keep pace with him and the other commissioners, as they walked. Scipio rounded Paragine fostly in the earand said: The Alexandrians have reaped already the fruit, and enjoyed the benefit of my voyage, for that by our means they have seen their King to walk and go afoot. There accompanied him in this voyage a friend of his and a Philosopher named Panatius, and five servitors besides to wait upon him, and when one of these five hapned to die in this journey, he would not buy another in a forraign country for so supply his place, but fent for one to Rome, to serve in his turne. It seemed to the people of Rome that the Numantines were invincible and inexpugnable, for that they had vanquished and defeated so many Captains and leaders of the Romans: wherupon they chose this Scipio Consul the second time for to mannage this war; now when many a lufty young Gallant made means and prepared to follow him in this fervice, the Senate empeached them, alledging colourably, that Italy thereby should be left destitute of men for the defence of the Countrey, what need foever should be: so they would not suffer him to take that money out of the Treasury which was prest and ready for him, but assigned and ordained certain money from the Publicans and Farmers of the Cities customes and revenues to furnish him, whose dayes of payment were not yet come : As for money (quoth Scipio) I stand not in such need thereof, that I should stay therefore, for out of mine own and my friends purses I shall have sufficient to destray my charges, but I complain rather that I may not be allowed to levie and lead forth my fouldiers such as I would, and be willing to serve, considering that it is a dangerous war which we are to wage; for if it be in regard of our enemies valour, that our people have so often been beaten and soiled by them, then we shall find it a hot peece of service and a hard, to encounter such; but if it be long of our own mens cowardize, no lesse difficult will it be, because we are to fight with the slender help of such. When he was newly arrived at the camp, heefound there great diforder, much loofenesse, superstition, and wastful superstuity in all things; so he banished presently all Diviners, Prophets, and Tellers of Fortune; he rid out of the way all sacrificing Priefts, all Bauds likewife that kept Brothel-houses he chased forth: and he gave streight charge that every man should send away all manner of Vessels and Utensils, save only a pot or kettle to feeth his meat in, a spit to roast, and a drinking jug of earth; and as for silver place, he allowed no man more in all then weighed two pounds: he put down all bains and flouphs, but if any were disposed to be annointed, he gave order that every man should take pain to rub himselse; for he laid that beafts who had no hands of their own, needed another for to rub and curry them: he ordained that his fouldiers should take their dinner standing, and eat their meat not hot and without fire, but at supper, they might sit down who that lift, and seed upon bread or single grewel and plain pottage, together with one simple dish of sless, either boiled or roast: as for himselfe hewore a caffock, or fouldiers coat all black, buttoned close, or buckled before, saying; That hee mourned for the shame of his Army. He met with certain Garrons and labouring bealts belonging to one Memmius, a Colonel of a thouland men, carrying drinking cups, and other plate enriched with precious frones, and wrought curiously by the hands of Thericles; whereupon he said unto him: Thou haft made thy felfe unfit to ferve me and thy countrey for these thirty days, being fuch an one as thou art, and furely being given to these superfluines, thou art disabled for doing thy selfegood all the dayes of thy life. Another there was, who shewed him what a trimshield, or target he had, finely made, and richly adorned; Here is a fair and goodly shield indeed (quoth he) my young man, but I tell thee, a Roman fouldier ought to trust his right hand better then his left. There was one who carrying upon his shoulder a bunch of pales, or burden of stakes for to pitch in the rampart, complained that he was overladen; Thou are but well enough served (quoth he) in that thou reposest more confidence in these stakes then in thy sword. Seeing his enemies the he) in that thou reported indecention that the charge and foolifhly bent, he would not in that fit charge a list good morn them and give battel, but held off ftill, faying: That with tract of time he would buy the foresteening furety and security of his affairs: For a good Captain (quoth he) ought to do like a wise Physicia whenever for the property of the same of the property of the pro an, who will never proceed to the cutting or differenbring of a part, but upon extremity, namely, when all other means of Physick do faile: howbeit when he espied a good occasion and fit oppertunity, he affaulted the Numantines and overthrew them; which when the old beaten fouldiers or elders of the Numantines faw, they rebuked and railed upon their own men thus defeated, asking them, why they ran away and suffered themselves to be beaten by those whom they had soiled so often before? but one of the Numantines answered; Because the sheep be the very same that they were in times past; marry they have changed their shepherd. After he had forced the City of Numance by affault, and entred now the second time with triumph into Rome, he sell into some variance and debate with C. Gracchus, in the behalfe of the Senate and certain allies and confederates: whereupon the common people taking a spleen and displeasure against him, made such clamours at him upon the Roltra, when he was purposed to speak and give remonstrances unto them, that thereupon he raised this speech: There was never yet any outcries and alarms of whole camps, nor shouts of armed men ready to give battel, that could aftonish and daunt me: no more shall the rude cty of a confused multitude troubleme, who know assuredly that Isaly is not their Mother, but their step-Dame, And when Gracehus with his conforts and adherents cried out aloud: Kill the Tyrant there, kill him: Great reason (quoth he) have they to take away my life, who war against their own Country: for they know to long as Seipio is on foot, Rome cannot fall, nor Seipio stand when Rome is laid along,

Cacilius Metellus, devining and casting about how to make sure his reproaches and avenues to asfault a strong fort, when a Centurion came unto him and said; With the losse but of ten men you may be Mafter of the piece: Wilt thou then (quoth he) be one of those ten? And when another who was a Colonel and a young man, demanded of him what service he intended to do? If I wist (quoth he) that my wast-coat or shirt were privy to my mind, I would put it off presently and cast it into the fire. He was a great enemy to Scipio, folong as Scipiosived; but when he was once dead he (4) took it very heavily, and commanded his own sons to go under the beere, and carry a manufacture of the scipiosis of the science of the scipiosis of the science of the scipiosis of the scipiosis of the scipiosis of the him upon their own shoulders to burial, faying withal: That he gave the gods hearty thanks that one immortal

Scipio was born at Rome; and in no place elie. C. Marius, being risen from a base degree by birth unto the government of State, and all by the means of Arms, sued for the greater Ædileship, called curule; but perceiving that he could not compasseit, madesute the very same day for the lesse: and notwithstanding that he went besides both the one and the other, yet he faid : That he doubted not one day to be the greatest man of all the Romans. Being troubled with the swelling of the veins, called Varices, in both his legs: he suffered the Chirurgian to cut those of the one leg, without being bound or tyed for the matter, enduring the operation of his hand, and never gave one groan, or so much as bent his browes all the whiles; but when the Chiturgian would have gone to the other leg, Nay stay there (quoth he) for the cure of such a Malady as this, is not worth the grievous pains that belongeth thereto. He had a Nephew, or Sisters Son named Lusius, who in the time that his Uncle was second time Conful, would have forced and abused a youth in the prime of his years, named Trebonius, who began but then, under his charge to bear arms: this young springal made no more ado but slew him outright; and when many there were who charged and accused him for this murder, he denied not the fact, but confessed plainly that he had killed his Captain, and withal declared the cause publickly; Marius himselfe being advertised hereof, caused to be brought unto him a Coronet, such as usually was given unto those who had performed in war some worthy exploit, and (e) with his the of fine own hand fet it upon the head of this youth Tretonius. Being encamped very neer to the Camp of in the Tentones, in a plot of ground where there was but little water; when his fouldiers complained that they were lost for water, and ready to dye for very thirst, he shewed them a River not far off running along the enemies Camp; Yonder (quoth he) there is water enough forto be bought with the price of your blood: Then lead us to it quickly, answered his souldiers, whiles our blood is liquid and will run, and never let us flay so long till it be cluttered and dried up quite with drought, drought. During the time of the Cimbrians war he endued at once with the right of the Burgeofie * or Camer. of Rome, a thouland men all * Camerines , in confideration of their good service in that war ; a thing that was contrary to Law: now when some blamed him for transgressing the Laws, he answething that was not a state of the could not hear what the Laws faid, for the great ruftling and clattering that harnels and armor made. In this time of the Civil War, feeing himselfe enclosed round about with trenches and ramparts, and itreight beleaguered, he endured all, and waited his best opportunity, and when Popedius * Silo Captain General of the enemies faid unto him: Marius if thou be so great a Warriour as the name goeth of thee, come forth of the Camp, and combat with me hand to hand: Nay, faith he, and if thou art so brave a Captain as thou wouldest be taken, force me to Catulus Luctatins in the foresald Cimbrian war, lay encamped along the River Athesis, and when the Romans faw that the Earbarians were about to passe over the water, and to set upon them, retired and dislodged presently, what reasons and perswasions soevertheir Captaincould use to the contrary: but when he saw he could do no good, nor cause them to stay, himselfe ran away with the formost, to the end that it should not seem that they fled cowardly before their enemies, but dutifully followed their Captain.

Sylla, firnamed Falix, i. e. Happy, among other prosperities, counted these two for the greatest: the one, that he lived in love and amity with Metellus Pius; the other, that he had not destroyed the City of Athens, but faved it from being razed.

C. Popilius, was fent unto King Antiochus with a letter from the Senate of Rome, the tenour whereof was this: That they commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and not to under the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and the commanded him to withdraw his forces out of Egypt, and the commanded him to be a commanded him to furr the Kingdom which appertained to the Children of Ptoloman, being Orphans. The King feeing Popilius Comming toward him through his Camp, faluted him a far off very courteoufly: but Pspilius without any relalutations, or greeting again, delivered him the letter; which Antiochus read, and after he had read it, answered him that he would think upon the matter that the Senate willed him to do, and then give him his dispatch: whereupon Popilins drew a circle round about the King, with a vine rod that he had in his hand, saying : Resolve I advise you fir, before you pass forth of this compasse, and give me my answer: all that were present wondered, and were astonished at the boldness and resolution of this man but Antiochus presently answered him: That he would do whatloever pleased the Romans; then Popilius saluted him most lovingly and embraced him:

Lucullus in Armenia went with ten thousand footmen, and one thousand horse, to meet with King Tigranes, who was an hundred and fifty thousand firong, for to give him battel: the fixt day it was of October, and the very day of the month upon which before time the Roman Army under the conduct of one of the Scipios had been defeated by the Cimbrians; and when one faid unto him; That the Romans fear that day exceedingly, as being dismal and infortunare: Why (quoth he) even therefore ought we this very day to fight couragioofly and valiantly, to the end that wee may make this day to be joyful and happy, which the Romans hold as curfed and unhappy; Now, when the Romans did most dread the men at arms of Armenia, seeing them in their compleat harness, armed at all pieces, and mounted on bard horses, he bade them be of good cheer and not to fear: For (faith he) you shall find more ado to dispoil and disarm them, then you shall have inkilling them: himselse mounting first up to the top of a certain little hill, after he had well viewed and confidered the Barbarians how they moved and waved to and fro; he cried out with a loud voice unto his fouldiers: My good friends and companions, the day is ours; and in very truth, they were pur to flight all at once of their own selves, without any onset or charge given them; and in such fort Lucullus followed the chase, that he killed in the very rout, above one hundred thousand, and loft not of his own but five men only.

Cneus Pompeius, sitnamed Magnus, i.e. the Great, was as well beloved of the Romans as his Father before him was hated; who being yet very young, he fided to the faction of Sylla; and not withstanding that he had no office of State, nor was so much as one of the Senate; yet helevied a mighty power of armed men from all parts of Italy: now when Sylla called him unto him, he faid: That he would not make shew of his souldiers unto his Soveraign and General, before they had made fome spoil, and drawn blood of their enemies; and in very deed he came not unto him with his power, before that he had defeated in many battels fundry Captains of his enemies. Afterwards being fent by Stilla with commission of a Commander into Sieily, understanding that his fouldiers as they marched brake out of order and rank, and would go forth to rob and spoil, and commit many rious by the way, he put to death all such as without licence departed from their Colours, and went running up and down the country; and as for such as he sent abroad with warrant about any Commission or business of his, he sealed up their swords within the scabberds with his own signet. He was at the very point to have put all the Mamertines to the fivord, for that they banded against Sylla; but Sthen's one of the inhabitants, an Orator, and a manthat could do much with the people and lead them with his perswafive Orations, said unto him: That it were not well, that for one mans fault he should cause so many innocents to die; for I (quoth he) am the only man culpable; and the cause of all this mischiefe, having by my perswasions induced my friends, and with threats forced mine enemies to take part with Marin; and follow his standard: Pompeius wondering at this resolute remonstrance of his, said: That he was content to pardon the Mamertines, who suffered themselves to be led and periwaded by such a personage, as held the safety of his owne

Country more deare than his own life; for he forgave the whole City and Sthenis himselfe, After this, being passed over sea into Africa against Domitim, and having won the field, in a great battell, tins, neing paned of Emperour or Soveraigne Captaine generall, he faid when his fouldiers faluted him by the name of Emperour or Soveraigne Captaine generall, he faid unto them, That he would not accept of that honourable title, so long as the rampart about his enemies campe flood; he had no fooner faid the word, but they ran all at once to this fervice, not withflanding it was a great showre of raine, plucked down the pallaifada, mounted over the rampart, entred the campe and facked it. At his returne home, Sylla made exceeding much of him otherwise, and didhim great honour, but among many other, he was the first man that filled him with the furname of Magnus: howbeit, when he minded to enter triumphant into Rome, Sylla would have hindered him, alledging for his reason, That he was not as yet admitted and sworne a Senatour: whereat Pompeius turning to those that were present: It seemeth (quoth he) that Sylla is ignorant how there be more men that worship the sun rising than setting: which words when Sylla heard, he cried out with a loud voice, Let him triumph a Gods name for I fee well he will have it and yet for all that, Serviline a man of the fenatours degree, withflood histriumph, and tooks great indignation against him: yea, and many of his own souldiers set themselves against him and dasht it quite, if they might not have certaine gifts and rewards, which they pretended were due unto them: but Pomper faid with a cleare and audible voice, That he would sooner leave triumph and all than to be so bale minded as to flatter and make court unto his fouldiers: at which words Servelius faid unto him: By this now I fee well (O Pempeius) that thou art truly named Magnus, i.e. Great and worthy indeed to triumph. There was a cultome at Rome, that the Knights or Gentlemen, after they had served in the wars the compleat time ser down and limited by the laws, should present their horses in the market place before the two reformers of manners, called Cenfours, and there openly re-count and relate unto them in what wars or battels they had fought, and the Captaines under whom they had borne armes, to the end that according to their demerits they might receive condigne praise or blame. It so fell out that Pompeius being Confull, himselfe led his own horse of serviceby the bidle, and presented him before Gellius and Lenulus, Censours for the time being; and when they according to the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had serviceby the confunction of the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the confunction of the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the confunction of the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the confunction of the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the confunction of the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the confunction of the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the confunction of the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the confunction of the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service that the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had service the order and ved in the wars so many yeares as the Law required: Even all (quoth he) fully, and that under my felfe, the loveraigne Commander at all times. Being in Spaine, he light upon certaine papers and writings of Sertorius, wherein were many letters millive fent from the principall Senatours of Rome, and namely such as sollicited and called Sertorius to Rome, for to raise some innovations, and make a change in the State: these letters he flung all into the fire, giving them occasion and opportunity by this means, who intended mischiese and were ill bent, to change their minds, repent, and amend. Phranes King of the Parthians fent unto him certaine Embassadours to request him that he would not passe over the river Euphrates, but to make it the middle fromier and bound between them both: Nay rather (quoth Pompeins) let justice be the indifferent limit between the Parthians and the Romans. L. Lucullus, after he was returned from his wars and conquests, gave himselfe over excessively to all pleasures, and to live most sumptuously, reproving Pompeius for this: That he defired alwaies from time to time more and more, great charges and employments even above his age, and unfitting those yeares of his: unto whom Pompeius made this answer: That it was a thing more unbefeeming old yeares, for a man to abandon himlelle to delights and pleasures, than to attend the weighty affaires of the Common-weale. Upon a time when he was fick, the Physicians prescibed that he should eare of a black-bird; great laying there was in many places for that bird, but none could be found, for that it was not their season nor the time of the yeare; but one there was, who faid that if he would fend to Lucullus, he might have of them, for he kept them, in mue all the years long: And what needs that (quoth he) cannot Pomper recover and live, if Lucullus were not a waster and a delicate given to belly-cheare? And so leaving the Physicians prescript diet, he composed and framed himselfe to eate that which was ordinary and might befound in every place. In regard of a great famine and scarcity of corne and victuals at Rome, he was ordained in outward shew of words, the grand purveyour or generall superintendent and over-seer for victuals, but in effect and authority, Lord indeed both of sea and land: by which occasion hemade voyages into Africke, Sardinia and Sie ly, where, after he had provided a mighty deale of corne, he intended presently to have returned with all speed to Rome; but there arose a terrible tempest, insomuch as the Pilots and Marriners themselves made no haste to go to sea and set sales, but he in his own person embarked first, and when he was on ship-board, he commanded to weigh anchor, saying with aloud voice, Saile we needs must, there is no remedy, but to live there is not such neceifity. When the quarrell between him and Cafar was broken out and fully discovered, there was one Marcellinus, (a man that before time had been advanced by him, and yet afterwards turned to the adverse part and faction of Casar) who in a frequent assembly of the Senate, charged and challenged him to his face for many things, and spake spitefull words against him: Pompeius could not hold, but answered him thus: Bashest not thou Marcellinus, in this open place to micall and raile upon me, who have made thee eloquent, whereas before thou couldit not speake at all? Who have fed thee full, even untill thou be ready to cast up thy stomacke, where before thou wert hungry and ready to pine for famine? Unto Cato, who chid and reproved him tharply for that he would never believe his words, when he foretold him many times, that the pu fance and increase of Casars State, unto whom helent his hand, would one day greatly prejudice and hurt the weale publike, he answered, Your counsell indeed was wifer, but mine more loving and friendly. In peaking of himselfe freely, he said, That all offices of State he both entred soonerupon than he looked himselfe; and also forwent them before it was expected that he would. After the on tuning the state of Phonfalia when he fled into Agypt, and was to passe out of his gally into a little barke or fisher-boat, which the King had sentunto him for to bring him to land, he turning unto his wise and ion, faid no more but this verie out of Euripides:

Who once in court of Tyrant Serve, become His flives anon, though free they thither come.

Being passed over in this barke, after he had received one blow with a sword, he gave only a sigh and groane, and without sying one word, he covered his own face with his garment, and yeelded

Cicero the great Orator was mocked of some for that surname of his which alludeth unto a Cichpease; insomuch as his friends gave him counsell to change his name : but he contrariwite said, that he would make the name of the Ciceroes more noble and renowned than the Catoes; the Catuli, or the Scanri. He offered unto the gods a goodly faire vessell of filver, in which he caused to be engraven his two fore-names, Marcus and Tullius in letters; bue for the third, to wit, Cicero his furname, he commanded to be embossed or chaced the forme of a Cich-peale. He faid that those Orators who used to straine their voices, and cry aloud in the Pulpit, were privy to their owne weakenesse and insufficiency otherwise, and had recourse to this one help, like as creepies and lamefolke to their horses for to mount upon. Verres had a fon defamed for the abuse of his body in the floure of his youth; and yet the laid Verres fluck not to flander Cicero and raile upon him, even to these broad and soule tearmes, as to call him a filthy wanton and a buggerer; whereto Cicero anfivered thus: Thou doft not know that it were more feemely to rebuke thy children for this within doores in some seven part of thy house close shut. Marcellus one day in debating and contefting with him, faid, Thon haft brought more to their death by thy teltimonies and depositions, than thou halt saved with all thy good pleading: I confede as much (quoth Cierro againe) for I have more truth and fidelity in me by far than eloquence. The same Merellus demanded of him who was his father, reproaching him (as it were) thereby that he was a new upstart, and a gentleman of the first head: Unto whom readily, Thy mother (quoth he) hath made this question more hard on thy part to be answered: now was Metellus his mother thought to be an unchaste woman and naught of her body; and Metellus himselse was counted a vaine braine-sicke and slippery fellow, given over to his wanton lusts and defires. This Metellus had caused to be set upon the sepulchre of one Diodorus, who had been his Master sometime to teach him Rhetorick, the pourtraiture of a Crow inflone: whereupon Cicero tooke occasion to come upon him in this wife: A just recompenceindeed and fit for him, because he hath taught this man to flie and notto speake, * Vatinist was a lewd man, and his adversary: now a rumour ran abroad that he was dead; but afterwards when he found it to be a falle brute: A mischiese take him for me (quoth Cicero) that made this lie first. There was one supposed to be an Africane borne, who said unto him: That he heard froing that him not when he spake: I marvell at that (quoth Cicero) considering thine (f) eares be bored as they are and have holes in them. C. Popilins would have been taken and reputed for a great lawyer although he had no law in the world in him, and was besides a man of very grosse capacity: this man was served with a writ to appeare in the court for to beare witnesse of a truth, touching a certaine fact in question; but he answered, That he knew nothing at all: True (quoth Cicero:) for peradventure you meane of the Law, and thinke that you are asked the question of it. Hortensiss the Orator, who pleaded the cause of Verres, had received of him for a see or a gentle reward, jewell with the pourtraiture of Sphinx in * filver: it fell out fo, that Cicerochanced to give out a certaine dirk and ambiguous speech: As for me (quoth Hortensius) I cannnot tell what to make of your word for I am not one that useth to solve riddles and anigmatical speeches: Why man (quoth Cicero) and yet you have Sphinx in your house. He met upon a time with Voconius and his three daughters the foulest that ever looked out of a paire of eyes: at which object he spake softly to his friends about him:

This man (I weene) his children hath begot In flight of Phoebus and when he would it not

Faultus the fonof Sylla was in the end fofar indebted, that he exposed his goods to be fold in open fale and cauled bills to be fet up on pofts in every quarrefour to northe the fame : Yea mary (quoth Cicero) I like these bills and (g) proscriptions better than those that his father published before him. gti i a plea. When Cafar and Pompeins were entred into open war one against another: I know full well (quoth ruis and orter Cicero) whom to flie, but I wot not unto whom to flie. He found great fault with Pompeint in that he left the City of Rome, and that he chose rather in this case to imitate the policy of Themisticles than of Pericles saying That the present state of the world resembled rather the time of Pericles than of Themistocles: He drew at first to Pompeins fide, and being with him, repented thereof. When Fomprasked him wherehe had left Pib his fornin-lave; he answered readily: Even vivith your good ather-in-lave; meaning Ceffor. There was one who departed out of effor Campe unso Pomprand faid, That he had made such thate that he left his horse behind him; Thou call skill (Iperceive) better to fave thy horses life than thine owne. Unto another, who brought vvord that the friends of Cafar looked toure and unpleasant: Thou saiest (quoth he) as much as if they thought not well of his proceedings. After the battell of Pharfalia was loft, and that Pompeius was already fled, there was one Noning who came unto him, and willed him not to despaire, but be of good cheare, for that they had yet seven eagles left, which were the standards of the legions: Seaven eagles (quoth he;) that were somewhat indeed, if we had to war against jaies and jackdaws. After that Cefir, upon his victory, being Lord of all, had caused the statues of Pompey, which were cast downe, to be set up againe with honour; Cicero said of Cafar, In setting up these statues of Pompey, he hath pitched his owne more furely. He so highly esteemed the gift of eloquence and grace of well speaking, yea, and he tooke so great paines with ardent affection, forto performe the thing, that having to plead a cause only before the Centumvirs or hundred judges, and the day set down being neare at hand for the heating and triall thereof; when one of his servants Eros, brought him word that the cause was put off to the next day, (b) he was so well contented and pleased there- haman of with, that incontinently he gave him his freedome for that news.

ing manner, threaten to hang them: and to fay a truth, within a while after, he did as much for them: for when his rantome was come, and he delivered once out of their hands, helevied togethera power of men and ships from out of the coasts of Asia set upon the said rovers, spoiled them and crucified them. Being returned to Rome, and having enterprised a fure for the foveraign Sacerdotall dignity against (aulus, who was then a principall man at Rome; when as his mother accompanied him as far as to the utmost gates of his house, when he went into Mars field where the election was held, he took his leave of her and faid: Mother you shall have this day your son to be chiele Pontifice and high Priest, or else banished from the City of Rome. He put away his wife Pompera, upon an ill name that went of her, as if the had been naught with Clodins: whereupon when Clodins afterwards was called into question judicially for the fact, and Casar likewite convented into the courr, peremptorily for to beare witnesse of the truth; being examined upon his oath, he sware that he never knew any ill at all by his wife: and when he was urged and replied upon againe, wherefore he had put her away? He answered, That the wife of Celar ought not only to be innocent and cleare of crime, but also of all suspicion of crime. In reading the noble acts of Alexander the great, the teares trickled down his cheeks; and when his friends defired to know the reason why he wept;

At my age (quoth he) Alexander had vanquished and subdued Darius, and I have yet done nothing. As he passed along through a little poor town scituate within the Alpsihis familiar friends about him merrily asked one another whether there were any factions and contentions in that burrough about superiority, and namely, who should be the chiese? whereupon he staid suddenly; and after he had fludied and amused awhile within himselse: I had rather (quoth he) be the first here, than the fecond in Rome. As for hauty and adventurous enterprizes, he was wont to fay, They should be executed and not consulted upon: and verily when he passed over the river Rulicon, which divideth the province of Gaul from Italy, for to lead his power against Pompeius: Let the Die (quoth he) be to speake the word than to do the deed. And for that his fouldiers staid long ere they were transported over unto him from Brundusium, to Dyrrhachium, he embarked himselse alone into a small reffell without the knowledge of any man who he was, purposing to passe the seas alone without his company; but it hapned to, that he was like to have been call away in a guft, and drowned with the waves of the sea: whereupon he made himselfe knowneunto the Pilot, and spake unto him aloud: Affure thy felfe and rest confident infortune, for wot well thou hast Cafar a ship-board: howbeit for that time he was empeached that he could not crosse the seas, as well in regard of the tempest which grew more violent, as also of his souldiers who can unto him

Cains Cafar, at what time as he being yet a young man, fled and avoided the fury of Sylla, fell into the hands of certaine pirats or rovers, who at the first demanded of him no great sum of money to which his for his raniome, whereat he mocked and laughed at them, as not knowing what manner of percasting and fon they had gotten; and so of himselfe promised to pay them twile as much as they asked; and wearing. being by them guarded and attended upon very diligently, all the while that he fent for to gather the faid fum of money which he was to deliver them, he willed them to keepe filence and make no noile, but he might sleep and take his repose: during which time that it was in their costodie, hee exercised himselfe in writing as well verse as prote and read the same to them when they were compoled; and if he faw that they would not praise and commend those Poems and Orations sufficiently to his contentment, he would call them fenfeleffe fors and barbarous, yea, and after a laughthrownfor all: as if he would tay. * This cast for it, there is but one chance to lose all. When *Orthan, Pompey was fled from Rome to the sea side, and Metellus the superintendent of the publike treasury, 1 house it would have hindered him for taking forth any money from thence, keeping the treasure house fast discourse the superintendent of the publike treasure. thut, he threatned to kill him; whereat Metellus feeming to be amazed at his audacious words: whereall of Tush, tush, (quoth he) good young man, I would thou shouldst know that it is harder for me the Plaines of Pharfalia, the very day of the battell. Pompey having arranged his army in array, commanded his fouldiers to fland their ground, and not to advance forward, but to expect their enemies, and receive the charge; wherein Cafar afte wards faid: He did amisse and grossely failed, for that thereby he let flack as it were the vigour and vehemency of his fouldiers, which is ministred unto them by the violence of the first onset, and abated that heat also of courage which the faid charge would have brought with it, When he had defeated at his very first encounter, Pharnaces King of Pontus; he wrote thus unto his friends: I came, I faw, I vanquished. After that Scipio and those under his conduct were discomfitted and put to flight in Africk; when he heard that Caso had killed himseif, he said, I envy thy death O Caro, for that thou hast envied me the honour of saving thy life, Some there were who had Antony and Dolabella in jealousie and suspicion, and when they came unto him and faid, That he was to look unto himfelf, and fland upon his good gnard she made them this aniwer, That he had no dittrust nor feare of them wholed an idle life, be well coloured, and info good liking as they: but I feare (quoth he) there pale and leane fellows, pointing unto Britis and C. The Alexandrians after their City was won, looked for no better than to suffer all the extremities and calamities that might follow upon the forcing of a City by affault but this Cefar mounting up into the publike place to make a speech unto the Citizens, having neare by unto him a familiar friend of his; to wit, Arius, an Alexandrian borne; pronounced openly a generall pardon, faying that he forgave the City; first, in the regard of the greatnesse and beauty thereof; lecondly, in respect of King Alexander the Great their first founder: and thirdly, for Arus his fake, who was his loving friend. Understanding that one of his Procuratours named Eros, who did negotiate for him in Egypt, had bought a quaile of the game, which in fight would beat all other quailes, and was never conquered himlelf; but continued fill invincible; which quaile notwithstanding, the said slave had caused to be roasted and so extenit: he sent for him and examined him thereupon whether it was true or no? And whenhe confelled Yea, he commanded him presently to be crucified and nailed to the mast of his ship. He placed Arius in Sicily for his agent and procuratour, inftead of one Theedorus: and when one presented unto him a little booke or bill, wherein were written these words, Theodorus of That sis * the bald is a thiese, how thinke you is he not? when he had read this bill, he did nothing else but subscribe underneath? I thinke no atherity continued for the factor of the familiar triends who continued for the familiar triends who can be continued for the familiar triends who ved license with his good favour to retire unto his own house from the court, by reason of his old age; and leave he gave him, but at his farewell Athenodorus faid unto him, Sir, when you perceive your selfe to be moved with choler, neither say nor do ought before you have repeated to your selfall the 24, letters in the Alphabet: Cafar hearing this advertisement, took him by the hand: I have need fill (quoth he) of your company and presence, and so retained him for one yeare longer, saying withall this verse,

The hire of silence, now I fee Is out of pirill and jeopardy.

Having heard that King Alexander the Great at the age of two and thirty yeares, having performed most part of his conquests was in doubt with himselfe and perplexed what to do and how to beemployed afterwards: I wonder (quoth he) that Alexander thought it not a more difficult matter to governe and preferve a great Empire after it is once gotten, than to win and conquer it at first. When he had enacted the law Julia as touching adultery, wherein is fet down determinately the manner of processe against those that be attaint of that crime, and how such are to be punished who be convict thereof: it hapned that through impatience and heat of choler, he fell upon a young gentleman, who was accused to have committed adultery with his daughter Julia, infomuch as he buffeted him well and thorowly with his owne fifts: the young man thereupon cried unto him: Your selfe have made a law, Cafar, which ordaineth the order and forme of proceeding against adulteries: whereat he was so dismaied and abashed yea, and so repented himselfe of this militartiage, that he would not that day eat any supper. When he fent his nephew or daughters sonne (ains into Armenia, he praied unto the gods to accompany him with that good will of all men which Pompey had, with the valiantnesse of Alexander the Great, and with his owngood fortune. He faid, that he left unto the Romans for to succeed him in the Empire, one who never in his life had confulted twife of one thing, meaning Tiberius, Minding to appeale certain young Romane Gentlemen of honour and authority, who made a great noise and stirre in his prefence; when he saw that for all his first admonitions he could do no good, he said unto them Young sence is when it was the control of the man and district the man and the control of the man and the ma wrote in this wife: You're not ignorant (I suppose) that I am displeased with you, for otherwise I would not have wintered in this little life Egma: and more than thus, he neither did nor said afterwards unto them. When one of Eurycles his accusers had at large with all liberty and licentiousneffe of speech uttered against him (without any respect) what he would, he let him run on still, untill he came to these words: And if these matters (Casar) seeme not unto you notorious and hainous, command him to rehearse unto me the seventh book of Thucydides. Casar offended now at his audacious impudency, commanded him to be had away and led to prison; but being advertised that he was the only man left of the race and line of Captaine Brafidus, he font for him, and after he had given him form few good admonitions, let him go. Pio had built him a most stately and magnificent house, even from the foundation to the roose thereof, which when Cafar saw, he said, It rejoyceth my heart exceedingly to see thee build thus, as if Rome should continue world without end.

Laconick Apophthegmes, or the notable Sayings of Lacedamonians.

The Summary

PLutarch had in the collection precedent among the Apophthegmes of renowned Greeks, mingled cer-taine notable sayings of King Agesslaus and other Lacedemonians: but now he exhibiteth untous a Treasise by it selfe of the said Lacedemonians, who deserve no doubt to be registred apart by themselves, as being a people, who (of all other nations destitute of the true knowledge of God) least abused their tongue. In serve for the maintenance of their estate, and the fourth comprise the certaine [sping: ofsome of their wo-men, wherein may be seen so much the more the valour and magnanimity of that Nation. As touching the profit that a man may draw out of these Apophthegmes it is very great in every respect: neither is there any person of what age or condition soever, but he may learne herein very much, and namely, how to speake little, to lay well, and to carry himselfe vertuously, as the reading thereof will make proofe. We have noted also and observed somewhat in the Margin, not particularizing upon every point; but only to give a taste and appetite unto the Reader for to meditate better thereof, and to apply unto his own use, both it and all the rest which he may there comprehend and understand.

Laconick Apophthegmes, or the notable Sayings of Lacedamonians.

Gesicles a King of the Lacedamonians, by nature given to heare and desirous to learne; when one of his familiar friends faid unto him: I wonder fir fince you take so great pleafure otherwise to heare men speake well and eloquently, that you do not entertaine the famous Sophister or Rhetorician Philophanes for to teach you? made him this answer: It is because I defire (a) to be their Scholer, whole fon also I am, that is, among whom I A Prince amborne. And to another who demanded of him, how a Prince could raign infafety, not having is to honor about him his guards for the furety of his person; Mary (quoth he) if he rule his subjects as a good his native father governeth his children.

Agefilans the Great, being at a certaine feast, was by lot chosen the Master of the said feast; and to him it appertained to fet down a certaine law, both in what manner and how much every one ought to drink now when the butler or skinker asked him how much he should pour out for every one, he aniwered: If thou be well provided and have good flore of wine, fill out as much as every nable to the man lift to call for; but (b) if thou have no great plenty of it, let every guest have alike. There was a purle. malefactor, who being in prison endured constantly before him all manner of torments; which when Patience he faw: What a curied wretch is this & wicked in the highest degree, who doth employ this (c) pati-ence and resolute fortitude in the maintenance of so shameful and mischievous parts, as he hath com-treme wise. mitted! One highly praited in his presence a certaine Master of Rhetorick, for that he could by his kednesse.

eloquent tongue amplifie small matters, making them seeme great, whereupon he said: I take him not to be a good shoomaker, who putterth on a bigshooe upon a little foot. When one in reasoning and debating a matter upon a time challenged him, and faid, Sir, you gave your consent once unto it; and ettoones iterating the same words, charged him with his grant and promise: True indeed (quoth he) if the eaule were jult, I approved it in good earnest and gave my promile; but if not, I didbut barely lay the word and no more but as the other replied again and faid, Yea, but Kings ought to accomplish and performe whatsoever they seem once to grant, and it be but with the nod of the head: Nay, (faid he again) they are no more bound thereto, than thole that come unto them are tied for to speake and demand all things just and reatonable, yea, and to observe the opportunity, and that which fitteth and forteth well with Kings. When heheard any meneither to praise or dispraise others, he faid: That it behoved to know the nature, disposition, and behaviour no lesse of those who so ipake, than of the parties of whom they did speak. Being whiles he was very young, at a certainpublike and festivall folemnicy, wherein young boies daunced (as the manner was) all naked, the warden or overseer of the said shew and dance, appointed him a place for to behold that fight, which was not very honourable; wherewith notwithstanding he stood well-contented, albeit he was known to be heire apparant to the Crown, and already declared King; and withall faid: I is very wells for I will thew, that it is not the place which crediteth the perion, but the person that giveth credit and honour to the place, A certain Physician had ordained for him in one sicknesse that he had a course of Phyfick to cure his malady, which was nothing easie and simple, but very exquisite, curious, and withall painfull : By Cestor and Pollux (quoth he) if my destiny be nottolive, I shall not recover though I take all the drugs and medicines in the world. Standing one day at the altar of Minerva, furnamed Chalceacos, where he facrificed an oxe, there chanced a loufe to bite him; and he was nothing difmaied and abathed to take the faid loule, but before them all who were present, killed her, and sworeby the gods, saying, That it would do him good at the heart to serve them all so who should treacherously lay wait to assaile him, yea, though it were at the very altar. Another time, when he faw a little boy drawing a mouse which he had caught out of a window, and that the said mouse turned upon the boy and bit him by the hand, infomuch as she made him leave his hold, and so escad Naturall ped; he shewed the fight unto those that were present about him, and said : Loe, (d) if so little a beast and filly creature as this hath the heart to be revenged upon those that do it injury, what think you is meet and reason that men should do? Being deirous to make war upon the King of Persia, for the deliverance and freedom of those Greeks who did inhabit Asia; he went to consult with the Oracle of Tupiter within the forest Dedona, as touching this design of his: and when the Oracle had made answer according to his mind, namely, That if it pleased him, he should enterprise that expedition: he communicated the same to the controllers of State called Ephors; who willed him also to go forward, and aske the counfell likewise of Apollo in the City of Delphos; and being there he entred into the Chappell from whence the Oracles were delivered, and faid thus: O Apollo, art thou also of the same mind that thy father is? And when he answered, yea; thereupon he was chosen for the generall to conduct this war and fet forth in his voyage accordingly, Tifaphernes, lieutenant under the King of Perfia in Afia, being aftonied at his arrivall made a composition and accord with him at the very first; in which treaty he capitulated and promiled to leave unto his behoofe all the Towns and Cities of the Greeks which are in Asia, free and at liberty to be governed according to their own laws: meane while he dispatched messengers in post to the King his Master, who sent unto hima strong and puissant Army; upon the confidence of which forces he gave defiance, and denounced war, unlesse he departed with all speed out of Asia: Agesilans being well enough pleated with this treacherous breach of the agreement, made semblant as though he would go first into Caria; and when Tissaphernes gathered his forces into those parts to make head against him all on a sudden he invaded Phrygia. where he won many Cities, and raifed rich booties from thence, laying unto his friends: That to break faith and promise unjustly made unto a friend was impiety; but to abuse and deceive an enemy, was not only just, but also peasant and profitable. Finding himselfe weak in cavalry, he returned to the City Ephefin, where he intimated thus much unto the rich men, who were willing to be exempt from going in person unto the wars, that they should every one set forth one horse and a man: by which means within few daies he levied a great number both of horse and also of men able for service, instead of those that were rich and cowards; wherein he said, That he did imitate Agamemnon. who dispensed with a rich man who was but a dastard and durst not go to the war, for one faire and goodly mare. When he fold those prisoners for slaves, whom he had taken in the wars, the officers for this fale, by his appointment, made money of their cloaths and other furniture apart, but of their bodies, all naked by themselves; now many chapmen there were, who willingly bought their apparell, but few or none had any mind to the persons themselves, for that their bodies were soft and white, as having been delicately nourished and choicely kept withinhonse and under covert, and so feemed for no nie at all, and good for nothing: Agefilans standing by: Behold my masters (quoth he) this is that for which you fight, shewing their spoiles; but these be they against whom you fight, pointing to the men. Having given Tiffaphernes an overthrow in battell within the Countrey of Lydia, and flainea great number of his men, he over-ran and harried all the Kings Provinces: and when he sent unto him presents of gold and silver, praying him to come to some agreement of peace, Agelilaus made this answer: As touching the treaty of peace, it was in the City of Lacedamons power to do what they would; but otherwise, for his own part he tooke greater pleasure to enrich his fouldiers than to be made rich himselfe : as for the Greeks, they reputed it an honour not to receive gifts from their enemies, but to be Masters of their spoiles. Megal ares the young fon notto receive guts admented technicas out to be manifered their points. Megalatet the young ton of Spubridates, who was of vifage most faire and beautifull, came toward him as it were to embrace and kisse him for that he thought (as he was right amiable) to be exceedingly beloved of him; but Agesslaus turned his face away; infomuch as the youth desided and would no more offer himfelfe unto him; whereupon Agefilans demanded the reason thereof, and seemed to call for him; unto whom his friend's made answer: That himselfe was the only cause, being atraid to kisse to faire a boy; but if he would not feeme to feare, the youth would returne and repaire unto him in place right willingly :uponthis he flood musing to himselfe a good while, and said never a word; but then at length he brake forth into this speech. Let him even alone, neither is there any need now that you should say any thing to perswade him; for mine own part I account it a greater matter to be the conquerour, and have the better hand of fuch, than to win by force the ftrongest hold, or the most puissant and populous City of mineenemies; for I take it better for a man to preserve and lave his own liberty to himselfe, than to take it from others. Moreover, he was in all other things a most precise observer in every point of whatsoever the laws commanded, but in the affaires and businesse of his friends, he said, That straightly to keep the rigour of justice, was a very cloake, and colourable pretence, under which they covered themselves who were not willing to do for their friends : to which purpose there is a little letter of his found written unto Idrieus a Prince of Caria, for the enlarging and deliverance of a friend of his, in these words: If Nicius have not transgressed deliver him; is the have, deliver him for the love of me; but how so ever yet deliver him; and verily thus affected flood Agefilans in the greatest part of his friends occasions; how beit; there fell out fome cases, when he respected more the publike utility, and nsed his opportunity therefore, according as he shewed good proofe. Upon a time, at the dislodging of his campe in great haste and hurry, infomuch as he was forced to leave a boy whom he loved full, well behind him, for that helay fick: when the party called inflantly upon him by name, and belought him not to forfake him now at his departure, Agestlans turning back, laid: Oh how hard is it to be pitifull and wife both at orice; Furthermore, as touching his diet and the cherifling of his body, he would not be served with more nor better than those of his traine and company! He never did eate untill he was satisfied nor tooke his drinke untill he was drunke, and as for his fleepe," it never had the command and maffery over him, but he tooke it only as his occasions and affaires would permit for cold and heat he was so fitted and disposed that in all seasons of the yeare he used to weare but one and the same fort of garment : his pavilion was alwaies pitched in the midft of his fouldiers, neither had he a bed #6 lye in better than any other of the meanest : for he was wont to fay, That he who had the charge and conduct of others, ought to furmount those private persons, who were under his leading, not in daintinesse and delicacy, but in sufferance of paine and travell, and in fortitude of heart and confage. When one asked the question in his presence: What it was wherein the laws of Lycurgus had made the City of Sparta better? he answered, That this benefit it found by them; to make no reckoning at all of pleatures. And to another who marvelled to see so great simplicity and plainnesse, as well se feeding as apparell both of him and also of other Laceda monians, he said, The fruit (mygood friend which we reape by this straight manner of life is liberty and freedome. There was one who exhorted him to eale and remit a little this (traight and auftere manner of living: For that (quoth he) it would not be used but in regard of the incertitude of fortune; and because there may fall out such an occasion and time as might force a man to to do: Yea; but I (laid Agestians) do willingly accustome my telfe hereto, that in no mutation and change of fortune; I should not seeke for change of my life. And in very truth, when he grew to be aged, he did not for all his yeares give over and leave his hardnes of life: and therefore when one asked him, Why(confidering the extreame cold winter, and his old age befides) he went without an upper coar or gaberdine? he made this answer, Because young men might learne to do as much, having for an example before their eyes, the eldeft in their country, and luch also as were their governours. We read of him, that when he passed with his Army over the Thasians countrey, they lent unto him for his refestion meale of all forts geele and other foules, comfitures, and pastry workes, fine cakes, marchpanes and sugar-meats, with all manner of exquisite viands, and drinkes most delicate and costly: but of all this provision, he received none but the meale aforesaid; commanding those that brought the same to carry them all away with them as things whereof he flood in no need, and which he knew not what to do with : In the end after they had been very urgent, and importuned him so much as possibly they could to take that curtene at their hands, he willed them to deale all of it among the Ilots, which were indeed the flaves that followed the Campe: whereupon when they demanded the cause thereos, he said unto them: That it was not meet for those who protested valour and proweste to receive such dainties; Neithercan that (quoth he) which ferveth instead of a bait to allure and draw men to a servile nature, agree well with those who are of a bold and free courage. Over and besides, these Thasians having received many favours and benefits at his hands, in regard whereof they tooke themselves much bound and beholding unto him, dedicated Temples to his honour, and decreed divine worthip unto him, no lesse than unto a very god, and hereupon sent an embassage to declare unto him this their resolution: when he had read their letters and understood what honour they minded to do unto him, he asked this one question of the Embassadours; whether their State and Countrey was able to deifie men? And when they answered, Yea: Then (quoth he) begin to make your selves gods first, and when you have done so, I will beleeve that you also can make me a god. When the Greeke Colonies in Afa, had at their Parliaments ordained in all their chiefe and principall Cities to erect his statues; he wrote back unto them in this manner: I will not that you make forme any statue or image whatsoever, neither painted nor cast in mould, nor wrought in clay, never cut and engraven any way. Seeing whileshe was in Afia, the house of a friend or host of his, covered over with an embowed roofe of plankes, beames, and spars soure-square; he asked him whether the trees in those parts grew so square? And when he answered, No, but they grew round: How then (quoth he) if they had grown naturally foure cornered, would you have made them round? He was asked the question upon a time, how far forth the marches and confines of Lacedamon did extend: then he shaking a javelin which he held in his hand: Even as far (quoth he) asthis is able to go. One demanded of him, why the City of Sparta was not walled about? See you not (quoth he) the walls of the Lacedamonians; and therewith shewed him the Citizens armed. Another asked him the like question, and he made him this answer: That Cities ought not to beforeified with Hones, with wood and timber, but with the prowesse and valiance of the Inhabitants, He used ordinarily to admonish his friends, not to seeke for to be rich in money, but in valour and vertue. And whenfoever he would have a worke to be finished, or service to be performed speedily by his souldiers; his manner was, to begin himselfe first to lay hand unto it in the face of all. He (tood upon this and would glory in it; that he travelled as much as any man in his company: but he vaunted of this; that he could rule and command himselfemore than in being a King. Unto one who wondering to see a Lacedamonian maimed and lame, go to war, said unto the party: Thou shouldst yet at leastwife have called for an horse to serve upon: Knowest not thou (quoth he) that in war we have no need of those that will flie away, but of such as will makegood and keep their ground? It was demanded of him, how he won fo great honour and reputation? In despiting death (quoth he,) And being likewise asked why the Spartanes wied the found of flutes when they fought? To the end (said he) that when in battell they march according to the measures, it may be known who be valiant, and who be cowards. One therewas who reputed the King of Persia happy, for that he attained very young to so high and puissant a State: Why fo (quoth he) for Priamus at his age was not unhappy nor infortunate, Having conquered the greater part of Afia, he purposed with himselfe to make war upon the King himselfe, as well forto break his long repose, as also to hinder him otherwise and stop his course, who minded with money to bribe and corrupt the Governours of the Greek-Cities, and the Oratours that lead the people: but amids this designe and deliberation of his he was called home by the Ephori, by reason of a dangerous war raifed by the Greek-States, against the City of Sparta, and that by means of greatsums of money which the King of Persa had sent thither; by occasion whereof forced he was to depart out of Assasaying, That a good Prince ought to suffer himselfe to be commanded by the laws; and he left behind him much forrow, and a longing defire after him among the Greek-Inhabitants in Afia after his departure: and for that on the Persian peeces of coine, there was stamped or imprinted the image of an Archer; he faid when he brake up his Campe, that the King of Perfis had chased him out of Afa with thirty thousand Archers: for so many golden Dariques had been carried by one Timocrates unto Thebes and Athens, which were divided among the Oratours and Governours of those two Cities, by means whereof they were sollicited and stirred to begin war upon the Spartanes : so he wrote a letter missive unto the Ephori, the tenour whereof was this: Agesilaus unto the Ephori, greeting. "We have subdued the greatest part of Asia, and driven the Barbarians from "thence; also in Ionia we have made many armours; but fince you command me to repaire home by a day appointed: Know ye that I will follow hard after this letter, or peradventure pre-" ventit; for the authority of command which I have, I hold not for my felle, but for my native "Countrey and confederates: and then in truth doth a Magistrate rule according to right and juflice, when he obeyeth thelaws of his Countrey and the Ephori, or such like as be in place of government within the City. Having crossed the straights of Hellespont, he entred into the Countrey of Thrace, where he requested of no Prince nor State of the Barbarians passage; bursent unto every one of them, demanding whether he should patte as through the land of triends or enemies? And verily all others received him friendly, and accompanied him honourably as he journied through their Countries: only those whom they call Troadians. (unto them as the report goeth, Xerxes himselfe gave presents, to have leave for to passe,) demanded of him for licence of quiet pasfage, a hundred Talents of filver, and as many women: but Agefilaus after a scoffing manner asked those who brought this message: And why do not they themselves come with you for to receive the money and women? So he led his Army forward; but in the way he encountred them well appointed, gave them battell, overthrew them, and put many of them to the sword, which done, he marched farther. And of the Macedonian King he demanded the same question as before; who made him this answer, That he would consult thereupon: Let him consult (quoth he) what he will, meane while we will march on: the Kingwondring at his hardinesse, stood in great feare of him, and fent him word topasse in peaceable and friendly manner. The Thessalians at the same time were consederate with his enemies: whereupon he forraged and spoyled their Countries as he went, and sent to the City of Larissa two friends of his, Xenocles and Screha, to found them and see if they could practise effectually for to draw them to the league and amity of the Lacedemonians, but those of Lariffa arrested those Agents, and kept them in prison;

whereupon all the rest taking great indignation, were of this mind, that Agesslaus Could do no lesse, but presently encampe himselfe and beleaguer the City Lariffa round about : but he said that for to conquer all Theffalie, he would not leele one of those twaine: to upon composition and agreement, he recovered and got them againe. Being given to understand that there was a battell fought neare to Corinth, in which very few Lacedamonians were flaine, but of Athenians, Argives, Corinthians, and their Allies, a great number: he was not once feene to havetaans, Argices, contentiants, and the news of the victory; but fighted deeply from the bottome e Agood man ken any (e) joy or contentment at the news of the victory; but fighted deeply from the bottome of his heart, faying, Alas for unhappy Greec, who hath her felle destroyed io many men of inhevident of his heart, and the own, as had been sufficient in one battell to have defeated all the Barbarians at once. But obtained in when the Pharialians came to fet upon the taile of his Army in his march, and to do them mifchiefe and dammage; with a force of five hundred horse, he charged and overthrew them; for which lucky hand he caused a Trophee to be erected under the mountaines called Narthaeu; and this victory of all others pleased him most, for that with so small a troupe and cornet of his owne horiemen which himselfe put out and addressed against them, he had given those the overthrow, who at all times vaunted themselves to be thebelt men at armes in the world. Thither came Diphridas, one of the Ephori, unto him, being lent exprelly from Sp. rta, with a commandement unto him, that incontinently he should with force and armes invade the countrey of Ecotia; and he although he meant and purposed of himselse some time after to enter with a more puissant power; yet would he not disobey those great Lords of the State, but sent for two Regiments of ten thoufand apeece, drawn out of those who served about Corunt, and with them made a rode into Baotia, and gave battell before Coronea unto the Thebans, Athenians, Argives, and Corinthians, where he won the field: which, as witnesseth Xenophon, was the greatest and most bloudy bartell that had been fought in his time: but true it it, that he himselfe was in many places of his body fore wounded, and then being returned home, notwithstanding so many victories and happy fortunes, he never altered any jot in his own person, either for diet or otherwise for the manner of his life, Seeing some of his Citizens to vaunt and boast of themselves, as if they were more than other men, in regard that they nourished and kept horses of the game to run in therace for the prize; he perswaded his fister, named Cynifea, to mount into her Chariot, and togounto that solemnity of the Olympick games, there to runne a course with her horses for the best prize; by which, his purpose was to let the Greekes know, that all this running of theirs was no matter of valour, but a thing of cost and expence, to shew their wealth only. He had about him Xenophon the Philosopher, whom he loved and highly cheemed; him he requested to send for his sons to be brought up in Lacedamon, and there to learne the most excellent and singular discipline in the world, namely, the knowledge how to obey and to rule well. Being otherwise demanded, wherefore he efteemed the Lacedamonians more happy than other nations: It is (quothhe) because they professe and exercise above all men in the world, the skill of obeying and governing. Afterthedeath of Lyfander, finding within the City of Sparts great factions and much fiding, which the faid Lyfa-der, incontinently after he was returned out of Afia, had raifed and fittred up against him, he purposed and went about to detect his lewdnesse, and make it appeare unto the inhabitants of Spa-ta, what a dangerous medler he had been whiles he lived: and to this purpole having read an oration, found after his deceale among his papers, which Creon verily the Halicarnafian had composed; but Lyfander meant to pronounce before the people in a generall Assembly of the City, tending to the alteration of the State, and bringing in of many novelties, he was fully minded to have divulged it abroad : but when one of the ancient Senatours had read the faid oration, and doubted the fequell thereof, confidering it was fo well penned, and grounded upon such effectual and persivative reasons, he gave Agestaucounsell not to digge up Lesander againe, and rake him as it were out of his grave, but let the oration lie buried with him: whose advice he followed, and so rested quiet and made no more ado: and as for those who underhand crossed him and were his adversaries, he did not course them openly, but practifed and made meanes to fend some of them forth as Captaines into certaine forraine expeditions, and unto others to commit certaine publike Offices: in which charges they carried themselves so, as they were discovered for covetous and wicked persons, and afterwards when they were called into question judicially, he shewed himselfe contrary to mens expectation to help them out of trouble, and succour them so, as that he gat their love and good wils, insomuch as in the end there was not one of them his adversarie. One there was who requested him to write in his favour to his hofts and friends which he had in Afia, letters of recommendation on, that they would defend and maintaine him in his rightfull cause : My friends (quoth he) use to do that which is equity and just, although I should write never a word unto them. Another shewed him the walls of a City how wonderfull strong they were and magnificently built, asking of him whether he thought them not stately and faire: Faire (quoth he) yes no doubt, for women to lodge and dwell in, but not for men. A Megarian there was who magnified and highly extolled before him the City Megara: Young man (quoth he) and my good friend, your brave words require some great puissance. Such things as other men had in great admiration, he would not seeme so much as to take knowledge of. Upon a time one Callipides an excellent player in Tragedies, who was in great name and reputation among the Greekes, infomuch as all forts of men made no small account of him, when he chanced to meet him upon the way, falu-ted him first, and afterwards presumpenously thrust himselfe forward to walke among others, with him, in hope that the King would begin to shew some lightsome countenance, and grace him; but in the end, leeing that it would not be, he was so bold as to advance himselfe, and say unto him: Sir King, know you not me? Andhave you not heard who I am? Agesslaus looking wistly upon his face: Art not thou (quoth he) Cathipides Descellstus? (for so the Lacedamonians nie to call a jester or player.) He was invited one day to come and heare a man who could counterfeit most lively and naturally the voice of the Nightingale; but he refused to go, faying: I have heard the Nightingales themselves to sing many a time. Memorates the Physician had a lucky hand in divers despegates themselves to might have been successful to the successful t unto him, to fet this superscription: Menecrates Jupiter, unto King Agestam wisheth long life: t signifying but Agessluss wrote back unto him in this wise: Agessluss to Menorates wishert (f) good health, bhatheway. When Pikarnabassus and Conon the high-admirals of the Armada under the Persian King, were so himstide, and far-forth Lords of the sea, that they pilled and spoiled all the coasts of Laconia; and besides, the shardour walls of Athens were rebuilded with the money that Pharnabafus furnished the Athenians withall: the Lords of the Councill of Lacedamon were of advice, that the best policy was, to conclude peace with the King of Perfia; and to this effect fent Antalcidas one of their Citizens to Tiribafar, with Commission treacherously to betray and deliver into the barbarous Kings hands, the Greekes was thought to have had his hand in this shamefull and infamous practice; for Analcidas, who was his mortall enemy, wrought by all meanes possible to effect peace, because he saw that war continually augmented the credit of Agesilaus, and made him most mighty and honourable; yet neverthelesse he answered unto one that reproached him with the Lacedamonians, saying, That they were Medified, or turned Medians: Nay rather (quoth he) the Medians are Laconified and become Laconians. The question was propounded upon him for a time, whether of these two vertues in his judgement was the better, Fortitude or Justice? And he answered: That where Justice reignnis judgement was the benefit of rottinude of jutther. And it ambreted a first where jutther regarded, Fortifude bare no fival, and was nothing worth; fortif we were all righteous and honest men, there would be no need at all of Fortifude. The people of Greece dwelling in Afia, had a custome to call the King of Perfi.a. The Great King: And wherefore (quoth he) is he greater than I, unlessed he has more temperate and righteous? Semblably he faid, That the inhabitants of Afia were good flaves, but naughty freemen. Being asked how a man might win himselfe the greatest name and reputation among men, he answered thus: If he say well, and yet do better. This was a speech of his: That a good Captaine ought to shew unto his enemies valour and hardinesse; but unto those that beunder his charge, love, and benevolence. Another demanded of him, what children should learne in their youth? That (quoth he) which they are to do and practice when they be men grown, He was judge in a cause, where the plaintife had pleaded well, but the defendant very badly; who eftíoones and at every sentence did nothing but repeat these words: O Agesplans, a King ought to protect and help the laws: unto whom Agesplans answered in this wise: If one had (g) undermination of the sentence of ned thy house, or robbed thee of thy raiment, wouldst thou thinke and looke that a carpenter or maion were bound to repaire thy house, and the weaver or tailor for to supply thy want of cloaths? The King of Perfix had writ unto him a letter missive after a general peace concluded; which letter was brought by a Gentleman of Persia, who came with Callias the Lacedamonian, and the contents thereof was to this effect: That the King of Persia defired to enter into some more especiall amithe ten was to inscreed the tending of the tending in generall, and shew himselfe to love the Greeks, and defire their good, I also reciprocally will be his friend to the utmost of my power; but if I may find that he practiseth treachery and attempteth ought prejudiciall to the state of Greece, well may he write Epistle upon Epistle, and I receive from him one letter after another, but let him trust to this: I will never be his friend. He loved very tenderly his own children when they were little ones, infomuch as he would play with them up and down the house, yea, and put a long cane between his legs, and ride upon it like an hobby horse with them for company; and if it chanced that any of his friends spied him so doing, he would pray them to say nothing unto any man thereof, until they had babes and children of their own. But during the continual wars that he had with the Thebans, he fortuned in one battell to be grievously wounded; which when Antalcidas saw, he said unto him, Certes you have received of the Thebans the due fallary and reward that you deferred for teaching them as you have done, even againft their wills how to fight, which they neither could not ever would have learned to do: for in truth it is reported, that the Thebans then became more martiall and warlike than ever before-time, as being inured and exercised in armes by the continual roads and invasions that the Lacedamonians made; which was the reason that ancient Lycurgus in those laws of his which be called Rhetræ, expresly forbad his people to make warre often upon one and the same nation, for feare lest in so doing their enemies should learne to be good souldiers. When he heard, that the Allies and Confederates of Lacedamon were offended and tooke this continual warfareill, complaining that they were never in manner out of armes, but carried their harnesse continually upon their backs; and befides, being many more in number, they followed yet the Lacedamonians, who were but an handfull to all them: he being minded to convince them in this. and to shew how many they were, commanded all his faid Consederates to assemble together, and to fit them down pell-mell one with another; the Lacedamonians likewife to take their place over-against them apart by themselves; which done, he caused an herald to cry aloud in the hearing of all: That all the potters should rise first; and when those were risen, that the brasse-founders and smiths should stand up; then the carpenters; after them the masons; and so all other Arnersang minus monograms, one after another; by which meanes all the Confederates well-neare were filenup, and none in manner left fitting; but all this while not a Lacedamonian flirred off his feat, forthat forbidden they were allto learne or exercise any mechanicall craft : then Agestians took up a laughter, and faid, Lo, my masters and friends, How many more fouldiers are we able to tion the wars than you can make? In that bloudy battell fought at Leafter, many Lacedemo-nians there were that ran out of the field and fled, who by the laws and ordinances of the country were all their life time noted with infamy; howbeit, the Ephori feeing that the City by this means would be dispeopled of Citizens and lie delert, in that very time when as it had more need than ever before of fouldiers, were desirous to devise a policy how to deliver them of this ignominy, and yet notwithstanding preserve the laws in their entire and full force: therefore to bring this about, they elected Agefilaus for their law-giver, to enach new Laws; who being come before the open andience of the City, spake unto them in this manner : Ye men of Lacedamon, I am not willing in any wife to be the author and inventor of new Laws; and as for those which you have already; I mind not to put any thing thereto, to take fro, or otherwise to alter and change them; and therefore methinkesit is meet and reasonable, that from to morrow forward, those which you have should stand in their full vigour, strength, and vertue accustomed. Moreover, as few as there remained in the City; (when Epaminondas was about to affaile it with a great fleet and a violent tempelt (as it were) of Thebans and their Confederates, puffed up with pride for the late victory archieved in the Plaine of Lendres) with tholefew (I say) he put him and his forces back; and cauled them to returne without effect; but in the battell of Mantines, he admonified and advited the Lacedæmonians to take no regard at all of other Thebans, but to bend their whole forces against Epaminondas only, saying, That wise and prudent men alone, and none but they, were valiant and the fole cause of victory; and therefore if they could vanquish him, they might easily subdue all the rest, as being blockish fooles and men indeed of no valour; and so in truth it proved: for when as the victory now enclined wholly unto Epaninondas, and the Lacedemonians week at the very point to be disbanded, dicomfitted, and put to flight as the faid Epaninondas turned for to call his own men together to follow the rout, a Lacedamonian chanced to give him a mortall wound, wherewith he fell to the ground, and the Lacedamonians who were with Agefilau called themfelves, made head againe, and put the victory into doubtfull ballance: for now the Thebanes abated much their courage, and the Lacedamonians tooke the better hearts. Moreover, when the City of Sparta was neare driven and at a low ebbe for money to wage war, as being constrained to entertaine intercenary Souldiers for pay, who were meter strainers? Are fill went into Egypt, being sent for by the King of Egypt to serve as his petitioner; but for that he was meanely and simply apparelled, the inhabitants of the Country despited him, for they looked to have feen the King of Sporta richly arrayed and fet out gallantly, and all gorgeously to be feen in his person like unto the Person King; so soolish a conceit had they of Kings; bur Agrillaus shewed them within a while, that the magnificence and Majesty of Kings was to be acquired by wit, wildome, and valour: for perceiving that those who were to fight with him and to make head a gainst the enemy, were frighted with the imminent perill, by reason of the great humilist of enemies, who were two hundred thouland fighting men, and the small company of their own fide mes, who were two hundred anomaling men, and the mind company of the deviced with himlelle before the battell began, by fome flratagamitos accourage his own men, and to embolden their hearts; which policy of his he would not communicate unto any perior; and this it was; He caused upon the inside of his left hand to be written this word, Victory, backward; which done he tooke at the Priests or Soothlayers hand, who was a fatrifice; 'the liver of the beaft which was killed & put it into the faid left hand thus written within add to held it a good while, making semblance as if he muled deeply of some doubt, and seeming to stand in stiffice and to be in great perplexity, until the characters of the forestid letters had a sufficient time to give a print and leave their marke in the superficies of the liver; then shewed heartune of the with weit to fight on his fide, and gave them to understand that by those characters the gods, promised victory who supposing verily that there was in it a certaine signe and prelage of good fortune, ventured boldly upon the hazard of a battell. And when the enemies had invested and belaguered his Campe round about? Such a mighty number there were of them, and besides had begint totalt a trench on every side thereof, King * Nettanebas (for whose a dad he was thirther come) follicited 'or maake and intreated him to make a fally and charge upon them before the fail drench was fully fulfied, on and both end show to be the side french was fully fulfied, and both ends brought together, hearswered. That he would never impeach the definite and putpose of the enemies, who went (no doubt) to give him theanes to be equal unto them, and to fight fo many to so many: so he stayed untill there wanted but a very little of both ends meeting; and then in that space between he ranged his battell; by which device they encountred and songht with even tones, and on equal hand for number: so he put the enemies to flight, and with those sew foundiers which he had he made a great carnage of them; but of the spoile and boory which he won, he raifed a good round maffe of money, and fent it all to Sparta. Being now ready to embarke for to depart out of Egypt, and upon the point of returne home, he died : and at his death expressy charged those who were about him, that they should make no Image or Statue whatsoever reprefenting the similitude of his personage: Forthat (quoth he) if I have done any vertuous act in my life time, that will be a monument inflicient to eternize my memory; if not, all the images, flatues, and pictures in the world will not ferve the turne, fince they be the works only of mechanicall artificers which are of no worth and estimation.

Age fipolis the fon of Cleombrous, when one related in his presence that Philip King of Macedon had in few daies demolished and razed the City Olimbus: Par di (quoth he) Philip will not be able in many more daies to build the like to it. Another faid unto him by way of reproach, that himfelie (King as he was, and other Citizens men grown of middle age) were delivered as hoftages, and neither their children nor wives: Good reason (quothhe) and so it ought to be according to juffice, that we out selves, and no others, should beare the blame and paine of our faults. And when he was minded to fend for certain dog-whelps from home; one faid unto him; that there might not be suffered any of them to go out of the Countrey: No more was it permitted heretofore (quoth he) for men be to lead forth, but now it is allowed well enough

Agesipolis the son of Pausanias (when as the Athenians laid to him, That they were content to report themselves to the judgement of the Megarians as touching certaine variances and differences between them, and complaints which they made one against another) spake thus unto them: Why my Masters of Athens, this were a great shame indeed, that they who are the chiefe and the very leaders of all other Greeks, should lesse skill what is just than the Megarians. Agus the son of Archidamus, at what time as the Ephorispake thus unto him: Take with youthe young and able men of this City, and go into the countrey of such an one, for he will conduct you his own felfe, as far as to the very Castle of his City: And what reason is it (quoth he) my Masters, you that be Ephori, to commit the lives of formany lufty gallants into his hands, who is a traitor to his native country? One demanded of him what science was principally exercised in the City of Sparta: Mary (quoth he) the knowledge how to obey and how to rule. He was wont to fay, that the Lacedæmonians never asked, how many their enemies were? but where they were. Being for bidden to fight with his enemies at the battell of Mantinea, because they were far more in number: He must of necessity (quoth he) fight with many that would have the command and rule of many. Unto another who asked what number there might be in all of the Lacedamonians? As many (quoth he) as are enough to chase and drive away wicked persons. In passing along the walls of Corinth, when he faw them so high, so well built, and so large in extent: What (b) manner of women (quoth he) bethey that inhabit within: To a great Master of Rhetorick, who, praising his own skill and profession, chanced to conclude with these words; when all is done, there is nothing so puissant as the speech of man: Why then belike (quoth he) folong assign having been once already beaten and defeated, returned neverthelesse into the field and showed themselves in a bravado more gallantly than before, and press for a new battell: and when the rupon he faw his auxiliaries and confederates to be somewhat troubled and frighted: Be of good cheere (quoth he) my masters and friends, for if we, who have given them the foile be affraid, what thinke you are they themselves. A certaine Embassadour from the City Abdera, came to Sparia, who made a long speech as touching his message, and after he had done, and held his tongue a little, he demanded at last a dispatch, and said unto him: Sir, what answer would you that I should carry back to our Gi tizens: You shall lay unto them (quoth Agis) that I have suffered you to speak all that you would, and as long as you lift? And that I lent you mine eare all the while without giving you one word againe. Some there were who commended the Eliens for most just men and precise in observing the folemnity of the Olympickgames: And is that fo great a matter and such a wonder (quoth he) if in five yeares space they exercise justice one day? Some buzzed into his eares that those of the other royall house envied him: Then (quoth he) do they suffer a double paine; for first and formost their own evils will vexe and trouble themselves; then in the second place, the good things in me and my friends will torment them. Some one there was of advice, that he should give way and passage to his enemies when they were put to flight: Yea, but marke this (quoth he jif we let not upon them who run away for cowardie how shall we fight against them that say and make good sheir ground by valour? One there was who propounded a meanes for the maintenance of the Greekes liberty; which (no doubt) was a generous and magnanimous course, howbeit very hard to execute; unto whom he answered thus: My good friend, your words require great store of money, and much strength. When another said that King Philip would watch them well enough that they should not let foot within other parts of Greece: My friend (quoth he) it shall content us to remaine and continue in our own countrey. There was another Embassadour from the City Perinthus came to Lacedamon, who having likewise made along oration, in the end demanded of Agis what answer he should deliver back to the Perinthians: Mary what other but this (quoth he) that thou couldest hardly find the way to make an end of fpeaking, and I held my peace all the while. He went up-on a time fole Embassadour to King Philip, who said unto him, You are an Embassadour alone indeed: True (quoth he) and good enough to one alone as you are. An ancient Citizen of Sparta faid unto him one day, being himselse aged also, and far stept in yeares: Since that the old Lawes and Customes went every day to ruine and were neglected, seeing also that others far worse were brought in and flood in their place, all in the end would be naught and run to confusion i unto whom he answered merrily thus: Then is it as it should be, and the world goes well enough if it be so as you say; For I remember when I was a little boy, I heard my father say, that every thing then was turned upfide down, and that in his remembrance all went kim kam; and he also would report of his father that he had feen as much in his dayes; no marvell therefore if things grow worse and worse; m ore wonder it were if they should one while be better, and another while continue still in the same plight. Being asked on a time how a man might continue free all his life time; he answered : By despising death.

Agis the younger, when Demades the orator faid unto him: That the Lacedamonians swords were to short that these juglers and those that play legerdemain, could swallow them down all at once; made him this answer: As short as they be the Lacedamonians can reach their enemies with them well enough. A certain leud fellow and a troublefome, never linned asking him, who was the best man in Sparia: Marry (quoth Agis) even he who is unlikest thy selfe.

Agis, the last king of the Lacedamonians, being forelaid and suprised by trechery, so that he was condemned by the Ephorito die; as he was led without forme of law and justice to the place of execution for to be strangled with a rope, perceiving one of his servants and ministers to shed teares; said thus unto him; Weepe not for my death; for in dying thus unjustly and against the order of law, I am in better case than these that put me to death; and having said these words. he willingly put his neck within the halter.

Acroratus, when as his own father and mother requested his helping hand for to effect a thing contrary to reason and justice, staied their suit for a time: but seeing that thy importuned him still and were very instant with him; in the end he said unto them So long as I was under your hands. I had no knowledge nor ience at all of julice; but after that you had betaken me to the commonweale, to my countrey, and to the lawes thereof; and by that means informed and infinited me in what you could in righteousness and honesty. I will endeavour and strain my selfe to sollow the faid instruction and not you; and for that I know full well that you would have me do that which is good, and confidering that those things be best (both for a private person, and much more for him who is in authority and a chiefe magistrate) which are just; sure I will do what you would have me, and refute that which you say unto me.

Alcamenes the ion of Teleclus, when one would needs know of him, by what meanes a man might preferve a kingdome best, made this answer: Even by making no account at all of lucre and gain. Another demanded of him wherefore he would never accept and receive the gifts of the Messenians? Forsooth (quoth he) because if I had taken them, I should never have had peace with the lawes. And when a third personsaid: That he marvelled much how he could live so ftraight and neer to himselfe, considering he had wherewith and enough: It is (quoth he) a commendable thing, when a man having sufficient and plenty can nevertheless live within the compals of reason, and not according to the large reach of his appetite.

Alexandridas the son of Leon, seeing one to torment himselfe, and taking on desperately because he was banished out of his native country: My friend (quoth he) never fare so for the matter nor vex thy heart so much, for being constrained to remove so far from thy country, but rather for being i so remote from justice. Unto another who in delivering good matter unto the Ephori, and to very great purpose, but in more words a great deale than need was: My friend (quoth he) i A min thou speakest indeed that which becometh, but otherwise than is becomming. One asked him ought to why the Lacedemonians committed the charge of all their lands unto the Ilotes their flaves, and grieve did not husband and tend them their own felves: Because (quoth he) we conquered and purchased commit-them, for that we would look to our selves, and not tend them. Unto another who held that it the fin, was nothing but defire of credit and reputation that undid men, and who loever could be delivered than for from the care thereof were happy; he replied thus again: If it be true that you fay, we must confess being care and grant that wicked men, who do wrong unto others are happy; for how can a church-robber or thief who spoileth other men of their goods be desirous of honour and glory? When another demanded of him, how it came to pass that the Lacedamonians were so hardy and resolute in all occurrences and dangers of war, he rendred this reason: Because (quoth he) we study and endeavor to have a reverend regard of our lives, and not to entercain the lear of our lives, as others do. It was demanded of him, wherefore the Seniors or Elders fat many dayes in deciding and judging criminall cautes? and why albeit the accused party were by them acquit, yet he continued nevertheless in the state of a guilty and accused person? As for the Senatours (quoth he) they be long in deciding capitall matters, where men are brought in question for their life; because those judges who have committed an errour in condemning a man to die, can never rectify and amend that sentence: and as to the party absolved and enlarged, he must remain alwayes liable and subject to the law, because they might ever after enquire and judge better of his fact according to the Anaxander the son of Eutycrates, being asked the question why he and such other did not gather mony and lay it up in the publick treasury, made this answer: For fear lest we being keepers thereof, should be corrupted and perverted thereby.

Anaxilas, unto one who marvelled why the Ephori role not up and made abeilance to the kings, confidering that by the kings they were ordained and put into that place? gave this reason

Even because they are created Ephori, that is to say, overseers and controllers of them.

Androclidas the Laconian, being maimed and lame of a leg, would nevertheless be enrolled in the number of those who were to serve in the wars; and when some withstood him because he was impotent of that leg: Why my masters (quoth he) theybe nor the men of good footmanship, who can run away, but fuch as stand their ground, that must fight with enemies, Antalcidas making means to be admitted into the confraternity of the Samothracian religion.

when the prieft his confessour, in houseling and shriving him, demanded which was the greatest fin that ever he had committed in all his life? If (quoth he) I have committed any fin all my life time, the gods know the same well enough themselves. When a certain Athenian miscalled the Lacedamonians, terming them ignorant and unlearned fors: Indeed (quoth he) we only of all the Grecians, are the men which have not learned of you to do ill. And when another Athenian bragged, and faid : We have chased you many times from the river Cephifus: But we(quoth he) never yet drave you from the river Eurotas. Unto another, who was defirous to know how one might pleate men best, he shaped this answer: In case he speak alwayes that which pleaseth, and do that which profiteth them. A certain great master and professour of Rhetorick, would needs one day rehearle and pronource before him an oration composed in the praise of Hercules And who ever (quoth he) dispraised him? And unto Agesslaus, being fore wounded in a battel by the Thebans; Nay (quoth he) you are well enough served and receive a due Minervall for your schoolage at the Thebans hands, whom you have raught even against their wills that which they knew not, nor were willing to learn, to wit, for to fight: for in truth, by meanes of the continual incursions and expetions that Agefilans made against them, they became valiant warriours. Himselfe was wont to fay: That the walles of Sparra, were their young men; and their confines, the heads of their pikes. Unto ano ther, who demanded why the Lacedamonians fought with such short curtelaxes: To the end (quoth he) that we might cope and close more necrely to our enemies. Antiochustbeing one of the Ephori, heard say that king Philip had bestowed upon the Messenians certain lands for their territory: But hath Philip (quoth he) given them withall, forces to be able for to defend the same?

Arigens, when some there were that highly commended certain dames, not their own wives, but wedded to other men: By the gods (quoth he) of good, honest, and faire women, there ought no vaine speeches to be made, for that indeed they are not known of any other but their husbands who live ordinarily with them. As he passed once through the city Selinus in Sicily, he chanced to read this epitaph engraven upon a sepucher or tomb;

Thefemen before Selinus gates were flain in blondy fight, As whilem they sought for to quench the lawless tyrants might.

And well deserved you(quoth he) to die, for seeking to extinguish tyranny when it burneth out of a light fire; for clean contrariwife, you should have kept it from burning altogether.

Ariston hearing one praise and discourse of a sentence that king Cleomenes was wont to use, at what time as the question was asked : What was the office of a good king? Mary evento do good unto his friends and hurt unto his enemies: But how much better (answered Arifton) my good friend, were it to benefit friends indeed, and of enemies to make good friends? but of this notable sentence, no doubt, Socrates was the authour, and upon him it is rightly fathered. Also when one demanded of him how many in number the Lacedæmonians were: As many (quoth he) as be fufficient to chase away their enemies, A certain Athenian pronounced a funerall oration which he had penned in the praise of their own citizens, who had been defeated and were flain by the Lacedamonians in a battel; If your countrymen (quoth he) were so valiant as you say, what think you then of ours, who vanquished them? When one praised Charilaus upon a time, for that he shewed himselse courteous indifferently to all men And how can he deserve (quoth Ariston) to be commended, who is kind and friendly to wicked persons? Another reproved Hecateus a professor in Rhetorick, who being invited to eat with them at their feafts which they call Syfficia, spake never a word all dinner time; unto whom he made this answer: It seemeth that you are ignorant, that he who knoweth how to speak well, can skill likewise of the time when it is good to speak and Archidamus the son of Zeuxidamus, when one asked him who they were that governed the city Sparta? answered: The lawes first, and then the magistrates, who ruled according to those lawes. When he heard one praising exceedingly a player on the harp, and for his skill in musick having him in fingular admiration: My friend (quoth he) what honourable reward shall they have at your hands, who be men of prowesse and valour, when you commend so highly an harper? Another recommended unto him a musician and said: Oh, what an excellent chanter is there? This is (quoth he)even as much as a good cooke or maker of pottage among us: meaning that there was no difference at all between giving pleasure by sound of voice or instruments and the dressing of viands or feafoning fewes. One promifed to give him wine that was very fweet and pleafant: And to what purpole? (quoth he) confidering that it serveth but for to draw on more wine, and to make folk drink the rather; and befides, to cause men to be less valiant and unfit for any good things-Lying at fiege before the city of Corinth, he marked how there were hares started even close under the walls thereof; upon which fight he said thus to those that served with him: Our enemies are easse to be surprised and caught, when they are so lazie and idle, as to suffer haresto lie and harbour hard under their city walls, even within the trench and town-ditch. He had been chosen an umpire between two parties who were at variance, for to make them friends; and he led them both into the temple of Diana furnamed Chalceacos, where he willed them both to promise and swear, laying their hands upon the altar of that goddeis, that they would both twain observe from point to point whatfoever he should award; which they undertooke to do, and bound it with an oath accordingly; I judge them (quoth he) that neither of you both shall depart out of this temple, before you have made an attonment, and pacified all quarrels between you. Dienyfius the tyrant of Sicily, had fent unto his daughters certain rich robes to wear, but he rejused them, and faid: I greatly fear that when they have this raiment upon them, they will feem more foule and ilfavoured than now they do. Seeing his own fon in a battel, fighting desperately against the Athenians: Either (quoth he) augment thy frength, or abate thy courage.

Archidamus the son of Agesilaus, when king Philipaster the battle which he had won against the Greeks, neer unto Cheronea, wrot unto him a rough and sharp letter; returned unto him back again this answer in writing: If you take measure now of your own shadow, you shall findeit no bigger than it was before in victory. Being demanded the question upon a time how far the territory of the Lacedamonians did extend? he answered: Even as far as they can reach with their javelins. Periander the Physician was a sufficient manin his art, and esteemed with the best and most excellent, howbeit he wrote in verse, but with a bad grace; unto whom he said one day thus: Imarvell much Periander whether you would be named an ill poet, or to be a good physician? In the war which the Lacedamonians made against king Philip, some gave him countell to be well advised where he fought, and to joine battel as far as he could from his own country, unto whom he replied again: This is not the thing (quoth he) that we ought to regard, but rather to confider and think upon this, how we may quit our selves to well in fight, that we be winners in the end. And to those who praised him for that he had won a field of the Arcadians, he made this answer: It had been better that we had overcome them rather in wisdome and prudence than in might and force. About the time that he entred by force and armes into the country of Arcadia, being advertifed that the Eleans fent aid and inccour unto the Arcadians, he wrot unto them in this fort; Archidamus to the Eleans, greeting: A bleffed thing it is to be quiet and at repose. When the confederate and allied nations in the Peloponnesiack war demanded how much mony would serve for the defraying of the charges to the faid war belonging? and requested him to tax each one how much they should contribute: War (quoth he) knoweth no sum, and is not waged at any certain rate. Seeing a fhor which was levelled from an engine of battery newly brought out of Sicily: O Hercules (quoth he) now is mans proweffe gone for ever. And for that the Greeks would not give credit and be periwaded by him, to performe those conditions of peace which had been made with Antigonus and Craterus, two Macedonians, for to live in their ancient liberty; alledging that the Lacedæmonians would be lords more rigorous and insupportable than the Macedonians: the sheep (quoth he) hath alwayes one and the fame voice; but man changeth it oftentimes in divers forts, untill he have brought about and finished his detignes.

Assuration when one said, after that king Asis had lost the field to Antisonus, about the city * or Anti-Megale; O poore Lacedemonians, what will you do now? will you become slaves to the Mace-pater. donians? answered thus: And why so? Can * Ansigonus forbid and let us, but we will die in Bias being surprised by an ambush, which was laid for him by Iphicrates captain of the Athenians, when his fouldiers faid: Now captain what is to be done? What elle (quoth he) but to advise you to fave your felves, and to relolve my felfe to die in fight. Brasidas sound among dried sigs a mouse that bit him by the hand, so as he was glad to let her go, whereupon he said unto those that were present: Lo, how there is not the least creature that may be but it is ableto make shift and save it's life in case it have but the heart to desend it selse. against those who assaile it? In a certain skirmish he was wounded with a javelin through his buckler, and when he had drawn the head out of his body, with the very same weapon he slew his enemy who had hurt him : and to those who asked him how he came so wounded? he answered thus? Because my buckler deserved me. When he put himselfe into his journy to the warres, he wrot thus unto the Ephori: All that is requifite for this war as touching the war, do I will to my power or die for it. After he had lost his life in the quarrell of delivering the Greeks out of servitude who inhabit in Thracia, the embassadours which were fent from those parts to give thanks unto the Lacedamonians, went to vilite his mother Argileonis; of whom the demanded first, whether her fon Brasidas died mansully or no? And when the Thracian embassadours highly praised him infomuch as they faid, that he had not left his fellow behind him : Oh (quoth five) you are much deceived my friends; Brafidas was indeed a valiant and hardy man, but there be in Sparta many more far Damonidas hapned to be placed last in the dance by him who was themaster chorister; whereat he was no otherwise displeased , but said thus unto him: Well done, for thou hast found the means to make this place honourable, which heretofore was but base and infamous.

Damis, when letters had been written unto him as touching Alexander the great, namely, how Alexander by their suffrages was declared a god; wrot back in this wife: We grant that Alexander should be called a god since he will needs have it so.

Damindas, when king Philip was entred with a main army unto Peloponnesus, whereupon one faid unto him: The Lacedamonians are in danger to fuffer many calamities, unless they can make means to agree and compound with him: Thou womanish-man (quoth he) how can he bring us to fuffer any miferies, confidering that we make no reckoning at all of death.

Dercilidas was sent embassadour unto King Pyrrhus, what time as he had his army encamped upon the very confines of Sparea: and Pyrrhus enjoyned the Lacedamonians to receive again their King Cleonimus whom they had banished, or else he would make them to understand, that they were no more valiant than other men supon whom Dercilidas thus replied: If you be a god we feare you not, because we have no way offended you, but if you be a man, know you that you are no whit better than we.

Demaratus talked and communed one day with Orontes, who gave him blunt speeches and hard words; and when one who heard their talk, faid afterwards: Orontes is very bold with you, and uleth you but homely O Demaratus: Nay (quoth he) he hath nothing faulted to me-ward; for those who glose and flatter in all their speech, be they who do most harme, and not such as speak upon ill will and malice. One seemed to demand of him, wherefore at Spartathose were noted with infamy, who in a discomfiture threw away their bucklers, and not they who cast from them their morrions, cuiraces or breaft-plates: Because (quoth he) these armours and head-rie-ces, serve only for those who wear them; but their shields and bucklers, have their use also for the common strength of the whole battalion. When he heard a certain musician sing: Believe me (quoth he) the fellow plaies the fool very well. He was upon a time in a great company and alfembly, where he continued a long while and spake never a word; by occasion whereof one said unto him: Is it for folly and want of matter to talk of, that you are so silent? How can it be folly (quoth he) for a fool can never hold his peace? One asked of him what was the cause he was banithed out of Sparta, being king thereof? Because (quoth he) the lawes there be mistresses and command all. A certain Pethan by continuall gifts had inveigled and gottenfrom him in the end a young boy whom he loved, and afterwards in manner of a forn faid unto him: I have so well hun-ted, that at last I have caught your love: Not so (quoth he) I swear by the gods, but rather you have bought it. A certain gentleman of Perfia there was, who had rebelled against the king of Perfia; but Demaratus by reasons and remonstrances so wrought with him, that he perswaded him to yeeld and returne again to his allegiance; the king incontinently minded to put this Persian to death; but Demaratus diverted him and faid: Sir, this were an utter shame for you, if when you could not punish him for rebellion being your enemy you should proceed to his execution now, when he is become again your servitor and friend. There was a certain jester and parasite who used to play his part at the kings table; and gave unto Demaratus estsoones, biting quips, and taunts by way of reproach for his exile; but he answered him and said: Good fellow, I am not disposed to fight with thee now at this time, being put as I am out of my biass and the raunge of my life, and having lost my standing.

*Emercept the Ephorus, cut two strings of the nine with an hatchet, in Physics his harp, faying withall: Then marre not mulick.

Epaenetus was wont to say: That liers were the cause of all offences and crimes in the world. Emboidas hearing some to praise another mans wife, reproved him for it, and said: That strangers who were not of the house, ought not in any respect to speak of the behaviour and manners of any dame. Endamidas the son of Archi damus and brother to Agis, having espied Xenocrates, a man well striken in yeers studying philosophy hard, with other young schollers in the Academie, demanded what old man that might be: one standing by, answered, that he was a wife man and a great clerk, one of those who sought after vertue: If he be still seeking of it (quoth he) when will he use and practifeit? Having heard a Phlosopher dispute and discourse upon his paradox: That there was no good captain in war, but the great clerk and learned Sage only: This is (quoth he) a strange proposition and a wonderfull, but the best is, he that maintaineth it, is in no wise to be credited, for his years were never yet acquainted to much as with the found of a trumpet. He came one day into the openichool or auditory to hear Kenscrates discourse at large upon some question; but it fell out so, that he had new done when he entred into the place: then one of his company beganto fay, Surely, so soone aswe were present, he became silent: He did well (quoth Eudamidas) if he had made an end of that which he had to fay:but when the other replied : It were not amis yet that you heard him & that he would fet to it again: If we (quoth Endamidas) should go to visit a man in his house who had supped already before we came, were it well done of us to pray him to go to a new supper for the love of us? It was once demanded of him why he alone would seem to approve rett, quietnesse and peace, considering that all his fellow-citizens with one consent were of opinion to take armes and make war upon the Macedonians? It is (quoth he) because I neither need nor am desirous to convince them of their earour and lying. Another for to animate him to this war, alledged the prowesses and worthy exploits atchieved by them at other times against the Persians: Me thinks (quoth he) you know not what you say, namely, that because we have overcome a thousand sheep, we should therefore setupon fifty wolves. He was upon a time in place to hear a musician sing, who did his part very well; and one asked him how he liked the man, and what he thought of him? Mary (quoth he) I take him to be a great amuser of men in a small matter. When another highly extolled the city of Athens in his presence: And who can jultly and duly (quoth he) praise that city which no man ever loved, for being made better in it? When Alexander the great had cauled open proclamation to be made in the great assembly at the Olympick games: That all banished persons might returne unto their own countries, except the Thebanes: Behold (quoth Eudamidus) here is a Wofull proclamation for you that be Thebans; howbeit honourable withall, for it is a figue that Alexander feareth none but you in all Greece. A certaine citizen of Argos faid one day in his hearing: That the Lacedamonians after they be gone once out of their own country, and from the obeliance of their lawes, prove worle for their travelling abroad in the world : But it is contrary with you that be Argives and other Greeks (quoth he) for being come once into our city Sparta, you are not the worfe, but prove the better by that means. It was demanded of him what the realon might be, wherefore they used to factifice unto the Muses before they did hazard a battel: To the end (quoth he) that our valiant acts might be well and worthily written.

Eurycratidas the ion of Anaxandrides, when one asked him why the Ephori fat every day to decide and judge of contracts between men: for that (quoth he) we should learn to keep our faith-and truth even among our enemies.

Zeuxidamus likewise answered unto one who demanded of him why the statutes and ordinances of prowels and martiall fortitude, were not reduced into a book, and given in writing unto young men for to read? Becaule (quoth he) we would have them to be acquainted with deeds and not with writings. A certain Actolian faid: That war was better than peace, unto those who were defitous to flew themselves valorous men [And not war only (quoth he) for by the gods, in that respect better is death thanlife.

Herondas chanced to be at Athens, what time as one of the citizens was apprehended, araign'd, and condemned for his idleness, judicially and by forme of law; which when he understood, and heard a brute and noise about him, he requested one to shew him the party that was condemned for a gentlemans life.

Thearidas whetted his sword upon a time, and when one asked him if it were sharp, he answered: Yea, sharper than a slanderous calumniation.

Themisteas being a prophet or southfaier foretold unto king Leomdas the discomfigure that should happen within the passe or streights of Thermopple, with the losse both of himselse and also of his whole army: whereupon being fent away by Leonidas unto Lacedamon, under a colour and pretence to enforme them of these surre accidents; but in truth, to the end that he should not miscary and die there with the rest; he would not so do, neither could he forbear but say unto Leonidas; I was fent hither for a warrior to fight, and not as an ordinary courrier and messenger to carry newes be-

Theopympus when one demanded of him how a king might preferve his kingdome and roiall estate in lafety ? laid thus : By giving his friends liberty to speake the truth, and with all his power by keeping his subjects from oppression. Unto a stranger who told him that in his own country and among his citizens he was commonly furnamed Philolacon, that is to fay, a lover of the Lacomans: It were better (quoth he) that you were called * Philopolites than Philolacon. Another Embaffadour came from Elis, who faid: That he was fent from his fellow-citizens, because he only of all that city loved and followed the Laconick manner of life; of him Theopompus demanded: And whether is thine or the other citizens life the better? he answered, Mine, Why then (quoth he) how is it possible that a city should continue safe, in which there being so great a number of inhabitants, there is but one good man? There was one faid before him, that the city of Sparta maintained the state thereof entire, for that the kings there knew how to govern well: Nay (quoth he I not so much therefore, as because the citizens there can skill how to obey well. The inhabitants of the city Pyle, decreed for him in their generall councell exceeding great honours; unto whom he wrote back again: That moderate honours time is wont to augment, but immoderate to diminish and wear away

Therycion returning from the city Delphos, found king Philip encamped within thestreight of Pelaponnesus, where he had gained the natrow passage called Ishmos, upon which the city of Corinth is seated; whereupon he said, Peleponnesus hath but bad porters and warders of you, Corinthians.

The camenes being by the Ephori condemned to death, went from the judgement place imiling away; and when one that was prefent asked him, it he delpifed the lawes and judicial proceedings of Sp. 21.4? No iwis (quoth he) but I rejoice hereat, that they have condemned me in that fine which I am able to pay and discharge fully, without borrowing of any friend, or taking Hippodames, as Agis was with Archidamus in the camp, being fent with Agis by the king unto Sparta, for to provide for the affaires of weale publick and to looke unto the State; refuled to go, saying: I cannot die a more honourable death, than in sighting valiantly for the desence of Sparta: now was he fourscore yeers old and upward, and tooke armes, where he ranged himselfe on the right hand of the king, and there, fighting by his fide right manfully, was flain.

Hippocratidas, when a certain prince or great ford of Caria had written unto him, that he had in his hands a Lacedamonian, who having been privy unto a conspiracy and treason intended against his perion, revealed not the same; demanding withall, his countell whathe should do with him; wrote back again in this wife: if you have heretofore done him any great pleasure and good turne; put him to death hardly and make him away; if not, expell him out of your country, confidering he is a base fellow uncapable altogether of vertue. He chanced to encounter upon the way a young boy, after whom followed one who loved him; and the boy blushed for shame; whereupon he laid unto him: Thou oughtest to go in their company my boy with whom thou being feen, needest notto change colour for the matter.

Callier stidus being admirall of a fleet, when the friends of Lylander requested him to pleasure them in killing some of their enemies; & in consideration thereof he should receive of them fiftyta lents; not withflanding he flood then in very great need of mony for tobuy victuals for the mariners, yet would not he grant their request; and when Cleander, one of his couniell, said unto him: I would (I trow, if I were in your place) take the offer: So would I also (quoth he) if I were in yours. Being come to Sardis unto Cyrus the younger, who at that time was an allie and confederate of the Lacedamonians, to see if he could speed himselse of him with mony for to enterain mariners and maintain the armada; the first day begave him to understand that he was thither come to speak with him; but, answer was made: That the king was at the table drinking: Well (quoth he) I will give attendance until he have made an end of his beaver: after he had waited a long time, and faw that it was impossible to have audience that day, he departed out of the court for that time, being thought very rude and uncivill in fodoing: the morrow after, when likewise he was given to understand that he was drinking again, and that he would not come abroad that day; he made no more adoe, but returned to Ephofu, from whence he came, faying with all, That he ought not fo far forth to take pains to be provided of mony, as to do any thing unfeeming Sparta: and befides, he fell a curfing those who were the first that endure such indenity, as to subject themselves unto the insolency of Barbarians, and who taught them to abuse their riches, and thereby to shew themselves so proud and dildainfull, as to insult over others; yea, and he fware aigreat oath in the presence of those who were in his company, that as soone as he was returned to Spara he would labour with all his might and main, to reconcile the Greek nations one unto another to the end that they might be more dread and terrible unto the Barbarians, when they stood in no need of their forces to wage war one upon another. It was demanded of him, what kind of men the Ionians were? Good flaves they are (quoth he) but bad free-men. When Cyrus in the end had fent mony for to pay the fouldiers wages, and befides fome gifts and presents particularly to himselfe; he received only the foresaid pay, but as for the gitts, he sent them back again, faying: That he had no need of any private or particular amity with Cyrm, fo commonfriendship which he had with all the Lacedamonians pertained also unto him. A little before he gavethe battelat sea, neer unto Arginusie, his Pilot laid unto him: That it was best for him to fail away, for that the gallies of the Athenians were far more in number than theirs: And what of all that (quoth he) is it not a shamefull infamy, and hurtfull befides to Sparta, for to flie? fimply, best it is to tary by it, and either to win, or die for it. Being at the point to encounter and joyn medley, & having facrificed unto the gods, the fouthfayer shewed unto him that the entrails of that beaft fignified and promifed affured victory unto the army, but death unto the Captain; whereas he was nothing danted nor affrighted, but faid: The state of Sparta lieth not in one man, for when I am dead my country will be never the less; but if I should recule now, and yeeld unto the enemies like will be much impaired, and lose her reputation. Thus having substituted Cleander in his place, if ought should happen otherwise than well, he gave the charge, and stroke a navall battel, wherein fighting valiantly he ended his life.

Cleombrotus the son of Pausanias, when a certain friend a stranger, debated and reasoned with his father about vertue, he said unto him: In this point at least-wise is my father before you for that he hath already begotten a fon, and you none.

Cleomenes the fon of Anaxandrides, was wont to fay, That Homer was the Poet of the Lacedamonians, because he taught how to make war; but Hesiodus the Poet of the Ilots, for that he wrot of agriculture and husbandry. He had made truce for seven dayes with the Argives; and the third night after it began, perceiving that the Argives upon the assurance and confidence of the faid truce were suddenly asleep, he charged upon them, slew some, and tooke others prisoners; and when he was reproached therefore, and namely, that he hand broken his oath; he answered: That he never sware to observe truce in the night season, but in the day-time only; and besides, what annoiance foever a man did unto his enemies (in what fort it made no matter) he was to think that before God and man it was a point above justice, and in no wife liable and subject unto it : howbeir, for this perjury of his and breaking of covenant, he was disappointed and frustrated or his hope and defigne, which was to surprise the city of Argos, for that indeed the very women took thole armes which in memoriall of ancient victories were hung and fet up fast in their temples, with which they repelled them from the walles: infomuch as he took a knife, and flit his body from the very ancles up to the principle and noble vitall parts, and so laughing and scoffing, he left his life. His very fourthfaier would have diffwaded and diverted him from leading his forces against Argos, saying: That his return from thence would be dishonourable and infamous: and when he presented his power before the city, he found the gates fast shut against them, and the woman in armes upon the walles: How think you (quoth he) now, do you uppose this a dishonourable returne, when as the women, after all the men are dead are faine to keep the gates fast locked? When the Argives abused him with reproachfull tearms, calling him a perjured and godless perion: Well (quoth he) it is in you to miscall me and raile upon me as you do, in word; but it is in me to plague and mischief you indeed. Unto the ambassadours of Samos, who came to move and sollicit him for to war upon the tyrant Polycrates, and to that effect, used long speeches and perswasions, he answered thus : As touching that point which you spake of in the beginning of your oration, it is out of my head now, and I remember it not; in which regard also I do not well conceive the middie part of your speech; but as for that which you delivered in the latter end, I mislike it altogether. There was in his time a notable rover or pirat, who made roads into the land, and spoiled the coalts of Laconia, but at the last he was intercepted and taken; now being examined and demanded why he robbed in this fort? I had not wherewith (quoth he) to maintain and keep my fouldiers about me, and therefore I came to those who had it, and knowing that they would give me nothing freely and by fair meanes, I affaied to get somewhat from them by force and strong hand: Naughtiness I lee well (quoth he) goeth the neerest way to work. There was a lewd villain, who did nothing but revile and miscall him: Thouseemest (quoth he)to go up and down railing upon every man, to the end that being amuled how to answer those thy slanders and imputations, we might have no time nor leafure to charge thee with thy wickednels and lay open thy vices. When one of his subects said unto him: That a good king ought alwayes and in every thing to be mild and gratious: Not so (quoth he) lest he grow thereby despised and contemptible. Being fore handled with a long and tedious malady, and not knowing whatto do, he put himselfe at last into the hands of forcerers, enchanters, wifards and jacrificers, unto whom he was wont never to give any credit before; wherear when one of his familiar friends marvelled much, he faid unto him: wherefore wonder you at the matter? for I am not the man that heretofore I was, but much changed by fickness; and as I am not the same, so I do not like and allow of things which I did in times past. There was agreat professor of Rhetorick, who took upon him in his presence to discourse at large of prowess and valour, whereat he began to laugh a good; and when the party laid unto him: Why laugh you to hear a manspeak of valiance, especially being as you are a king? My good friend (quoth he) because if a swallow should talke as you have don, I would do as you do; mary if araudyou had been an eagle. I should have been filent haply and held my peace. The Argives made 2500. their boalt and vaunted that in a fecond battel they had recovered the lofs which they fulfained in a former: I wonder much at that (quoth he) if by the addition* of two syllables only, you are proved better men now than earst you were. When one reproached him in loule tearns, slying:

You are a great spender Cleomenes and a voluptuous person: Better it is yet (quoth he) so to be, than unjust as you are, who being wealthy enough, are yet coverous, and get your goods by undue and indirect means. There was one who recommended a mulician unto him, and in truth prailed the man in many respects; but among the rest of his excellent voice, saying: he was the best singer in all Greece: but Gleomenes pointing with his finger to one hard by: Lo(quoth he) here is a passing good cock of mine, and namely at making of broth he hath no fellow. Menander the Tyrant of Samos, upon the comming and invasion of the Perlians, fled into the city of Sparia, where he shewed unto Cleomenes al the gold and filver which he had brought with him, praying him to take what he would of it; none would he receive at his hand, but fearing left he would fasten some of that treasure upon other citizens, to the Ephori he went and said thus unto them: It were better for Sparce, if this Samian guest of mine were sent out of Peloponnesus, for searce he induce and millead some one of the Spartans to be naught: the Ephori no sooner heard this advertiss ent of his but the very same day by open proclamation banished him out of the country, One demanded of him upon a time, and faid: Why having to often vanquished the Argives warring upon you, have ye not rooted them out clean? Neither will we ever so doe (quoth he) for we would have our young men alwayes to be kept occupied and in exercife: and when another asked him why the Spartans never confectated unto the gods the armours which they had despoiled their enemies of? Because (quoth he) they be the spoiles of cowards; for those armes which have been taken from such as held them cowardly, it is not meet either to shew unto young men, or to dedicate unto the gods. Cliomenes the fon of Cleombrotus, when one gave him certain cocks of game which were very eager and hot in fight, saying: That they would in combat for a victory, die in the very place: Nay (quoth he) give me those rather that kill them; for surely such must needs be better than thefe.

Laborus unto one who made a long discourse besore him he said: To what purpose makest thou such great preambles and prologues for so small a matter? words I tell thee must be consens to Leotychidae the first of that name, when one hit him in the teeth that he was inconstant and mutable : If I change (quoth he) it is in regard of the times which do after and be divers; and not as you do, who alter ever and anon upon your own naughtiness. Unto another who asked him how a man might best keep his goods that presently he enjoyed: he answered: By not committing them all at once unto fortune. It was demanded of him once, what it was that young gentlemen of noble houses ought to learn: Even that (quoth he) which will do them good another day, when they be men gorwn. Laftly, when one would needs know of him the reason why the Spartanes drank so little: Because (quoth he) others should not consult of us, but we of others.

Leagehidas the son of Arison, when one brought him word that the sonnes of Demaratus gave our very hard speeches of him: By the gods (quoth he) I nothing marveli thereat; for there is not one of them all that can afford any man a good word. There chanced to be a sterpent seen, which claiped round about the key or bolt of the gate next unto him; which sight the louthsiyets pronounced to be prodigious and a great wonder: Why (quoth he) this seemeth not one any monstrous or strange thing, that a serpent should winde about a key or bolt; but surely it were a marvelous matter indeed, if the key or bolt should be wound about the serpent. There was a factificer or priest named Philippus, who inducted & professed men in the ceremonial religion of Orphesics and so extream poor he was that he begged for his livings shows the went about and liad; that thoie who by his hand were admitted into those ceremonies, should be happy after their death: Fool that thou art (quoth he) why dost not thou thy selfe die quickly, to the end that thou may est easter to lament and bewail thine own misery and poverty.

Leon the son of Eucratidas, being asked in what city a man might dwell most safely? answered thus: Even in that, whereof the inhabitants are not richer or poorer one than another; and wherein justice doth prevail, and injustice is of no force. When he saw certain runners prepare to runa a course for the prize in the race at the solemn Olympick games, and marked how they espied all means possible to catch and win some advantage of their concurrents: See (quoth he) how much more sludious these runners are of swiftness than or rightconsiness. And when one happed to discounse out of time and place, of things very good and profitable: My good friend (quoth he) not him, your matter is honest and seemly, but your manner of handling it is bad and unseemly.

Leonidas the ion of Anaxandridas, and brother to Cleomenes; when one faid unto him: There was no difference between you and us before you were a king: Yes Iwis good Sir (quoth he) for if I had not been better than you, I had never been king. When his wife, named Gorgo, at what time as he took his leave of her and went forth to fight with the Persians in the pass of Thermopyla, asked of him whether he had ought else to command her? Nothing (quoth he but this, that thou be wedded again unto honest men and bring them good children. When the Ephori said unto him, that he led a small number forth with him to the foresaid straights of Thermopyla: True (quoth he) but yet enough for that service which we go for. And when they enquired of him again, and faid: Why fir, entend you any other defigne and enterprise? In outward fliew (quoth he) and apparance, I give out in words that I go to empeach the passage of the Barbarians; but in very truth to lay down my life for the Greeks. When he was come to the very entrance of the said pals, he laid unto his fouldiers: It is reported unto us by our fcours, that our Barbarousenemies be at hand; therefore we are to lose no more time, for now we are brought to this issue, that we must either deseat them, or else die for it. When one said unto him, for the exceeding number of their arrowes we are not able to see the Sun: So much the better (quoth he) for us, that we may fight under the shade. To another who said: Lo they be even hard and close to us; And so are we (quoth he) hard by them. Another used these words unto him: You are come Leonidas with a very small troup, for to hazard your selfe against so great a multitude; unto whom he answered: If you regard number, all Greece assembled together is not able to surnish us, for it would but answer one portion or canton of their multitude: but if you stand upon valor and and prowelle of men, certes this number is sufficient. Another there was who said as much to him: But yet I bring (quoth he) men enough, considering we are here to leave our lives. Xerxes wrot unto him to this effect: You need not unless you list be so perverse and obstinate as to fight against the gods, but by siding and combining with me, make your selfe a monarch overall Greece; unto whom he wrote back in this wife: If you knew wherein confifted the fovereigne good of mans life, you would not covet that which is another mans; for mine own part, I had rather lose my life for the safety of Greece, than to be the commander of all those of mine own nation. Another time Xerxes wrot thus: Send me thy armour; unto whom he wrot back: Come your felfe and fetch it. At the very point when he was to charge upon his enemies, the marshals of the army came unto him, and proteffed that they must needs hold off and stay untill the other allies and confederates were come together: Why (quoth he) think you not that as many as be minded to fight are come already? or know you not that they only who dread and reverence their kings, be they that fight against enemies? this sid, he commanded his souldiers to take their dinners, for sup we shall (said he) in the other world. Being demanded why the best and bravest men preserre an honourable death before a shamefull life? Because (quoth he) they esteem the one proper to nature only; but to die well they think it peculiar to themselves. A great desire he had to have those young men of his troope and regiment, who were not yet married, and knowing well that if he dealt with them directly and openly, they would not abide it; he gave unto them one after another two brevets or letters to carry unto the Ephori, and so sent them away : he meant also to fave three of those who were married: but they having an inkling thereof, would receive no brevets or missives at all: for one said, I have followed you hither to fight, and not to be a carrier of newes; the second also: By staying here I shall quit my selfe the better man; and the third: I will not be behind the rest, but the formest in fight.

Lochegus the father of Polyanides and Syron, when newes was brought unto him that one of his children was dead: I knew long fince (quoth he) that he must needs die.

Lycurgus

Licureus the law-giver, minding to reduce his citizens from their old manner of life, unto a more fober and temperate course, and to make them more vertuous and honest (for before time they had been dissolute and over delicate in their manners and behaviour) nourithed two whelps which came from the same dog and bitch, and the one he kept alwayes within house, and used it to lick in every dish and to be greedy after meat; the other he would lead forth abroad into the fields and acquaint it with hunting: afterwards he brought them both iuto an open and frequent aftembly of the people, and fer before him in the midft, certain bones, sofs and craps; he put out also at the same time an hare before them; now both the one and the other took incontinently to that whereto they had been acquainted, and ran apace, the one to themeis of lops, and the other after the hare and caught it : hereupon Lyeurgus tooke occasion to infer this speech: You fee here my masters and citizens (quoth he) how these two dogs having one fire and one dam to them both, are become far different the one from the other, by reason of their divers education, and oringing up; whereby it is evident how much more powerfull nurture and exercise is to the breeding of vertuous manners, than kinde and nature: howbeit some there be who say, that theferwodogs or whelps which he brought out, were not of one & the same dog and bitch; but the one came from those curres that used to keepe the house, & the other from those hounds that were kept to hunting; and afterwards that he acquainted the whelp that was of the worle kind only to the chase, and that which came of the better race, to slap, lick, and do nothing else but raven; whereupon either of them made their choife & ran quickly to that whereto they were accustomed; and thereby he made it appear evidently how education, trayning, and bringing up is availeable both for good and bad conditions, for thus he spake unto them: By this example you may know my friends that nobility of bloud, how highly loever it is esteemed with the common fort, is to no purpose, no though we be descended from the race of Hercules, if we doe not practile those deeds whereby he became the most renowned and glorious knight in the world, learning and exerciting all our life timethole things which are honest and vertuous. Flaving made a division of the whole territory, and distributed to every citizen an equal portion; it is reported that a good while after, being returned from a long volage which he had, into the faid territory about harvest time, when the corn was newly reaped and cut down, seeing the shocks and sheaves, cocks and fliches ranged even and orderly, and the same one to another; he rejoyced in his heart, and smiling said to those about him: That, the whole territory of Laconia looked like unto the inheritance and patrimony of many brethren who had lately parted and divided their portions together equally. When he had brought in the cutting off and abolition of debts, he went in hand with the division of all utensils also and moveable goods within house into even shares, to to the end that there might be no imparity nor inequality at all among his cirizens; but perceiving that if he went directly and plainly to work, they would hardly bear and brook that any thing should be abridged and taken from them: he discredited first and formest all forts of gold, and filver coin, giving commandement that there should be no mony used but made of iron: and taxed a cerain rate, and limitation of what summe each mans state should amount; according to the estimation of the said mony by way of exchange; which done, all wrongs and unjust dealings were chased clean out of Lacedamonitor now by this means there could no man rob nor seal, there was no bribing nor corruption by gifts, no man might defraud in contracts and bargains, nor embezzell any more, confidering that they might neither conceale and hide that which was unjustly gotten nor any man joyed in possessing ought, nor could possibly use and occupy the fame without perill, ne yet carry to and fro in fafety and fecurity and withall by the fame means, he banished out of Lacedamon all superfluities, whereby there were no more any merchants, nor pleading sophisters, no wisards and fortune tellers, no cogging mount-banks and juglers, no ingenious devifers of new fabricks and buildings that haunted Sparta any mores for why he would not permit any mony there which was current in other places, but only this iron coin was in request, and passed from one to another: as for the price thereof it waighed an Aegenitick pound; but the worth and valour, it went but for four Chalei. Moreover, having a purpose to root out delicate and superfluous pleasures, and to cut off clean all covetous desire of riches, he instituted and brought up those meetings which they call Syffitia: i. eating at publike meals and making merry together: and when some demanded of him what he meant to devise the same, and also why he ordained that his citizens should be divided by little tables when they sat together in armes? To the end (quoth he) that they might be in more readiness to receive commandement from their superiors; as also if peradventure there should be some practise among them of change and alteration, the fault might be in some few and moreover that there should be equality in eating and drinking, and neither in their dishes of meat nor cups of drink, nor in their beds nor apparell, no nor so much as in the utenfils and implements of the house, or in any thing whatsoever, the rich should have any vantage over the poor: by this policy having brought to pais that riches was not let-by and defired, con-fidering that luch order was taken, that neither men had much occasion to ule it, nor any joy and pleasure to shew it, he would thus say unto his samiliars: My good friends, what a gay and goodly matter is it, to make it known by effect indeed, that Pluto, that is to say, the god of riches, is in truth blinde, according as he is named to be. Furthermore, carefull he was, and had a special regard that his people should not first dine at home in their own houses, and after that, go to their publick halles and meetings aforelaid, being full of other yiands and drinks; for others would reproach and speak badly of a man, who did not eat among men with a good appetite, as being a glutton, or one who for daintiness and delicacy disdained this common and vulgar manner of diet; but it any such happned to be seen and known, he was sure to be condemned in a good round sine. Hereupon it was, that a long time after, king Agis (after his returne from an expedition or voiage in war, wherein he had subdued the Athenians) willing one day to sup privately by himselfe with his wife at home, sent into the kitchin for his part or allowance of meat; but the marshalls of the army would fend him none; and the morrow after, when the matter came to the know. ledge of the Ephorishe had a fine fet on his head for it: but by reason of these new ordinances, divers of the richer fort tooke fouff, and in great indignation role up against him, abused him with hard tearms, threw stones and would have brained him; but he seeing himselfe thus furiously pursued, made shift by good sootmanship, and escaped out of the common market place, and put himselfe within the fanctuary of Minervas temple, called Chalceacos, before the other could overtake him, only Alcander was so neer unto him, that when he cast his eye behind to see who followed after, he raught him a rap with his baston, and strake one of his eyes out of his head: but Alcander afterwards, by the common sentence of the whole city, was put into his hands for to do exemplary juflice upon him, according as he thought good, howbeit, he wrought him no mischief nor displeasure at all; and that which more is, he never to much as complained of any wrong or abute that he had offered and done unto him; but having him to be a domestical guest and to live with him, he did this good to him: That he blazed in every place where he came, his commendable parts, and namely, the orderly diet and manner of life, that he had learned by converfing with him; and in one word, shewed himselse highly to affect that discipline in which Lycurgm had trained him afterwards, for a memoriall of this accident which befell unto him, he caused within the temple of Minerva Chalceacos, a chappell to be built unto Minerva, surnamed Opulerisifor that the Doriens inhabiting those parts, do call in their language, Eies, Opieli. It was demanded of him upon a time why he had not established any written positive lawes: Because (quoth he) they that are well brought up and inflituted in that discipline as it appertaineth, know well how to judge that which the time requireth. Some asked him why he had ordained that the roofes of houses should be made with timber rough hewen with the axe, and the doors of awen plank or board only, without work of any other tools or instruments at all? unto whom he answered: Because our citizens should be moderate in all things that they bring into their houses, and have no furniture therein that might set other mens teeth on water, or which other men do so much affect. From this custome by report it came, that king Leotychides the first of that name, being at supper in a friends house of his, when he saw the roose over his head richly seeled with embowed arch-work, demanded of his host whether the trees in that country grew square or no? When he was asked why heforbade to make war often against the same enemies: for fear (quoth he) that being forced eftioones to stand upon their own guard and put themselves in defence, they should in the end become well experienced in the warres: in which regard Agefil aurasterwards was greatly blamed for being the cause by his continual expeditions and invasions into Baoria, that the Thebans were equall in armes unto the Lacedæmonians. Another asked also of him, why he enjoined maidens marriageable to exercise their bodies in running, wreftling, pitching the bar, flinging coits, and lancing of darts? For this purpose (quoth he that the first rooting of their children which they are to breed, taking fast and sure hold in able bodies well set and strongly knit, might spring and thrive the better within them, and they also themselves being more firme and vigorous, bearechildren asterward the better, be prepared and exercised (as it were) to endure the paines, and travells of child-birth easily and soutly, over and besides, if need required, be able to fight in desence of themselves, their children and country. Some there were who found fault with the custome that he brought in that the maidens of the city at certainf estivall daies should dance naked in solemn shewes and pomps that there were set, demanding the cause thereof, to whom herendred this reason: That they performing the same exercises which men do, might be no less enabled than they, either in strength and health of body, or in vertue and generofity of mind, and by that means check and despise the opinion that the vulgar fort had of them. And from hence it, came, that Gorgothe wife of Leonidas, as we finde written, when a certain dame and lady of a forren countrey faid unto her: There be no other women but you Laconian wives, that have men at command; aniwered in this wife: For why? we only are the women that bear men. Moreover, he debarred and kept those men who remained unmarried, from the fight of those shewes where the young virgins aforesaid danced naked; and that which more is, let upon them the note of infamy, in depriving them exprelly of that honour and service which youngerfolk are bound to yeeld unto their elders in which doing he had a great forefight and providence to move his citizens to marriage and for to beget children; by occasion whereof, there was never any man yet who milliked and complained of that which was faid unto Dercillidas, by way of reproach, though otherwise he was a right good and valiant captain; for when he came upon a time into a place, one of the younger fort there was, who would not deigne to rife up unto him nor give him any reverence; and this reason he gave: Because (quoth he) as yet you have not begotten a child to rife up and do his duty likewife unto me. Another asked of him, wherefore he had ordained that daughters should be married without a dowry or portion given with them? Because (quoth he) for default and marriage-mony none of them might stay long ere they were wedded, nor be harkened afterfortheir goods'; but that every man regarding only the manners and conditions of a young damofell, might make choise of her whom he meaneth to espoule, for her vertue only; which is the reason also that he banished out of Sparta all manner of painting, trimming, and artificiall embelishments to procure a superficiall beauty and complexion. Having also prefixed and set down a certain time, within the which as well maidens as young men might marry; one would needs know of him why he limited forth such a definite terme? unto whom he answered: Because their children might be strong and lusty, as being begotten and conceived of fuch persons as be already come to their full growth, Some wondred why he would not allow that the new married bridegroome should lie with his espouse; but expresly gave order that the most part of the day he should converse with his companions, yea, and all the nights long, but whenfoever he went to keep company with his new wedded wife, it should be secretly and with great heed and care that he be not surprised or found with her? This (quoth he) is done to this end that they may be alwayes more strong and in better plight of body: also that by not enjoying their delights and pleasures to the full, their love might be ever fresh, and their infants between them more hardy and flout: furthermore, he removed out of the city all precious and sweet persumes, saying That they were no better than the very marring and corruption of the good natural oile; the art also of dying and tincture, which he said was nothing else but the flattery of the senses: to be briefe, he made the city Sparta inaccessible (as I may say) for all jewellers and fine workmen, who protess to set out and adorne the body: giving out, that such by their leud artificiall devices, do deprave and mar the good arts and mysteries indeed. In those dayes the honesty and pudicity of dames was such, and so far off were they from that tractable felicity and easie access unto their love; which was afterwards, that adultery among them was held for an unpossible and uncredible thing. And to this purpose may well be remembred the narration of one Geradatas, an ancient Spartan, of whom a stranger asked the question: What punishment adulterers were to suffer in the city of Spartal for that, he saw, Lycurgus had set down no expreis law in that behalfe: Why (quoth he) there is no adultery among us: but when the other replied again: Yea, but what if there were? even the same answer made Geradatas, and none other: For how (quoth he) can there be an adulterer in Sparta, wherein all riches, all superfluous delights and dainties, all outward trickings and embelishings of the body are despited and dishonoured? and where shame of doing ill, honesty, reverence and oberfance to superiors carry away all the credit and authority? One put himselse forward, and was in hand with him to set up and establish the popular State of government in Sparta; unto whom he answered: Begin it thy selfe first within thine own house. And unto another who demanded of him, why he ordained the sacrifices in Lacedamon so simple and of small cost? To the end (quoth he) that we should never cease and give over to worship and honour the gods. Also when he permitted his citizens to practise those exercifes of the body only, wherein they never stretched forth their hands; he was required by one to yeeld a reason thereof; Because (quoth he) none of us should in taking pains be accustomed to be weary or to faint, and give over at any time. Likewise being asked the reason why he gave order oftentimes to change the camp, and not in one place to lie long encamped ? To the end (quoth he) that we might do the greater damage to our enemies; and hurt more of them. Another was defirous to know of him, why he fotbad to give the affault unto any walles? unto whom he answered: For fear that the best men might not be killed, by a woman, a childe, or some such like person. Certain Thebanes craved his advice and opinion touching the facrifice, divine fervice, and dolefull moan which was solemnly made in the honour of Leucothea; unto whom he answered thus: If you take herfor a goddels, weepe not for her as if she were a woman; if you suppose her to be a woman, facrifice not unto her as to a goddess. Unto his citizens who demanded of him, how they might put back and repulse the invasions of their enemies? Mary (quoth he) if you continue poor, and none of you do covet to have more than another. Againe, when they would needs know why he would not have their city to be walled about : Because (faith he) that city is never without a wall, which is environed and compassed about with valiant men, and not with brick or stone. The Spartanes also were very curious in trimming the hair of their heads, alledging for their warrant a certain speech of Lyeurgus as touching that point, who was wont to say: That side-hair made them who were faire more beautifull, and those that were foule, more hideous and terrible. Likewise he gave commandement, that in their wars, when they had discomfited their enemies and put them to flight, to follow the chase so hardly, untill they were fully affured of the victory, and then to retire with all speed, saying: That it was no act of a generous spirit, nor beseeming the brave mind of the Greekish nation, to massacre and execute those who had quit the place and were gone; besides, this also would be safe and commodious for themselves, for almuch as the enemies who knew once their custome, namely, to put those to the sword who obstinately resist and make head, and to spare those & let them escape who flie before them finde by that means that flight is better than to fland to fight. A certain manasked him, for what cause he would not suffer the souldiers to rifle and spoile the bodies of their enemies as they fell dead: For fear (quoth he) lest while they busie themselves, and stoupe forward to gather the spoiles, they should neglect their fight in the meane time, but rather intend only with their poverty and want to keep their range.

The Tyrant of Sicily Dyonifius had fent unto Lyfander two futes of wmens robes, that he might choose whether of them he liked better, to carry unto his daughter; but he said unto him: That she herselse knew best which to choose, and what was sittest for her selse, and so he tooke

both away with him. This Lefender was a very crafty and fubrile fox, who ordered and managed most part of his affaires by cunning calts and deceitful devices, effecting justice only by utility, and henelly by profit; contelling in word that truth was better than fallhood; but measuring indeed the worth and price as well of the one as the other by commodity. To them who reproved and blamed him for conducting the most part of his enterprizes by fraud and guile, and not by plane direct force, a thing unworthy the magnanimity of Hercules, he would laugh and answer: That where he could not atchieve a thing by the lions skin, he must needs low thereto a piece of the foxes case. And when others charged and accused him mightily for that he had violated and broken his oath, which he had made in the city Milstum, he used to tay: That children were to be deceived with cock-all-pones, but men with oaths: Having defeated the Athenians in a battel by means of an ambush, in a certain place called the Goats-rivers, and afterwards pressed them so fore with the mine, that he forced them to yeeld the city unto his mercy, he wrot unto the Ephori thus: Athenis won. The Lacedamonians in his time were at some difference with the Argives about their comfines; and it feemed that the Argives alledged better reasons, and brought forth more direct evidences for themselves than the other; whereupon he came among them and drew his sword, saying; They that are the mightier with this, plead best for their confines. Seeing the Bootians as the passed thorow their country, hanging in equal ballance, nad syst not relolved and certain to which fide for to range themselves, he sent one unto them for to know whether they would chuse, thathe marched thorow their lands with speares and pikes upright, or bending downward and trailing. In a certain assembly of the cliates of Greece, there was a Megarian who spake bravely and audactoully unto him: Thy words my friend (quoth he) have need of a city; meaning thereby, that he was of too weak and small a city, as to give such glorious words. The Corinthians rebelled upon a time, whereupon he advanced with his forces against their walles, which the Lacedamonians feemed to affaile very coldly: but at the very instant there was espied an hare, running cross over the town-ditch: whereupon he took occasion to say: Are yee not ashamed in deed O yee Spate ranes, to fear such enemies, who are so idle and stir so little abroad, that hares can sleepe quietly, even under their very wales. When he was at Samothrace to confult with the oracle there; the priest was in hand with him to confess what was the most wicked and enormous act that ever he did in all his life time: whereupon he asked the priest again: Whether is it your selfe or the gods that would know thus much, and imposeth this confession upon me? The gods (quoth the priest) would have it so: Why then (quoth he) recire you aside out of my sight, and if they demand the fame of me, I will answer them. A certain Pethan asked him what kinde of government he liked best and praised most: Even that (quoth he) which ordaineth for cowards and hardy men that reward and hire which is meet for them. Another faid unto him: That in every place where he came he was ready to commend and defend him: I have (quoth he again) in my grounds two oxen, and neither of them speaks a word; howbeit, I know for all that, which is good of deed, and which is idle and lazy at his work. There was one who let flie at him divers odious and reproachfull words? Speak on good fellow (quoth he) out with it hardly and spare not, vomit up all and leave nothing behind, if haply thou canst rid and purge thy heart of all the wicked venom wherewith thou seemed so sevell. Sometime after, when he was dead, there arose variance between the allies of Sparia as touching certain matters, and for to know the truth and lettle all causes among them, Agestians went to Lifarders house for to learch certain papers that might give light & evidence to the thing in controverly; and among their writings he chanced to light upon an oration or pamphlet penn'd by him as touching policy and the State; wherein he feemed to perfunde the Spartans to take the roialty and regall dignity from the houles of the Europianide and Agiada, and to bring it to after election of the citizens, that they might chule for their kings out of all the city those who were approved & knownfor the worthiest men, & not to be obliged for to take and admit of necessity one of Hercules line: so as the crown and regall state might be conferred as a reward and hohour upon him who in vertue resembled Hercules most, considering that it was by the means thereof, that unto him were assigned the honours due unto the gods: now was Agesslaus fully bent to have published this oration before all the citizens, to the end that they might take knowledg how Lyfander was another kinde of man than he had been taken for, withall to traduce those that were his friends, and bring them into obloquie, inspicion and trouble but by report Lacratidas the ptimcipall man, and prefident of the Ephori, fearing left if this oration were once divulged and openly read, ir might take effect, and perswade that in deed which it pretended; staied Agesilans and kept him from doing fo, faying: That he should not now rake Lyfander out of his grave, but rather enterreand bury the oration together with him so wittily and artificially composed it was, and so effectuall to perswade. Certain gentlemen there were of the city, who during his life were suters to his daughters in marriage; but after his death when his estate was known to be but poore, they defilted and cast them off, whereupon the Ephori condemned them in great fines, for that they made court unto them, so long as they esteemed him wealthy; but afterwards when they found by his poore estate that he was a righteous and just man, they made no more reckoning of his daughters but disdained them.

Nameries being sent as embassadour into a forren country, there chanced to be one of those parts who said unto him; That he held and reputed him for an happy man, because he had so many friends: unto whom he replied and asked: Whether he knew the true proof whereby a man might be affured that he had many friends? the other answered: No, but I pray you tell me: Why then (quoth he) it is * advertity.

Nicander, when one brought him word that the Argives spake ill of him: It makes no matter ring (quoth he) are they not sufficiently chastised and punished for railing upon good men? One asked of him wherefore the Lacedemonians wore their hair long of their heads, and suffered likewise their beards to grow hide; unto whom he answered: Because a mans own proper ornament is of all other the faireit, and costeth least. A certain Athenian being in communication with him, cast out this word : All you L acedemonians (Nicander) love your ease well, and are idle: You lay true indeed (quoth he) but we buffe not ourfelves as you do in every trifling matter.

Panthoidas, being sent in embassage into Asi., was shewed by the people of those parts a certaine ftrong City well tortified with high and goodly walls: Now by the gods (quoth he) my friends, this feems to be a trim Cloitler to mue up women in. In the School of Academy the Philotophers discoursed and disputed as touching many good themes, and after they had made anend, they said unto him: Now good Sir O Panthoidas, how like you these discourses? What should I think of them elfe (quoth he) but that they are goodly and honelt in shew, but surely profitable they are not, nor edifie at all, to long as your felves do not live accordingly.

Paulanias the fon of Cleombroius, when the inhabitants of the Isle Delos were at debate, and pleaded for the propriety of the laid Isle against the Athenians, alledging for themselves that by an old law (time out of mind) observed among them, there might none of their women bear children within the said Island, nor any of their dead be busied there: How then (quoth he) can this sile be yours, if none of you were ever born or buried there? When certain exiled persons from Athens sollicited him to lead his Army against the Athenians, and fortoprovoke him rather thereto, said: That they were the only men who hiffed and whiftled at the naming of him, when he was declared victor in the tolemnity of the Olympick games: But what think you (quoth he) will they do when we have wrought them some shrewd turn, since they slick not to hisseat us being their benefactors? Another asked of him, wherefore the Lacedemonians had enfranchized the Poet Tyrtens their Denizen? Because (quoth he) we never would be thought to have a stranger or alien our leader and governour. There was a very weak and seeble man of body, who neverthelesse seemed very earnest and instant to make war upon the enemies, and to give them battel both on sea and land: Will you (quoth he) ftrip your feile out of your cloaths, that we may see what a goodly man of person you are. to move and perswade us for to fight? Some there were who seeing the spoyls that were taken from the dead bodies of the Barbarians after they were flain in the field, marvelled much at their fumptuous and costly cloaths: It had been better (quoth he) that themselves had been of more valour, and their habiliments of leffe value. After the victory which the Greeks wan of the Persians before the City Places, he commanded those about him to serve him up to the table that supper which the Persians had provided for themselves, which being wonderful excessive and superfluous: Now Par-die (quoth he) the Persians are great gourmanders and greedy gluttons, who having so great store of viands come hither among us, for to eat up our browne bread and course

Paulinias the fon of Plistonax, unto one who asked him, why it was not lawful in their country to alter any of their ancient Statutes, made this answer; Because Laws ought to be mist resses of men, and not men masters of the Laws. Being exiled from Sparta, and making his abode within the Cir. ty Tegea, he highly praised the Lacedemonians; one of the standers by faid unto him: And why then flaied not you at Sparta, if there be so good men there? why I say, fled you from thence? Because (quoth he) Physitians do not use to keep where folk be sound and whose, but where they are; fick and diseased. One came to him and said: How shall we be able to defeat and conquer the Thracians? Marry (quoth he) if we chuse the valiantest man for our Captain. A ceitain Physician advised and looked upon him very wiftly, and after he had well considered his person, said : Thou ailest nothing, neither is there any evil in thee: I think so (quoth he) because I yie none, of thy, counsel and physick. His triends reproved him for speaking ill of a physician, of whom he had no proof no experience, and at whose hands he had received no harm: True indeed (quoth he) I have made no trial of him; for if I had, surely I should not have been a lives-man at this day. When a Physician said unto him: You are now become old Sir: Thou sayst truth (quoth he) because I have now entertained thee for to minister physick unto me. He was wont also to lay: That he was the best Physician, who would not let his patietns rot above ground, but dispatch them at once; and send them quickly to their graves.

Padaretus, when one faid unto him: There is a great number of our enemies: Then (quoth he) shall we win greater honour for kill we may the more of them. Seeing one who by nature was a very dastard and coward, howbeir. commended otherwise by his fellow Citizens for his modesty and mildness:I would not have men (quoth he)praised for being like women, nor women for resembling men, unleis peradventure a woman be driven upon some occasion of extremity to play the man. Having the repulse upon a time, when he should have been chosen into the counsel of the three hundred, which was the most honourable degree of State in all the City, he departed from the affembly all jocund, merry and smiling; and when the Eptoricalled him back again, and demanded of him why he laughed? Because (quoth he) I joy in the behalfe of the City, that it hath in it three hundred better and more sufficient Citizens then my selfe, Piffarcus the son of Leonidas, when one enquired of him the cause why they carried not the denomination of their families from the names of their first Kings, but of the latter? Because (quoth * Some read he) those in the old time * chose rather to be Leaders then Kings; but their successors not. There there twee the was a certain Advocate at the bar, who in pleading for his Client, was full of his jests and frumps, compeled of was a certain Advocate at the bar, never cealing to froff and move laughter: My friend (quoth he unto him) do you not confider and regard, that in feeming to make others for to laugh, you will cause your selfe to be ridiculous and a laughing slock? even as those who by wrettling oft become good wrettlers? Report there was made unto him one day of a certain foul tongued fellow, who used to flander and back-bite allmen, and yet spake all good of him: I wonder much (quoth he) if no man told him that I was dead; for turely he cannot for his life afford any man living one good word.

Plistonar the ion of Pausanias, when a certain Athenian Orator called the Lacedemonians, unlettered and ignorant persons: Thou sayest true (quoth he) for we alone of all other Greeks, are the men who have learned no naughtinesse of you.

Polydorus the fon of Alchamenes, faid unto one who ordinarily did nothing else but menace his enemies: Doest thou not perceive how thon spendest the most part of thy revenge in these threats? He led upon a time the Army from Lacedemon against the City of Messene; and one demanded of him, whether his heart would ferve to fight against brethren? No (quoth he) but I can find inmine heart to march into that inheritance which is not yet fet out and parted by lots. The Argives, after the discomfiture of their three hundred men who fought against io many of the Lacedemonians, were defeated a fecond time, all in a ranged battel; by reason whereof, the allies and confederates of the Lacedemonians were earnest with Polydorns not to let slip so good an opportunity, butto sollow the train of victory, and to go directly to the oppugnation of their City walls, and to win it by force; which he might effect right easily, considering that all the men were killed up in the field, and none but women left alive within, to defend the City; unto whom he answered: I am well appayed, and take this for my great honour and glory, that I have vanquished mine enemies in battel, fighting on even hand so many to so many; but being to determine the quarrel by dint of sword for our confines only, and having exploited that, to proceed forward, and cover to affault and win their City, I hold it not to be just and equal; for come I am to recover those lands of ours which they occupied, and not to seize upon their home-stalles. Being demanded why the Lacedemonians exposed themselves so manfully to the hazzard of war ? It is (quoth he) because they have learned to reverence, and not to fear their Rulers and Captains.

Rolycratidas being fent with others, in Embassageto the Lieutenants of the King of Persia, when they demanded of him and the reft, whether they were come of their own proper motion, or feat by commission from the State ? If we speed of that (quoth he) which we demand, then are we come in the behalfe of the Common-weale; but if we miffe, we come of our own heads

Phabidas immediately before the battel of Leutlres, when fome gave out, and faid: This day will try and shew who is a good man; Such a day (quoth he) is much worth indeed, if it be able to shew

Som, as it is reported (being upon a timestraightly besieged by the Clitorians, in a place which was very rough and without water) made offer to render into their hands all anote Lands which he had conquered from them, in case that he and all his company might drink at a certain fountain which was neer at hand: the Clitorians accorded thereto, and this covenant was concluded and confirmed by Oath between them : so he assembled all his men together, and declared unto them; That if there were any amongst them would abstein from drink, he would resign up into his hands all his foveraign power and 10 yalty; but there was not one of all his troop who could contein and forbear, so exceeding thirtly they were all ; but every man drunk heartily, himselfe only excepted, who went last downto the spring, where he did nothing else but cool and besprinkle his body without, in the preferee of his very enemies not taking one drop inwardly; by which evation, he would not afterwards need up the forefaid lands, but alledged that they had not all drunk.

Telecrus, when one came unto him and faid; That his own father gave him always hard words; made him this answer; Surely, if there were not cause to use such speeches, he would never speak fo. His brother allo was dicontented, and complained in this wife; The Citizens do not bear me fuch favour and kindnesse as they shew in your behalfe; notwithstanding we are the sons of one farher and mother; but they missife me most injuriously: The reason is (quoth he) because you know not how to put up a wrong as I'do. Being demanded why the custome was in their country, that young men should rise up from their places where they were set, and do reverence unto their elders: It is (quoth he) to this end, that in doing this honour unto those, who nothing belonged unto them, they might learn so much the more to honour their Parents. Unto another that asked him of what wealth he was, and how much goods he had? he answered: I have no more than Charillus being asked the question why Lreurgus had given them so few laws? Because (quoth he) they have no need at all of many laws who fpeak but little. Another demanded of him the cause, why at Sparrathey suffered to go forth into publick place, virgins with their faces open, but wives valled and covered : For that (quoth he) maidens might find them out husbands to be wedded unto and wives keep those whom they have married already. One of the slaves (called Ilotes) behaved himselfe upon a time over boldly and malapertly with him; unto whom he said: Were I not angry, I would kill thee at my foot. One asked him what kind of government he efteemed best? Even that (quoth he) wherein most men, in managing of publick affairs without quarrels and sedition, frivea vie who shall be most vertuous. And unto another who would needs know the reason, why at Sparta the images and statues of the gods were made in armour? he shaped this answer: To the end that the reproaches which are fastined upon mentor cowardize, might not take hold of them; also that young men should never without their arms make their prayers unto the gods.

The Samiens had tent certain embassadours unto Spiria, who after audience given, were very speed long and somewhat tedious in their Orations; but when they had found the way to make an end, Sparan and The Lords of Sparan made them this answer; The beginning of your speech we have forgotten, and the lords of Sparan made them this answer; The beginning of your speech we have forgotten, and the lords of Sparan made them this answer; The beginning of your speech we have forgotten, and the lords of the lo ne zoras o para la contradicte the beginning was out of our remembrance. The Thebatis upon are not examine had contented bravely, and contradicted them flourly in certain points in question, tinto whom they answered thus: Either lesse hearts, or more puissance. There was one asked a Lacedemonian upon a time why he let his beard grow to long; Because (quorh he) whensoever I fee my hoary and gray hairs, I might be put in mind to do nothing unbeseeming them. When another highly praised certain menfor most valiant; a Lacedemonian heard him and said: Oh, such were sometime at Great Troy. Another of them hearing it spoken, that in certain Cities men were forced to dink after supper: And do they not (quoth he) compel them also to eat? The Poet Pindam in one of his Canticles nameth the City of Athens the prop of Greece: Then will Greece quickly come tumbling down (quoth a Laconian) if it bear but upon so sleight a piliar. Another beheld a painted table, wherein was the portracture of the Lacedemonians, how they were killed by the Athenians, and when one that flood by faid: Now furely these Athenians be valiant men: Yea marry (quoth he) in a picture. There was one seemed to take pleasure in hearing certain approbrious and slanderous words untruely given out against a Laconian, and to believe the same; but the party thus misuled said: Cease to lend your ear against me. Another, when he was punished, went crying: If I have done amisse it was against my will: Why then (answered a Laconian) let it be against thy will also that thou art punished: Another seeing men going forth of the Country, set at their case within Coaches: (Godforbid (quoth he) that I should fit there where I cannot rile up to do my duty to him that is elder then my selfe. Certain Chians there were, who being come to see the City of Sparta, chanced to be well whittled and stark drunk, who after supper went to see also the confiftory of the Ephori, where they cast up their gorges, yea, and that which more is, both vomited and discharged their guts, even upon the very chairs where the Ephori were wont to sit: the morrow after, the Lacedemonians made great fearth, and diligent enquiry at the first, who they were that thus had plaid the flovens and beafts, and namely, whether they were any of their own City or no: but when they understood that they were these strangers and travellers from Chies, they made open proclamation with found of Trumpet; that they gave the Chians leave thus filthily to abuse themfelves. Another Laconian seeing hard Almonds fold at the double price: What (quoth he) are stones so geasonhere ? Another having plucked all the seathers off from a Nightingale, and seeing what a little body it had: Surely (quoth he) thouart all voice and nothing elie. There was likewile a Lacedemonian, who seeing the Cynick Philosopher Diogenes in the midst of winter when it was extream cold, embracing and clipping a brazen statue very devously, asked him if he thilled not for cold? and when the other answered, No; Why then (quoth he) what great matter do you? A certain Laconian reproached upon a time one born in Metapontium, faying; They were all cowards and falle-hearted like women: If it be so (quoth the Metapontine) how is it that we hold so much of other mens lands as we do? Why then (replied the Laconian) I fee that you are not cowards only, but unjust also. A traveller being come to Sparta for to see the City, stood upright a long while upon one foot only, and faid unto a Laconian, I do not think thou can't flandio long of one leg as I do; Not Iindeed (quoth the other) but there is not agoofe but can do as much. There was one vaunted greatly what a Rhetorician he was, and namely, that he was able to perswade what he would; now by Caftor and Pollux I (wear (quoth a Laconian) there never was, nor never will be any Art indeed without verity. A certain Argive boafted much, that there were in their city many graves and Tombs of the Lacedemonians: And contrariwife (quoth a Laconian) there is not among us one Sepulcher of the Argives; giving him thus much to understand, that the Lacedemonians had many times entred with a puissant Army into the Countrey of Argos, but the Argives never into the Territory of Sparta. A Laconian being taken prisoner in War (when he should be fold in portfale, as the Crier began with a loud voice to pronounce: Who will buy a Laconian, who) put his hand to the Criers mouth and said: Cry for Gods sake who will buy a prisoner? One of those mercenary Souldiers whom King Lysimachus waged, being demanded of him this question; Art thou one of these Lacedemonian llots? Why think you (quoth the other) that a Lacedemonian will deigne to come and serve for source Obols by the day? After that the Thebass had defeated the Lacedemonians at the battel of Leuttres, they invaded the Country of Laconia, so farre as to the very River Eurotas; and one of them in boatling and glorious manner, began to fay; And where be now these brave Laconians? what is become of them? a Laconian who was a Captive among them, streight-wayes made this answer; They are no where now indeed, for if they were, you would never have come thus far as you do. At what time as the Athenians delivered up their own City into the hands of the Lacedemonians, for to be at their discretion, they requested that at least wife they would leave them the Isle Samos: unto whom the Laconians made this answer: When you are not masters of your own, do you demand that which is other mens: hereupon arose the common proverb throughout all Greece:

Who cannot that which was his own fave,

The Ifte of Samos would yet fain have. The Lacedemonians forced upon a time a certain City, and won it by affault; which the Ephori being advertised of, faid thus: Now is the exercise of our young men clean gone, now shall they have no more concurrents to keep them occupied. When one of their Kings made promise unto them for to raze another City and deliroy is utterly (if they so would) which oftentimes before had put those of Lacedemon to much trouble; the faid Ephori would not permit him, faying thus unto him; Do not demoiff and take away quite the whetftone that giveth an edge to the heatts of our youth. The same Ephori would never allow that there should be any professed Masters, to teach their young men for to wrestle and exercise other seats of activity: To this end (say they) that there might be jealouse and emulation among them, not inartificial slight, but in force and vertue. And thereforewhen one demanded of Lift and remains a might be sometime of the state of the s effect: Whether they had rather that heentred as a Friend, or as an Enemy: unto whom they returned this answer; Neither one nor the other. When they had sent an Embassadour to Demetrim the Sonne of Antigonus, having intelligence that the faid Embassadour in parley with him, ectioones gave him the name of King, they condemned him to pay a fine when hee was returned home, notwithstanding that he brought as a present and gratuity from the said Demetrius, in time of extream famine, a certaine measure of Corne called Medimnus, for every poll throughout the whole City. It happened that a lewd and wicked man delivered in a certain confultation very good Counsel: this advice of his they approved right well, howbeit receive it they would not comming out of his mouth, but caused it to be pronounced by another, who was known to be a man of good life. Two brethren there were at variance, and in fute of law together; the Ephoritet a good fine upon their Fathers head, forthat he neglected his fons, and suffered them tomaintaine quarrel and debate one against another. A certaine Musician who was a stranger and a traveller, they likewife condemned to pay a summe of money, for that he struck the strings of his Harp with his fingers. Two boyes fought together, and one gave the other a mortal wound with a fickle or reaping hook; and when the boy that was hurt lay at the point of death, and was ready to yield up the ghost other companions of his promised to be revenged for his death, and to kil the other, who thus deadly had wounded him: Do not so I befeech you (quoth he) as you love the Gods, for that were injulice; and even I my selse had done as much for him, if I had been ought, and could have raught him first. There was another young lad, unto whom certaine mates and tellows of his (in that featon wherein young lads were permitted freely to flitch what-foever they could handsomely come by, but reputed it was a shameful and infamous thing for them to be surprized and taken in the manner) brought a young Cub or little Fox to keep alive, which they had stolen: those who had lost the said Cub came to make search; now had this lad hidden it close under his cloathes, and the unhappy heast being angred, gnawed and bit him in the flank, as far as to his very bowels, which he endured resolutely, and never quetched at it, for fear he should be discover'd: but after all others were gone and the search past, when his companions faw what a shrewd turn the curst cub had done him; they chid him for it, saying, That it had been far better to have brought forth the Cub and shewed him, rather then to hide him thus with danger of death: Nay I wis (quoth he) for I had rather die with all the dolorous torments in the world, then for to lave my life shamefully to be detected so, for want of a good heart. Some there were who encountered certaine Laconians upon the way in the Country, unto whom they faid: Happy are you that can come now this way, for the theeves are but newly gone from hence: Nay forfooth (by god Mars welwear) we are never the happier therefore; but they rather, becaule they are not fallen into our hands. One demanded of a Laconian upon a time, what he knew and was skilful in? Marry in this, to be free. A young lad of Sparta being taken prisoner by King Antigonus, and fold among other Captives, obeyed him who had bought him in all things that he thought meet for to be done by a freeman; but when he commanded to bring him an Urinal or Chamber por to pille in; he would not endure that indignity, but said: Fetch it your selfe for me, I am no servant for you in such ministeries: now when his Master urged him thereto. and prefled hard upon him; he ran up to the ridge, or roof of the house, and said; You shall see what an one you have bought; and with that cast himselfe down with his head forward, and brake his own neck. Another there was to be fold; and when the party who was about him, faid thus; Wilt thou be good and profitable if I do buy thee? Yea, that I will (quoth he) though you never buy me. Another there was likewise upon sale in open market, and when the Crier proclaimed aloud: Here is a flave, who buyes him, who? A shame take thee (quoth he) coulds not thou say, a Captive or Prisoner, but a slave. A Laconian had for the badge or ensign of his Bucklera Flie painted and the same no bigger then one is naturally; whereupon some mocked him and faid: The the had made choice of this enfign because he would not be known by it : Nay rather (quoth he) Idid it, because I would be the better marked: for I mean to approach mine enemies fo neer, that they may see how great or little my cognifance is. Another there was, who when there was tendered unto him at the end of a Banquet, the Harp to play upon according to the custome of Greece, refused it and faid: The Laconians have not yet learned to play the fools. One asked a Sparran once, if the way that led to Sparta, were fale or no? but he answered thus: Even according as a man doth go down thither: for *they who go thither as Lyons, be hardly entreated and rue their " man doth go down thither: for 'they who go thither as 1,90ns, be hardly entreated and rue their comming; but Hares we hunt from under the shade of their borroughs, In wrettling it change the first to each the shade of the comming that he should be shaded to the shade of the sha make the other leave his hold; yet he forced him and made him stoop groveling downward to the hunt is make the other sam who head him fo hard, whereupon he began to cry: What thou Laconian, doeft bit the others arm who head him fo hard, whereupon he began to cry: What thou Laconian, doeft thou bite like women? No (quoth he) but I bite as Lyons use to do. A certain Laconian who was maimed and lame of hisleg Went to warfare, whereupon some mocked him; but he said unto them: It is not for thole to go into the wars who are good of footmanship, and can run away apace; but It is not for those to go mito the wars who are good of root infaminity, and can run away apace? But fuch as are able to make good their ground and keep well their rank. Another Laconian being fhor, thorow the body with an arrow, when he was at the point to yeeld up his vital breath, faid thus: I mever grieves me to lose my life, but to die by the hand of an effeminate archer, before I came to hand-stroaks, that is it that troubleth me. Another being come to an Hofselry, or Inne to be lodged. hand-ittroaks, that is it that trouverin me, nother being come to an Holtery, or inner to be lodged in, gave his hoft that kept the Inne, a piece of flesh to dresse for his supper; but he called for cheele besides and oyl: And what needs that (quoth the Laconian) if I had cheele, do you think that I would defire to have any viands more? Another hearing the Merchant named Lampir, born in E-sima, highly praised and esteemed happy, for that he was exceeding rich, and had many great ships the lampir (anythe he made reckoning a three fellows which have a lampir (anythe he made reckoning a three fellows which he made reckoning a three fellows which have a lampir (anythe he made reckoning a three fellows which he made reckoning a three fellows which have a lampir (anythe he made reckoning a three fello going at fea; I never (quoth he) make reckoning of that felicity, which hangeth by ropes and cords, Another likewife answered unto one who said unto him: Thou lyest Laconian: And why not (quoth he) we are free, as for others that happen to speak untruths, they are well punished for it and cry out. alas. There was a Laconian who labouted hard to make a dead body stand upright upon his feet: but when he faw that he could not thing his purpose to effect, do what he could: Now by Jupiter (quoth he) there wanteth somewhat that should be within. Tymichus the Laconian, when his fon Thraftbulus was flainin the war, took his death very well, and like a man, whereupon was this Epigram made:

Thy body was upon theshield O Thrafybulus trought All breathlesses the armed troop, from place where thou hadst fought: Seven deadly wounds at Argives hands thoudidst receive in fight,

And on the forepart of thy corps, thou shimed st them all in sight, Thy Father old Sin Tynnichus it took with blood beraid, And putting it in funeral fire 1:00 ~... with good cheer thus he faid: Let cowards weep and waile thy death ; but I thy Father kind, n Will shed no tears; nor semblance make of sad and grieved mind: But thee interr (my son) as doth beseem thy Fathers child, And as a true Laconi in, who lov s to die in field. The Master of the bains where Alcibiades the Athenian was wont to bath and wash himselfe, poured great store of water upon his body more then ordinarily upon others; a Laconian being then by faid: It feemeth that he is not clean and neat, but that he is exceeding foule and filthy, that heebestoweth to much water upon him. When King Philip of Macedonia entred with a main Army into Laconia at what time as it was thought all the Lacedemonians were killed up and deadshe faid. unto one of the Spartans: O poor Laconians, what will you do now? what else (quoth the Laconian) bur die valiantly like men; for we alone of all other Greeks have been taught to live free and not to ferve in bondage under any others. After that King Aru was vanquished, Amipaer the King denunded of the Lacedemonians for hostages, fifty children of theirs? Escales one of the Ephore for the time being returned this an wer. That he would not deliver into his hands any of their childien, for fear they would learn ill manners and lewd conditions; for that they should not be brought up and nurtured in the discipline of their own country, and wanting it they would not prove to much as good Citizens; but if he would be so content, he should receive for pledges women or old men twi e as many. And when hemenaced hereupon and faid: That he would work him all the despite that possibly he could; they answered all with one accord: If thou impose upon us those conditions which are more grievous then death, we shall die with so much the better will, One old man defirors to fee the combats at the Olympick games, could not get a room to fit in, but passed along by many places, and no man would make him room, but fell to laugh and make good game at him, until he came at length to that quarter of the whole Theater, whereas the Lacedemonians were fee; and there all the Children, yea and many of the men role up unto him, and offered him their place: all the whole assembly of the Greeks observed well this behaviour of theirs, and with great applante and clapping of hands, approved and praifed the fame; then the good old Fa-

His bend allo at houre arthey, and weeping withal: Ah, God help (quoth he) what a world is this; that Greeks should all of them know well enough what is good and honest; but the Lacedemonians onely practice it? Some write, that the same happed in Athens also, at the festival solemnity called Panatheneas where those of Atticaplayed mock-holiday, and made themselves merry with a poor old man, who they seemed to call unto them (as it were) to give him a place among them; but after he was come to them, no room he could have with them, but was well mocked and frumped for his labour: how-beit, when he had passed along by all the rest, at length he came to a place where certain Embassadours of Lacedemon were fet, and they made him room, and fet him among them; the people there affembled, taking great pleasure to see this act, clapped their hands aloud, with great acclamation, antenness and proved it; then one of the Spartans, who there was: By the two twin-gods, Coffer and Postar (quoth he) I (west, these Athenians know what is good and honest, but they do not according to theirknowledg. A begger upon a time craved alms of a Laconian, who answered him thus, But if I should give thee city thing, thou wouldst make an occupation of it, and beg fill so much themore: for verily, wholoever he was that first bestowed almes upon thee, was the cause of this villanous life which thou leaded now, and hath made thee so vagrant and idle as thou art. Another Laconiun seeing a Collector going about, and gathering mens devotions for the gods, said thus: I will now make too more reckoting of the gods, so long as they be poorer then my selfe. A certain Spattan having taken an Adulterer in bed with his Wife, a foul and illavoured woman; Wretched man that thou art (quoth he) what necessity hath driven thee to this ? Another having heard an Orator making long Periods, and drawing out his fentence in length: Now by Caftor and Pollux, what a valiant man is here? how he rolleth and roundly turneth his torigue about, and all to no purpose. A traveller passing thorow Lacedemon, marked among other things, what great hoto no purpose. A traveller paring thoso is measured in the control of the control men to war. Another having very bad and effected eyes, would need go to warfare: and when others faid unto him: Wilt thou go indeed in that case as thou art in? what deed thinkest thou to do there? Why (quoth he) if I do no other good elfe, I will be fure to dull the brightnesse of mine enemies sword. Buris and Speris, two Lacedemonians, voluntarily departed out of their country, or razad- and went to Kerxes King of Persia, offering themselves to suffer that pain and punishment, which year, i. d. the Lacedemonians had deserved by the sentence of the Oracle of the gods, for killing those Heralds which the King had fentunto them; who being come before him, were defirous that he should put them to death in what manner he would himselve, for to acquir the Lacedemonians: the King wondering at this resolution of theirs, not only pardoned the fault, but earnestly requested them to flay with him, promiting them liberal entertainment: And how can we (fay they) live here, abandoning our native foil, our laws, and those kind of men, for whose sake to die we have so willingly undertaken this long voyage? and when a great Captain under the King, named Indarnes, intreated them still very instantly, assuring them upon his word, that they should be kindly used, and in equal degree of credit and honour, with those who were in highest favour with the King, and most advanced by him, they faid unto him: It seemeth unto us Sir, that you full little know what is liberty and freedom; for hethat wift what a Jewelit were, if he be in his right wirs, would not change the same for the whole Realme of Persia. A certain Laconian as he way-fared, came unto a place where there dwelt an old friend an hoft of his, who the first day, of purpose avoided him, and was out of the way, because he was not minded to lodge him; but the morrow after, when he had elther hired or bortowed fair bedding, coverings and carpets, received him very stately; but this Laconian mounting up to his beds, trampled and flamped the fair and rich coverlets under his feet, Taying withal: I beforew these fine beds and trim furniture, for they were the came that yesterhight I had not for much as a max to lie upon, when I should seep and take my rest. Another of them, being arrived at the City of Athen, and seeing there the Athenians going up and down the City, ome cying sate-fifty to sells, others field and such like viands; some like Publicans, string at the receipt of cultone, other professing the trade of keeping brothel-houses, and exercing many such vile and bale occupations, esteeming nothing at all foul and dishonest: after he was returned home into his own country, when his neighbours and fellow Citizens asked him, what news at Athens, and how all things flood there: Passing well (quoth he) and it is the best place that ever I came in (which he spake by way of mockery and derision) everything there is good and honest; giving them to understand, that all means of gain and lucre, were held lawful and honest at Athens, and nothing there was counted villanous and dishonest. Another Laconian being asked a question, answered; No: and when the party who moved the question said: Thou lyest; the Laconian replied again, and faid; See what a fool thou art, to ask me that which thou knowest well enough thy telle. Certain Laconians were fent upon a time, Embasadours to Lygdamis the Tyrant, who put them off from day to day, and baffed with them so, as he gave them no audience; at the last, it was told them, that at all times he was weak and ill at ease, and not in case to be conferred with: the Embaffadous thereupon faid unto him who brought this word unto them: Tell him from us, that we are not come to wreftle, but to parle only with him. A certain Priest induced a Laconian into the orders and ceremonies of some holy Religion; but before that he would fully receive and admit him, he demanded of him what was the most grievous sin that ever he committed, and which lay heaviest upon his conscience? The gods know that best (quoth the Laconian:) but when the Priest pressed hard upon him, and was very importunate, protesting that there was no remedy, but he must needs utter and confesse it : Unto whom (quoth the Laconian) must I tell it, unto you, or to the God whom you serve? Unto God (quoth the other:) Why then turn you behind mee (quoth he) or retire afide out of Learing: Another Laconian chanced in the flight to go over a Church-yard by a Tomb or Monument, and imagined that he saw a spirit standing before him; whereupon he advanced forward directly upon it with his javelin; and as heran full upon it, and as he thought, firuck thorow it, he faid withall : Whither flieft thou from me, ghost that thou are, now twice dead? Another having vowed to fling himselfe headlong from the high Promontory Lucas, down into the Sea, mounted up the top thereof, but when he saw what an huge downsal it was, he gently came down again on his feet: now when one twitted and reproached him therefore: I wilt not (quoth he) that this vow of mine had need of another greater then it. Another Laconianthere was, who in a battel and hot medly, being fully minded to kill his enemy who was under antifice was, who has batter and not include to a minimate to a minimate the him and to that purpose had lifted up his swort back, to give him a deadly wound; so foon as ever he heard the trumpet found the retreat, presently stayed his hand, and would no more follow his stroak; now when one asked him, why he slew not his enemy whom he had in his hands? Because (quoth he lit is better to obey a Captain, then to kil an enemy. There was a Laconian took the foil in wreftling at the Olympick games; and when one cried aloud: Thy concurrent is better then thou, Laconian: Better (quoth he)not so, but indeed he can skill better then I of supplanting and tripping.

The Customes and Ordinances among the Lacedemonians.

He manner and custome was at Lacedemon, that when they entred into their publick Halls where they took their meats and meals together; the eldest man of the whole company should shew the doors unto every one as they came, and say unto them: At these doores there goeth not forth so much as one word. The most exquisite dish among them was a messe of broth, which they called Black pottage; insomuch as when that was served up to the table, the elder folk would not care for any flesh meats, but leave all the same for the younger sort. And (as it is reported) Denys the Tyrant of Sicily, for this purpose bought a Cookfrom Laced mong 'and commanded him to make him fuch portage, and spare for no cost; but after he had a little tasted thereof, he sound it so bad that he cast up all that he had a taken of it; but his Cook said unto him: Sir, if you would find the goodnesse of this broth, you must be exercised first after the Lacedemonian manner, all naked, and be well washed in the River Enrotas. Now after the Laconians have eat and drunk foberly at these ordinaries, they return home to their houses without torch, or any light before them; for it is not lawful for any man at Lacedemon, to go either from thence, or to any place else with a light carried before him in the night; because they should be accustomed to keep their way, and go considerally without sear, all night long in the dark without any light at all. To write and read they learned for necessity only; as for all other forraign Sciences and Literature they banished them quite out of their coasts, like as they did all strangers and aliens; and in very truth their whole study was to learn how to obey their superiours, to endure patiently all travels, to vanquith in fight, or to die for it in the place. All the year long they went in one fingle gaberdine with-out coat at all under it; and ordinarily they were foul and fullied, as those who used not the stouphs and bains, nor yet annointed themselves for the most part. Their boies and young men commonly flept together in onedorter, by bands and troups, upon pallets and course beds, which they themselves gathered, breaking and tearing with their own hands without any edged toole, the heads of canes and reeds which grew along the banks of the River Enrotas; and in winter time they strewed and mingled among, a certain kind of Thissle-down, which they call Lycophanes; for they are of opinion, that fuch stuff hath init (I wot nor what) which doth heat them, It was lawful and permitted among them to love young boies for their good minds and vertuous natures; but to abulk their persons wantonly and fieldly, was reputed a most infamous thing, as if such were lovers of the body and not of the mind; in such fort, as who soever was accused and attaint thereof; became noted with infamy, and shame followed him wheresoever he went all his lifetime. The custome was that elder tolk when and whereloever they met with younger, should demand whither and whereabour they went? yea and check and chide them, if they were to feek of a good answer, or if they went about to devise colourable excuses: and whosoever he was that did not reprove him that did a fault in his presence, incurred the same reprehension and blame as he did who transgressed; yea and if he chased and shewed himselfe discontented, when he was reproved, he sustained reproach, disgrace and discredit thereby. If peradventure one were surprised and taken tardy in some fault; he must be brought to a certain Altar within the City, and there forced to go round about it finging a fong, made of purpose for his own reproofe, and containing naught elle, but the blame and accusation of himseife. Moreover, young tolk were not only to honour their own Fathers, and to be obedient unto them; but also to shew reverence unto all other elder persons; namely, in yeelding them the better hand, in turning out of their way when they meet them, and giving them the wall, in riting up from their feats before them when they came in place, and in standing still when they pasfed by: and therefore every man had a certain hand of government, and dispose, not only (as in other Cities) over their own children, their proper servants and goods; but also they had a regard of their neighbours children, servants and goods, as well as if they had beentheir own: they made use also of them as of things common, to the end, that to each one every thing might be (as it were) his own inpropriety. Whereupon, if it fortuned that a child having been chastised by another man, went to complain thereof to his own Father; it was a shame for the said Father, if he gave him not his payment again: for by the ordinary course of discipline in that country, they were affured that their neighbours would impose nothing upon their children, but that which was good and honell. Young lads were used to filtch and steal whatsoever they could come by, for their food and victuals; yea and they learned from their very infancy, to forelay and lie prettily in ambush for to surprise those who were asleep, and stood not well upon their guards: but say that one were taken in the manner when he stealeth; this was his punishment, namely, to be whipped and to fast from meat: expressly therefore and of very purpose they were allowed very little to eat, to the end that they might be driven upon very extream necessity to make shifts and expose themselves venturously into any danger, yea and to devise alwayes some cunning cast or other to steal more cleanly: but generally the reason and effect of this their strait diet was, that they should long before accustome their bodies never to be full, but able to endure hunger; for that indeed they were of opinion, that they should be the meeter for souldiery, if they could take pains and travel without food; yea and that it was a good means to be more continent, fober and thrifty, if they were taught and inured to continue a long time with small cost and expense: to be brief, perswaded they were; That to abstain eating of siesh or fish dressed in the kitchin, or to feed savourly of bread, or any other viands that came next to hand, made mens bodies more healthy, and caused them to burnish and grow up; for that the natural spirits not pressed nor over-charged with a great quantity of meat, and so by that means not kept and depressed downward, but dispersed and spread in largenesse and breadth, gave liberty for the bodies to shoot up, wax tall, and personable; yea and made them more faire and heautiful; forthat the habitudes and complexions which be slender, lank and empty, are more obfequent unto that natural vertue and faculty which giveth form and fashion to the limbs; whereas those who be corpulent, grosse, full, and given to much feeding, by reason of weight and heavinesse refult the same. They set their minds also to compose and make proper ditries and ballads, yea, and no lesse studious are they to sing the same shaving alwayes in these their compositions, a certain prick or fling (as it were) to flir up and provoke their courage and flomach, to enspire also into the hearts of the hearers a considerate resolution, and an ardent zeal and affection to do some brave deed: the ditties were plain, simple, and without all affectation; containing in manner nothing elfe, but the praises of those who had lived vertuously, and died valiantly in the Wars for the defence of Spartu, as being of all others most happy; as also the blame and reproach of such as for cowardise and faint heart were afraid to die, whom they accounted to live a wretched and miserable life, Moreover they flood much upon promises of future prowesse, or vaunteries of present valour, according to the diversity of their ages who chanted the faid longs; for always in their folemn and publike feasts, three quiers or dances there were: one of all folk, and the foreburthen of their Canticle was this ;

Customes and Ordinances of the Lacedemonians

The time was when we gallant were, Youthful and hardy, void of fear.

Next to it came in place a Dance of men in their best age and sull strength, who answered them in this wise:

But we are come to proof; and now at beft;
Try who that lift, to fight we are now preft.
And a third followed after of Children, who chaunted thus:

And we one day shall be both tall and strong,
Surpassing far, if that we live so long:

Now their very notes and tunes to the measures and numbers whereto they danced and marched in battel against their enemies after the sound of the flute, were appropriate and fitted to incite their hearts to valour, confident security, and contempt of death: for Lyengue did study and endeavour to join the exercise and practice of military discipline with the pleasure of musics, to the end, that war-like and vehement motions being mingled and delayed with sweet melody, might be tempered with a delectable accord and harmony; and therefore in battels before the charge and first shock of the conflict, their King was wont to facrifice unto the Muses, for this intent; that the fouldiers in fight might have the grace to perform some glorious and memorable exploits. But if any man passed one point beyond this ancient musick, they would not endure him, insomuch as the Ephori set a fine upon the head of Terpander (though otherwise he loved antiquity well enough, and was the best harper in his time, yea and took greatest delight to praise the heroick acts of the renowned worthies in times palt) and more then that; they hung up his harp upon a stake or post, onely because he had fet to it one firing more then ordinary, whereby he might vary his voice the better with more fundry notes ; for they allowed no longs nor lonners, but fuch as were plain and simple; and when Timotheus at the first Carneia played upon the Harp for to winthe prize; one of the Ephori raking a skein or knife in his hand, asked him, on whether fide, above or beneath, he would rather have him to cut a two the strings which were more then leven. Moreover, Lycurgus took from them all vain and fuperflicious fear, as touching sepulchres, permitting them to bury their dead within the City, and to rear their Monuments and Tombs round about the Temples of their gods: he cut off likewife all pollutions of mortuaries, and would not give them leave to enterre any thing with the Corps, but only to enwrap the same within a winding sheet of red cloath, together with Olive leaves strewed among, and the same indifferently to all bodies, no more to one then another; semblably he put down all Epitaphs and superstriptions upon graves, unlesse it were for such as lost their lives in battel; forbidding all mourning and doleful lamentations. Furthermore it was unlawful for them to make voyages into strange Countries, for fear they should learn forraign fashions, and uncivil manners, lavouring of no good bringing up; and for the same reason, Lycurgus banished aliens out of the City, lest if they should thither relort, by reason of their confluence, they might teach and shew the Citizens their vices, And as for Citizens born, if any of them would not infer their Children to be brought up according to the dicipline and inflitution of the City, they might not enjoy the rights and priviledges of free burgeffie. Some fay also that Lyeurgus ordained; Ita very alien would yeeld to the observation of his dicipline, and be ranged under the policy of the State, he might enjoy one of those portions which from the beginning was set out and appointed; but he was not allowed to sell the same. The manner and custome was in Lacedamon, to make use of their neighbours servants, even as well as of their own, when soever they had any businesse, or occasion to employthem; as also to make bold with their Horses and Hounds, unlesse the Owners themselves and Matters had present need of them. In the countrey also and territory of Lacoma, if they flood in need of any thing that was in their neighbours house, they would go boldly and ask no leave, to their cupboords, presses, costers, and such places where the thing was, make no more ado but open them, take out and carry away what foever they thought good, to he made fast and thut again the room out of which they had taken ought. To warfare they went in red liveries, both for that they thought this colour more decent for a man, as also because it resembled blood, it struck the greater fear into those who were not used thereto; besides, there was good use and profit thereof in this respect, that if any of them happened to be wounded, the enemy could not so perceive it, because that colour looked so like unto blood. Whensoever they had vanquished their enemies by some stratagem that their Captains weed, their manner was to lacrifice an Ox unto Marsi but if they got a victory by fine force and open manhood, they facrificed a Cock, by which meanes, they accustomed their leaders to be not only valiant, but also politick warriours. Among other prayers that they made unto the gods, this was ever one: That they might have the power and grace to bear wrongs: but the sum of all their supplications was this: That the gods would vouthfafe them honour for well doing, and no more. They worshipped the goddesse Venus in her complear armor, and made all the images of their gods, as well female asmale, with lances and javelins in their hands, as if they all had military and martial vertue in them. Also they used this saying as a common pro-

As if they would lay, that we ought, when we invocate the gods; to enterprife somewhat our selver, and lay our hands to work, or else not to call upon them. They used to let their children see the slores when they were drunk, to keep them by their example from drinking much wine. They never knocked and rapped at their neighbours doors, but stood without, and called about to those within. The curry-combs that they occupied were not of iron, but of canes and reeds. They never heard any Comedies or Tragedies a sted, because neither in earnest nor in game they would not hear those that any wise contradicted the Laws. When Archibochus the Poet was come to Sparta, they drove him out the very same hour that he came, for that they knew he had made these verses, wherein he delivered: That it was better to sling away weapons then to die in the field:

A foole he is, who trusting in his shield, Doth venture life and limb in bloody field: As for mine own, I have it slung me fro, And lift behind in bushes thick that grow.

Others translate it thus.

Some Sai an now, in that my doughty shield Doth take great joy, which stying out of field, Though full against my mind, I slang me fro And left behind in bushes thick that grow. Although it were right good, yet would not I Presume to fight with it, and so to die: Farewel my hield, though thou be lost and gone, Another day as good I shall buy one.

All their facred and holy ceremonies were common, as well for their daughters as their fons. The Ephori condemned one Siraphidas, to pay a fum of money, for that he suffered himselie to take wrong and abuleat many mens hands. They caused one to be put to death for playing the Hypotrite, and wearing tackcloth like a publick penitent, for that the faid tackcloth was puriled with a border of purple. They rebuked and checked a young man as he came from the ordinary place of exercise, for that he frequented it fill, knowing as he did the way to Pyran, where was held the affembly of the States of Greece. They chaled out of the City a Rhetorician named Cephisophon, because he made his boatt's That he could speak if it were a whole day of any Theam proposed unto him; for they said: That speech ought to be proportionable to the subject matter. Their Children would endure Diana, firnamed Orthins taking joy and pleasure therein, striving a vie for the victory who could hold out longest; and look who was able to abide most bearing, he was best esteemed, and carried away the greatest praise: this strife and emulation among them was called the Whippado; and once every year they observed such an exercise. But one of the best and most commendable and blessed things that Lycurgus provided for his Citizens; was the plenty and abundance that they had of rest and leisure: for they were not allowed at all to meddle with any mechanical art; and to traffick and negotiate painfully for to gather and heap up goods, was in no wife permitted; for he had fo wrought, that riches among them was neither honoured nor defired. The llotes were they that ploughed and tilled their ground for them, yeelding them as much as in old time was fet down and ordained; and execrable they effeemed it to exact more of any of them, to the end that those Ilotes for the sweetnesse of gains which they found thereby, might serve them more willingly, and them-selves cover to have no more then the old rate. Forbidden likewise were the Lacedemonians to be mariners, or to fight at fea; yet alterwards for all that, they fought naval battels, and became Lords of the Sea; how beit they foon gave that over, when they once faw that the manners and behavior of their Citizens were thereby corrupted and depraved: but they changed afterwards againe, and were mutable, as well in this as in all other things: for the first that gathered and hoarded up money for the Lacedemonians, were condemned to death, by reason that there was an ancient Oracle, which delivered this answer unto Alcamenes and Theopompus, two of their Kings.

Avarice one day (whoever lives to fee) Of Sparta City will the ruine bee.

And yet Lyfander, after he had won the City of Athens, brought into Spart aa great masse of Gold and Silver, which the Citizens received willingly, and did great honour unto the man himselfe for his good service. True it is, that so long as the City of Sparia observed the Laws of Lycurgus, and kept the Oaths which it was sworn by, she was a Paragon, yea, and the Soveraign of all Greece, in good The Cans which it was word of your person of your person on the first of your person one to transgresse the said Laws and brake their Oaths, avarice and coverous effectept in among them by little and little, and they with all their puissance and authority decreased, yea and their allies and consederates hereupon began to be ill affected unto them: and yet being as they were in this declining estate, after that King Philip of Macodonia had won the battel at Charonea when all other Cities and States of Greece, by a general consent, and with one accord had chosen him the general Captain of all the Greeks, as well for Land as Sea, yea, and after him his Son Alexander the Great, upon the defination of the City Thebes, only the Lacedemonians, notwithfunding their City lay all open, without any wall about it, and themselves were brought to a very small number, by occasion of their continual wars, which had wasted and consumed them, whereby they were become very seeble, and by consequence more easie to be defeated then ever before, yet for that they had retained fill fome little reliques of the government established by Lycurgus, they would never yeeld to serve under those two mighty Monarchs, no nor other Kings of Macedonia their successors, neither would they be present at the general diets and common affemblies of other States, nor contribute any money with the rest, untill they having utterly cast aside and rejected the Laws of Lycurgue, they were held under and youked with the tyranny of their own Citizens; namely, when they retained no part of the ancient discipline, whereby they grew like unto other nations, and utterly lost their old reputation, glory and liberty of frank speech, so as in the end they were brought into servirude, and even at this day bee subject unto the Roman Empire, as well as other Cities and States of Greece.

The Apophthegmes, that is to say, the noble Sayings and Answers of Lacedemonian Dames.

Regileonis the mother of Brasidat; (after that her son was slaine, when certain Embassidours from the City Amphipolis came to Sparta, and visited her;) demanded of them, whether her from the City Amphipus came to Spartan; now when they praised him exceedingly, saying that he was the bravest man in arms in all Lacedemon; she said again unto them: My son was indeed a Knight of valour and honour (my good friends;) but Lacedemon hath many others yet more valiant then he was.

Gorgo, the daughter of King Cleomenes, when Ariflagoras the Milefian was come to Sparta, for to follicit Cleomenes to make warupon the King of Perfia, in the defence of the Ionians freedom; and in consideration hereof promised him a good round sum of money; and the more that he contradisted and denied the motion, the more he fill augmented the furn of money which he promised: Father (quoth she) this stranger here will corrupt you, if you fend him not the sooner out of your houle. Also when her father willed her one day to deliver certain corn unto a man, by way of a reward and recompence, faying withal: For this is he who hath taught me how to make wine good: How now, good father (quoth fhe) shall there be more wine drunk fill, confidering that they who drink thereof become more delicate and lesse valorous? When she saw how Arist agoras had one of his men to put on his shooes: Father (quoth she) here is a stranger that hath no hands. When the saw a forraigner comming toward her who was wont to go softly and delicately, the thrust him from her and said: Avaunt idie lusk as thou art, and get thee gone, for thou art not so good of deed as a woman.

Gyrtias, when Acrotatus her Nephew or Daughters Son, (from out of a braule and fray that was between him and other younkers his companions) was brought home with many a wound, infomuch as no man looked for life; seeing his familiar friends, and those of his acquaintance, waile and take on piteously :What (quoth she) let be this weeping and lamentation, for now hathhe shewed of what blood he is descended; neither ought we to cry out and bewaile for the hurts of valiant men, but rather to go about their cure and salve them, if haply we may save their lives. When a messenger coming out of Candia, where he served in the wars, brought news that the said Acrotatus was slain in fight : Why (quoth she) what else should he do, being once gone forth to war, but either die himself, or else kill his enemies? yet had I rather hear, and it doth me much more good that he died worthy my selfe, worthy his native countrey and progenitors, then that he should live as long as possibly a man could, like a coward, and man of no worth.

Demetria hearing that her sonproved a dastard, and indeed not worthy to be her son, so soon as ever he was returned from the wars, she killed him with her own hands; whereupon was made this Epigram of her:

By mothers hard was flain one Demetrie, Forthat he brakethe laws of chivalrie, No marvel, she a noble Spartan dame Disclaimed her Son, unworthy of that name.

Another woman of Lacedemon being given to understand, that her son had abandoned his rank, made him likewise away, as unworthy of that countrey wherein he was born, saying: That he was no son ofhers; And thereupon this Epigram also was composed of her:

A mischief take thee wicked imp, become in divels name Through baleful darknesse; Haired is too good, and earthly shame: For cowards such of craven kind like hinds are not to drink, Nor wash in fair Eurotas stream their bodies, as I think, Avaunt thou cur-dog-whelp to hell, thou divels limb unmoan'd, Unworthy Sparta foile thou art, for thee I never groan'd.

Another, hearing that her son was saved and had escaped out of the hands of his enemies, wrote thus unto him: There runneth a naughty rumor of thee; either flop the course thereof, or elie live not. There was another likewise, whose children had fled out of the battel, and when they came homeuntoher, she welcomed them in this manner: Whither go you running lewd lozels and cowardly flaves as you are; think you to enter hither again from whence you first came? and therewith plucked up her cloaths and shewed them her bare belly. Also another espying her son new returned from the Wars, and coming toward her: What news (quoth she) how goeth the world with our Country and Common wealth? and when he answered: We have loft the field, and all our men be flain; she took up anearthen pot, let it fly at his head and killed him out right, faying: And have they lent thee to bring us the newes? There was one brother recounted unto his mother what a noble death his brother died, unto whom his mother answered : And wert not thon afhamed that thou didft not accompany him in so fair a journey? Another there was who had sent her sons (and five they were in number) to the wars, and she stood waiting at the towns end, about the suburbs and hamlets neer unto them, for to hearken what was the issue of the battel and of the first man she encountred from the camp, she asked what news, and who had the day, he told her that her tons were flain all five: Thou lend variet (quoth she) and base slave as thou art, I did not demand that question of thee; but in what state the affairs of the Common-wealth stood: The victory (quoth he) is ours: Then am I well appayed (faith she) and contented with the losse of my children. Another there was, unto whom as she buriedher son slain, in the wars, there came a filly old woman and moaned her, faying: Ah good woman what fortune is this? Why good (quoth she?) by Castor and Pollax I swear; for I barehim into this world for nothing elle, but that he should spend his life for Sparta; and loe this is now hapned. A Lady there was of Jonia, that nethodid pend in the lot of pendagon which fine her felf bad made, most costly and curiously but a Laconian dame shewed unto her, four children, all very well given and honelty brought up: Such as these (quoth she) ought to be the works of a Lady of honour, and herein should a noble woman indeed, make her boast and vaunt her selfe. Another there was, who heard news, that a ion of hers behaved himselfe not well in a strange country where he was, unto whom the wrote a letter in this wife: There is blown a bad brute of thee in these parts, either prove it falle or else die, I advise thee: Certain sugitives, or exiled persons from Chias, came to Sparta, who accused Padareius, and laid many crimes to his charge; his mother Teleuria hearing thereof, fent for them to come unto her; at whole mouths when she heard the several points of their imputations; and judging in her selie that he was in fault, and had done great wrongs, she sent a letter un-to him in this form: Either do better or tarry there still, and never think to save thy selie here. In like manner another wrote unto her son accused of an heinous crime, in these terms: My son quit thy selfe of this imputation, or else quit thy life. Another accompanying a lame son of hers upon the way when he went to battel, faid unto him: Son remember every foot that thou seppest thy vertue and prowesse, and fight like a man. Another whose son returned out of the field wounded inthe foot and complaining unto her of the great pain which he endured: Son (quoth she) if thou would? remember vertue and valour, thou shouldest never think of thy paine. A certain Lacedemonian chanced to grievously to be wounded in a skirmish, that he had much adoe to stand upon his legs, so that he was faine to go with crutches (as it were) upon four feet; now when he was abashed to fee some laugh at him for it, his mothersaid: Greater cause thou hast (my son) to rejoice forthis testimony of thy valour and prowesse, then to be dismayed at their sond and senselesse laughter. Another woman when she gave unto her son a shield, admonished him to use it well, and do his devoir like a man, and these words she used unto him: My sonne either bring this shield home again, or let it bring thee dead upon it. Another likewise giving a target to her some when hee took his leave of her to go to warre, said unto him: Thy father kept this target well from time to time; fee thou (for thy part) keep it as well, or else die withit. Another when her sonne sound fault with his short sword, said unto him: Then set foot neerer to thine enemy. A woman hearing that her son died valiantly in battel: No marvel (quoth she) for he was my sonne. Contrariwite, another when she heard that her some took him to his heeles, and escaped by good footmanship: He was never (quoth she) a sonne of mine. But another hearing that her son was flain fighting in the very place where his Captain had fet him: Remove him then (quoth she) from thence, and let his brother step into his place. A Lacedemonian woman being in a solemn and publick procession, with a chaplet of flowers upon her head, understood that her sonne had won a field, but was so grievously wounded, that ready he was to yeeld up his breath; without putting off her chaplet of flowers from her head, but glorying (as it were) in these newes: Oh my friends (quoth she) how much more glorious and honourable is it for a souldier to die with victory in battel. then for a Champion to survive after he hath won the prize in the Olympick games. A brother reported unto his fifter, how valiant her fon died in battel, unto whom the answered again: Look how much I joy and take pleasure to hear this of him: so much I am displeased and discontented at you, brother, for that you would not bearehim company in so vertuous a voyage, buttarry behind him. When one sent unto a Lacedemonian woman to sollicit and sound her, whether she would consent unto him, she made this answer: When I was a maiden, I learned to obey my father, and so I did evermore: and when I was a wife, I did the like unto my husband; if then that which he demanded of me be honeft and just, let him acquaint my husband with it first, A poor maiden being asked the question what dowry she would bring her husband? The pudicity (quoth the) and honefly of my country. Another Lacedemonian woman being demanded, whether the had yet been with her husbard? Not I (quoth the) but hee hath been with me, Alio another young woman chanced fectely to be deflowred and to lose her maiden-head; now when by some mishap she fell unto untimely labour, and to slip an obortive fruit; she endured the paines and travel thereto belonging to patiently, without one cry or groane, that neither her fither, nor any one about her, perceived any thing at all that she was delivered; for shame and honefly fighting together, overcame all the vehemency ofher pains. A Lacedemonian woman being fold in the maket for a flave, was asked what she could do? I can skill (quoth she) to be true and taithfull. Another likewise being a captive and demanded the like question, answered, that she could keep the house well. Another likewise when she was asked by one whether she would prove good if he bought her, made answer thus: Yea that I will, although you never buy me. Last of all, a faced amonian woman when she was to be sold in port-slee, the circle demanded of her what she had skill in a nivered, to be free. Now when she that bought her commanded her to do some things unbeteening a free person: You will repent (quoth she) that you envied your selse to so noble a possession; and so she killed her selse.

The Summary.

7 Ertue alwaies deserveth praise wheresoever it is found, but especially when it proceedeth from feeble instruments, and those of small show; for by that means the excellency thereof is somuch better seene: our Author therefore in that regard hath made here a Collection of Histories, relating the worth demeanours of many women who have shewed manly courage in sundry dangers; the consideration whereof, is able greatly to move and affect the Reader. In the Preface of this discourse after he bad resured the opinionof Thucydides, who would confine women (as it were) into a perpetuall hermitage, he proveth by divers reasons, that vertue being alwaies the selfe-same, notwithstanding that it hath objects and subjects different, it were meere injury and too much iniquity, either to forget or to despise those women who for their valour have deserved, that their name and example should continue; to the end that the same might be imitated as occasion requireth in many forts, not only by other women, but also by the most part of men. Which done, he describeth the notable exploits of some in generall: and then he commeth to speake of certaine in particular, noting and observing in them divers graces and commendable parts, but especially an extreame hatred of tyranny and servitude, an ardent love and affection toward their countrey, a singular affection to their hutbands, rare honesty, pudicity, chestity joyned with a generous nature, which hat beinglet them, both to enterprise and also to execute heroicke atts, and well deserving that praise, which hath been preserved entire for Such women, after so many yeares untill this day, by the meanes of this present historicall fragment; the which containeth goodly instructions for men and women of name and marke, to induce the wito governe themselves in such fort, that in the midst of the greatest confusions they might take a good courage. and lay their hands to that which their vocation requireth; and to hold this for certaine, that enterprises lawfull and necessary, will sooner or later have good issues to the spame and ruine of the wicked, but to the repse and quietnesse of all persons who desire seeke, and procure that which is good.

Am not of Thucydides mind (dame Clea) touching the vertue of women; for he is of this opinion: That she is the best and most vertuous, of whom there is least speech abroad, as well to her praise as her dispraise; thinking that the name of a woman of honour ought to be shut up and kept fast within, like asher body, that it never may go forth. Gorgius yet! (me thinks) was more reasonable, who would have the renown and same, but not the sace and visage of a woman, to be known unto men: and it seemeth unto me that it was an excellent law and custome among the Romans, which importeth thus much: That women as well as men, after their death might be honoured publikely at their funerals, with such praises as they had deserved : and therefore immediately after the decease of the most vertuous Lady Leonis, I discoursed with you at large upon this matter; which discourse (in my conceit) was not without some consolation sounded upon reason and Philofophy: and now also (according to your request at that time) I send you in writing the rest of our speech and communication, tending to this point: That the vertue of man and woman is all one and the very same; which appeareth by the proofe and testimony of many and fundry examples drawn out of ancient histories, collected by me, not upon any intention to please the eare; but if the nature of an example be such, as alwaies, to the perswasive power that it hath to prove, there is joyned also a lively vertue to delight. This Treatise of mine rejecteth not the grace of that pleasure, which doth fecond and favourise the efficacy of a proofe; neither is it ashamed to joyne Graces with Muses; which (as Euripides faith) is the best conjunction in the world, inducing the mind most easily to give eare and credit unto good reasons, by meanes of the delectation which it there findeth. For if to prove, that it is all one art to paint and draw to the life men and women, I should produce and bring forth such pictures of women as Apelles, Zeuxis, or Nicomachus have lest behind them; hath any man reason to find fault and to charge me, that I aime and intend to delight the eye and content the mind, rather than to versie my affertion? I suppose that no man will so do: semblably, if otherwise to shew, that the art of Poetry, or skill to represent in verse, all things what soever, is the lime in women and men, and nothing different one from the other, I should confer the Odes and veries of Sappho with those of Anacreon; or the Oracles penned by the Sybilles with those which are let down by Bacchis & is there any manthat could justly blame such a demonstration, for that it draweth the hearer to believe with some pleasure and content? No man (1 trow) would ever so and yet there were no better way to know either the resemblance, or the difference in the vertue of man and woman, than in comparing lives with lives, and deeds withdeeds: as if we should lay together the works of some noble science, and consider them one by another; even so likewise. to see whether the magnificence of Queen Semiramis hath all one forme and figure with that of King Sefastris; and the wildome of queen Tanaquil with that of King Servius; or the magnatimity of Lady Porcia with that of Bratus; or of dame Timoclea with that of Pelopidas; namely, in that quality which is most principall, and wherein lieth the chiefest point and force of these vertues: for vertue admitteth certaine other differences as proper and particular colours, according to divers natures, and is in some fort conformable to the manners and conditions of those subjects wherein they be, and to the temperatures of their bodies, or to the very nutriments and divers diets and fashions of their life. For stehilles was after one fort valiant, and sign after another; the wildome of Wiffes was not like unto Neffors; neither were Cato and Agentum just alike; Irene loved not her husband in that manner as Alceftis loved hers; nor Cornelia and Olympias were alike magnanimous; and yet for all that, we fay not. that there be many and divers kinds of fortitude fundry lotts of prudence and wisdome nor different juffices, in regard of the diffimilitude and variety which arifeth particularly in each one person so as the said peruliar differences do not exclude any one vertue from the proper definition thereof. As for fuch examples as are most divul-ged and published abroad (of which I presume you have already sufficient knowledge, and simply remember their hillory, by that which you have tead in an ient books) I will palle them over at this present; uniesse haply there be some acts worthy of remembrance, which they were ignorant of who before our time have written the common histories and vulgar Chronicles. But for that the women in times past, as well in common as particular, have performed many memorable deeds, it will not be amisse in the first place to set down briefly what some of them have done in society and company together.

The Trojan Dames.

F those Trojans who escaped after the winning and definition of Troy the Great, the most part went to seek their fortune, and by force of tempels (the rather for that they had no skillin navigation and were not acquainted with the feas) were cast upon the coast of Itely, where putting into fuch bays, ports, and creeks as they could meet with in that very place (whence the river Tybris dischargeth it selse into the sea) with much ado and great difficulty they landed, and the men went wandring up and down the countrey, for to fee if they could light upon those that might direct them in their voyage, and give them some light and intelligence of those coasts. Meane while the women communed and deviled thus among themselves: That fince they had been the most fortunate and happy nation in the world, it were better for them to fettle in any one certaine place what loever, than fill to wander uncertainly upon the leas, and to make that their countrey and leat of habitation, fince they were not able to recover that native foile which they had loft to which motion after they had all with one accord agreed they fet fire on their ships, and the first ring-leader in this action was a Lady (by report) named Roma; which done, they went farther up into the Continent to meet with the menaforefaid, who now by this time were comming apace to the feafor to luccour their fhips on fire, and fearing their furious anger, they fell to embrace and kisse them very kindly. some their husbands, others their kinsfolk and by this means appealed their wrath. Hereupon aroie that custome, which at this day continueth at this day among the Romans, that women should alute their kinsfolke, and those that be joyned in bloud to them, by kissing their lips : for the Trojanmen feeing (as it should feeme) in what necessity they stood, were well enough content; and withall finding the inhabitants of the lea-coasts courteous and ready to receive and entertaine them friendly, approved that which the women had done, and so remained and dwelt in the same part of Italy among the Latines.

The Dames of PHOCIS.

The worthy act of the dames of Phacis, whereof we now meane to make mention, no Historiogrupher of name hath yet recorded and set down in writing: howbeit there was never a more memorable deed of vertue wrought by women, and the lame testified by the great facrifices, which the Phoceans do celebrate even at this day, near unto the City Hjampolis, and that according to the ancient decrees of the country. Now is the totall history of this whole action from point to point particularly recorded in the lite of Diaphantus; as for that which the said women did, thus flood the case. There was an irreconcileable and mortall war between the Thessains and those of Phacis; for that the Phocians upon a certaine fore-fet day killed all the Magistrates and Rulers of the Thessains who exercised tyrany in the Cities of Phacis: aid they againe of Thessain had beaten and bruifed to death two hundred and fifty hostages of the Phoceans, whom they had in cull ody; and after that, with all their puissance entred and invaded their countrey by the way of the Locrans;

aving before-hand concluded this resolution in their generall councell, not to pardon nor spare any one that was of age sufficient to be are armes, and as for their wives and children, to lead them away captives as flaves: whereupon Daiphantus the fon of Bathyllus, one of the three foveraigne governours of Phoeis, moved and periwaded the Phocarans (as many as were of yeares to fight) for to go forth and encounter the Thessalians; but their wives and children, to assemble all together unto a certaine place in Phoeis, and environ the whole pourprise and precinct thereof with a huge quantity of wood and there to let certaine guards to watch and ward; whom he gave in charge, that so some as ever they heard how their countrey-men were deseated, they should set the wood on fire, and burne all the bodies within the compasse thereof: which designe when all others had approved, there was own one man among them flood up, and faid, It were just and meet that they had the confent also of the women as touching this matter; and if they would not approve and allow of this counfell, to leave it unexecuted, and not to force them thereto: this confultation being come to the eares of the faid women, they held a conn ell together apart by themselves as touching this intended action, where other resolved to follow the advice of Daiphantus, and that with fo great alacrity and contentment, that they crowned D. iphantes with a chaplet of flowers, as having given the best counsell that could be devised for Pkeis. It is reported also, that their very children fate in councell hereabout by themselves, and concluded the same; but it fortuned so, that the Phocaans having given the Thesialians battellineare unto a village, called Clevena, in the marches orterritory of Hyampolis, defeated them. This resolution of the Phocaans, was afterwards by the Greeks named Aponanthat is A desperate designe: and inmemoriall of the said victory, all the people of Phicis to this day do celebrate in Hyampolis the greatest and most colemne feast that they have to the honour of Diana, and call it Elaphelolia.

The Women of CHIOS.

"He men of Chios inhabited sometime the Colony Leuconia, upon such an occasion as this. A Gentleman, one of the best bouses in Chios, chanced to contract a marriage: and when the bride was to be brought home to his house in a coach, King Hippoclus being a familiar friend unto the bridegroome, and one who was present with others at the elpoulals and wedding, after he had taken his wine well, being fet upon a merry pin, and disposed to make sport, leapt up into the Coach where the new wedded wife was; not with any intent to offer violence or villany, but only to dally, toy and make pastime in a merriment as the manner was at such a feast : howbeit the friends of the bridegroom took it not so, but fell upon him and killed him outright in the place: upon which murder there appeared unto those of Chios many evident tokens and fignes of gods anger; yea, and when they understood by the Oracle of Apollo, that for to appeale their wrath, they should put all those to death who had murdered Hipporlus; they made answer, That they all were guilty of the fact: and when the god Apollo commanded them, that if they were all tainted with the faid mutder; they should all depart out of the City Chioa, they sent away (as many as either were parties and principals, or accellaries and privy to the said bloud-shed; yea, and whosoever approved and praised the fact, and those were neither sew in number, nor men of meane quality and power) as far as to Lest-conia; which City the Chians first conquered from the Coroneans, and possessed by the help of the Erythræans: but afterwards when there was war between the faid Chians and the Erythræans (who in those daies were the mightiest people in all Ionia) insomuch as the Erythræans came against Leuconia, with a power intending to affault it: the Chians being not able to refift, grew to make a com-position; in which capitulated it was agreed, that they should quit the City, and depart every person with one coat and caffock only, without taking any thing elfe with them. The women understanding of this agreement gave them foule words, and bitterly reproached them for being so base minded as to lay off their armour, and thus to go naked thorow the midft of their enemies: but when their husbands alleaged that they had fworn & taken a corporal oath so to do, they gave them counfell in any wife not to leave their armes and weapons behind them, but to fay, that a javelin was a coat, and a shield the cassock of a valiant and hardy man. The Chians perswaded hereunto spake boldly to the Erythræans to that effect, and shewed them their armes, infomuch as the Erythræans were affraid to lee their resolute boldnesse, and there was not one of them so hardy as to come neare for to impeach them, but were very well content that they abandoned the place, and were gone in that fort. Thus you may see how these men having learned of their wives to be couragious and confident, saved their honours and their lives. Long after this, the wives of the Chians atchieved another act nothing inferiour to this in vertue and proweffe. At what time as Philip the fon of Demetrius, holding their City besieged, caused this barbarous Edict, and proud Proclamation to be published: That all the Slaves of the Cityshould rebell against their Masters, and come to him: for that he would make them all free, and give them liberty to espouse and marry their Mistresses, even the wives of their former Masters. The Dames conceived hereof (o great choler and indignation in their hearts (together with the flaves themselves, who were provoked likewise to anger as well as they, and ready to affift their Mistresses) that they tooke heart to mount upon the walls of the City, and to carry thither stones, darts, and all manner of shot, beleeching their husbands to fight luftling and with good courage, and efficience admonishing and encouraging them to quit themselves like men, and do their devoir; which they did so effectually both in word and deed, that in the end they repulled the enemy, and constrained Philp to raise his siege from before the City without effecting his purpole, and there was not so much as one slave that revolted from his Master

The Women of ARGOS.

The exploit of the Argive dames against Cleomenes King of Lacedamon, in defence of the City Argos, which they enterprifed under the conduct & by the perswasion of Telefilla the Poetress. is not leffe glorious and renowned, than any action that ever was atchieved by a crew of women This dame Telefilla (as the fame goeth) was descended of a noble and ramous house, howbeit in body shewas very weake and fickly; by occasion whereof she sent out to the Oracle for to know how the might recover her health: aniwer was made, that the should serve, honour, and worship the Mufes: the yeelding obedience to this revelation of the god, and giving her felfe to learne Poefie, and likewife vocall mufick, and skill inlong, in short time was delivered from her malady, and became most renowned and highly esteemed among worsen for her Poeticall veine, and musicall knowledge in this kind : in procedle of time it fortuned that Cleomenes the King of the Spartans, having in a battell flaine a great number indeed of Argives, but not as some fabulous writers have precisely set down (seven thousand, seven hundred, seventy and seven) advanced directly to the City of Argor, hoping to find and surprize the same void of inhabitants: but the women, as many as were of age fufficient (as it wereby some heavenly and divine instinct) put on a resolute mind, and anextraordinary courage, to do their best for to beat back their enemies that they should not enterthe City; and in very truth under the leading of Telefilla, they put on armes, tooke weapon in hand, and mounting up the walls flood round the battlements thereof, and environed them on every fide, defending the City right manfully, to the great wonder and admiration of the enemies: thus they gave Cleomenes the repulse, with the losse and carnage of a great number of his men. Yea, and they chased Democrates another King of Lacedamon out of that City, as Socrates saith, who had madeentrance before, and feifed that quarter which is called Pamphyliacum: when the City was thus faved by the prowesse of these women, ordained it was, that as many of them as chanced in this service to be flaine, should be honourably enterred, upon the great Causey or high-way, called Argein; and unto them who remained alive, granted it was for a perpetual monument and memorial of their prowesse, to dedicate and confectate one statue unto Mari. This combate and fight (as some have written) was the seventh day, or (as others tay) the first of that month which at Argos in old time they called Tetartos, but now Hermeus, on which day the Argives do celebrate even in this age, a folemne facrifice and feast, which they call Hybristica (as one would say) reproachfull and infamous; wherein the custome is, that women went clad in fouldiers coats and mantles, but men were arrayed and attired in womens petticoats, frocks, and veils, Now to replenish and repeople the Cityagaine, for default of men who died in the wars, they did not (as writeth) use this pollicy, to marry their flaves to their widdows, but they granted free burgeone of their City, unto the better fort of men who were their neighbours and borderers, and granted unto them forto affiance and esponse the said widdows: but it should seeme that these wives distained and despised (in some fort) their husbands of theirs, as not comparable to their former; for they made a Law that thefe wives should have counterfeit beards set to their chins whensoever they slept and lay with their husbands.

The Persian Women.

Cirm (having canfed the Persians to rebell against King Astrages and the Medes) hapned to be discomfited and vanquished together, with the Persians: now when the Persians fied amaine toward the City, and their enemies followed hard at their heeles, ready to enter pell-mell with them; the women issued out of the gates, met them even before the City, and plucking up their cloaths before, from beneath, to their waste, cried unto them: Whither away, and whither do you flie, the most beastly cowards that ever were? For run as fast as you will there is no re-entrance here for you into that place, out of which you came first into the world: the Persians being ashamed as well to see such a fight, as to heare those words, blamed and rebuked themselves; whereupon they turned againe, and made head at their enemies, fought freshly, and put them to slight: from which time forward there was a Law established, That whensoever the King returneth from some sar voyage, and entreth into the City, every woman should receive of him a peece of gold, and that by the ordinance of King Cyrus, who first enacted it. But it is reported, that King Ochus one of his fucceffors (who being bad enough otherwife) was the most covetous Prince that ever raigned over them, turned alwaies out of the way, passed besides the City, and never would come into it after such a journey; whereby the women alwaies were disappointed of that gratuity and gift which they ought to have had : but King Alexander contrariwise entred the City twice, and gave to every woman with child double fo much that is to fay, two fuch peeces of gold.

The Women of GAULE. On the care have sent the stay

D Bfore that the Gaules passed over the mountains called Alper, and held that part of Italy which now they do inhabit; there arose a great discord and dangerous sedition among them, which grew in the end to a civill war : but when both armies flood embattailed and arranged, ready to right, their wives put themselves in the very midst between the armed troupes, tooke the matter of difference and controverse into their hands, brought them to accord and unity, and judged the guarrell with fuch indifferent equity; and fo to the contentment of both parts; that there enfined a wondesfull amity, and reciprocall good will, not only from City to City, but also be sween house and house; infomuch that ever after they continued this custome in all their confultations, as well of war as peace, to take the counsell and advice of their wives; yea; to compole and pacific all debates and braules with their neighbours and allies, by the mediation of them and therefore in that compolition and accord which they made with Annibal, at what time as he palled through their Clev. among other articles this went for one: That in case the Gaules complained of any wrongs done unto them by the Carthaginians, the Carthaginian Captaines and Governour which were in Spaine should be the judges between them; but contrativite, if the Carthaginians pretended that the Gaules had wronged them, the Gaule dames should decide the quarrell,

The Women of MELOS.

THe Melians purposing to seek for another land to inhabit, more large and sertile than their own, chose for the Captaine and Leader of that troupe or Colony which was sent forth; a young gentleman of fingular beauty, named Nymphaus; but first they had consulted with the Oracle, where they received this answer: That they should take the seas and faile; and looke in what place soever they happened to lose their porters and carriers, there they should rest and inhabit: now it hapned as they coasted along Caria, and were fet aland, their ships were lost in a tempest and perified; and then the inhabitants of the City Cryaff a in Caria, (were it that they had pity of their necessity, or feared their hardinesse and valour) requested them to make their abode with them, and granted them a part of their territory to hold and occupy; but afterwards the Carians seeing, that in a small time the Melians mightily encreased and waxed great, they complotted and laid ambushes for to murder them all at a certaine solemne feast and supper which they prepared for them : but it fellout so, that a young Demosell of Caria, named Cophene (who secretly was in love and ena-moured upon Nymphaus abovelaid, and could not endure that her love Nymphaus should so treacherously be murdered) discovered the said plot and intended designe of her country-men: now when the Cryaffians came to call them to the feaft abovefaid, Nymplians made them this answer, That the cultome of the Greeks was not to go unto any great suppers or fealts, unlesse they had their wives with them; which when the Carians heard, they said, Bring your wives with you and spare not, they shall be welcome : thus when he had advertised his countrymen the Melians, what had passed between him and the Carians, he gave order that they should themselves come unarmed in their plaine apparell, but every one of their wives should bring with them askeine or dagger under their cloaths, and so each of them sit close unto her husband: now in the midst of supper, when the fignall was given to the Carians for to go in hand with the execution of their defigne, the Greeks knew thereby incontinently, that the time was now come to execute this feat; and then the women all at once opened their bosoms, and their husbands caught the skeines aforesaid, ran upon the barbarous Carians, and massacred all in the place, intomuch as not one of them escaped with life: and thus being Masters of the Countrey, they razed the City, and built another, which they called New Cryaffa: Cophene then was married to Nymphaus, and won much honour and favor, which she right well had deserved for the great good service that she did: but in my conceit, the principall matter in this whole action, and that which is most to be commended, was the silence and fecrefie of these dames, that being so many as they were, there was not one whose heart fainted in the execution of this enterprise, nor perforce and for seare against her will failed in her duty.

The Tuscane Women.

There were in times past certaine Tyrrhenians Tuscanes, who seized upon the Isles of Lemnas, and Imbros yea, and ravished certaine Athenian wives out of Brauron, and begat children of them; but afterwards, the Athenians chaled that generation out of the laid Isles, as being mungrels and halfe Barbarians, who fortuning to arrive at the cape or head of Tanarus, did very good service under the Spartans in their wars against the Ilots: and for this cause obtained their freedome and burgeosie in Sparta, yea, and were allowed to take wives and marry among them; only they were not capable of any office of State or Magistracy, nor admitted into the Councell of the City: howbeit, suspected they were in the end, that they conspired and went about a change and alteration in the government: whereupon the Spartans apprehended their bodies, and cast them in prison, where they kept them very straight, as close prisoners, to see it they could convince them by some proofes and undoubted evidence. Meane-while, the wives of these prisoners came to the goales, and by their earnest prayers and importunate sute, wrought so with their keepers, that they suffered them to have accesse unto their husbands, only to visite, salute, and speake unto them: they were no sooner entred in, but they advised and perswaded their husbands with all speed to put off their own cloaths, and do on their apparell, and fo to get away with their faces vailed and covered; which prefently was put in execution, and themselves remained fast thut up in the said prifon, prepared and resolute to abide all the miseries and tortures that might be done unto them: thus the goalers let out their husbands, taking them to be their wives. No fooner were they at liberty, but immediately they went and seized the mountain Taygeta, & sollicited with all the llots to take armes and rebell; which the men of Sparta much feating, fent unto them an herald with a trumpets by whose entercourse they agreed upon these articles of composition. Imprimis, to deliver them their wives. Item, to reftore unto them their money and all their goods. Item, to furnish them with ships to passe upon the seas for to seeke their adventure : and when they had found a commodious land, in one place or other, and were provided of a Citie to inhabit; that they should be named and reputed kinsfolke to the Lacedzmomians, and a Colony derived and descended from them. The same did the Pelasgians, who tooke for their Captaines in this voyage Pollis, Adelphus, and Crasaidas, all three Lacedamonians; for when one part of them staid in the life Melos, the greater troupe under the conduct of Pollis arrived in Candy, attending and expecting if those fignes which had been foretold them by the oracles would happen; for answer was given them by oracle: That when loever they had loft their anchor and goddesse, then they were at an end of their voyage and should build them a City: being come therefore unto the demy Island Chersonesus, and their ship lying at anchor in the harbour; there happed in the night a fudden feare and right among them without any apparant caufe, fuch as they call Panique Frights, wherewith being wonderfully troubled and feared, they went a shipboord without all order, and in a tumultuous manner, leaving behind themfor hast the image of Diana upon the land, which had remained a long time among them. and had passed by descent from father to son, and by their soresathers had been first brought unto them from Brauron unto the Isle Lemmas, and which they carried with them from thence into all places wheresover they came: after this sudden fright and tumult was passed, as they sailed in the open sea they missed the same Image, and withall Polis also was advertised, that a stouke of an anchor was wanting and loft; for that when they came to weigh anchor by great force (as commonly it hapneth in such places where it taketh hold of the ground among rocks) it brake and was lest behind in the bottome of the fea; whereupon he faid that the Oracles were now fulfilled which foretold them of these signes, and therewith gave signall for the whole sleet to retire back, and so he entredupon that region to his own use: and after he had in many skirmishes vanquished those who were up in armes against him, he lodged at length in the City Lyams, and wan many more to it. Thus you see how at this day they call themselves the kinssolke of the Athenians by the mothers fide ; but indeed by the father they are a Colony drawn from Lacedemon.

The Lycian Women.

Hat which is reported to have been done in Lycia, was a meere fable and tale devited of plea-I sure, yet neverthelesse testified by a constant fame that runneth very currant, For Amisodarus (as they fay) whom the Lycians name I farus, came from about the marches of Zelea, a Colony of the Lycians, with a great fleet of tovers and men of war, who e Captaine or Admirall was one Chimarn) a famous arch-pirate, a warlike man, but exceeding cruell, lavage, and inhumane) who had. for the badges and enlignes of his own ship, in the prowa Lion, and at the poope a Dragon: much hurt he did upon all the coasts of Lycia; infomuch as it was not possible either to taile upon the sea, or to inhabite the maritime Cities and Townes, neare unto the sea side for him. This man of war or arch-rover, Bellerophontes had flaine who followed him hard in chase with his swift pinnace (Pegasu) as he fled, untill he had overtaken him, and withall had chased the Amazones out of Lycia; yet for all this, he only received no worthy recompence for his good fervice, at the hands of Jobates King of Lycias but also which was worse, sustained much wrong by him: by occasion where-of Bellerophomes taking it as a great indignity, went to sea againe, where he praied against him unto Neptune, that he would cause his land to be barren and unfruitsull; which done, he returned back againe: but behold a strange and fearefull spectacle, for the sea swelled and overflowed all the countrey, following him every where as he went, and covering after him the face of the earth and for that the men of those parts, who did what possibly they could to entreat him for to stay this hundation of the sea, could not obtaine so much at his hands, the women tooke up their petticoats before and went to meet him, and shewed their nakednesse; whereupon for very shame hereturned back, and the fea likewife (by report) retired with him into the former place. But somethere be (who more civilly avoiding the fabulosity of this tale) say: That it was not by prayers and imprecations that he drew after him thesea, but because that part of Lycia which was most fertile, being low and flat, lay under the levell of the sea: there was a banke raised along the sea side which kept it in; and Bellerophon cut a breach thorow it, and so it cameto passe that the sea with great violence entred that way, and drowned the flat part of the countrey; whereupon the men did what they could by way of prayers and intreaty with him, in hope to appeale his mood, but could not prevaile: howbeit, the women environing him round about by great troups and companies, preffed him so on all sides, that he could not for very shamedeny them, and so infavour of them, laid down his anger. Others affirme that Chimera was an high mountaine, directly opposite to the sun at noon-tide, which caused great reflections and reverberations of the sun beames, and by consequence, ardent heats in manner of a fire, in the faid mountaine, which comming to be spread and differfed over the champion ground, caused all the fraits of the earth to dry, sade, and wither aways whereof Bellerophomes (a man of great reach and deep conceit) knowing the cause in nature, cansed in many places, the superfice of the said rock or mountaine to be cloven and cut in two, which before was most smooth and even, and by that reason consequently, did send back the beames of the fun, and caused the excessive heat in the countrey adjoyning: now for that he was not well considered and regarded by the inhabitants, according to his demerit, in despite he meant to be revenged of the Lycians; but the women wrought him fo, that they allaied his fury. But furely that cause which Nymphus alleageth in his fourth book as touching Heracles, is not fabulous nor devised to delight the Reader: for he faith, That this Bellerophonies having killed a wild borethat destroyed all the fruits of the earth, and all other beafts within the Xanthiens countrey, had no recompence therefores whereupon, when he had powred out grievous imprecations against those unthankfull Xanthiens, unto Negrune, he brought falt-water all over the land, which marred all, and made all become bitter, untill such time as he (being won by the prayers and supplications of the women) besought Neprane to let fall his wrath. Loe whereupon the custome arose and commute fill in the Xanthiens countrey: That men in all their affaires negotiate not in the name of their fathers, but of their mothers, and be called after their names.

The Women of SALMATICA.

A Nnibal of the house of Barca, besore that he went into Italy to make war with the Romans, laid siege unto agreat City in Spanse, named Salmanea; the besieged were at the first affraid, and promited to do whatfoever Annibal would command them; yea, and to pay him three hundred talents of filver; for fecurity of which capitulation to be performed, they put into his hands three hundred hostages: but so soone as Annabal had raised his siege, they repented of this agreement which they had concluded with him, and would do nothing according to the conditions of the accord; whereuponhereturned agains for to besiege them afresh; and to encourage his souldiers the better to give the assault, he said, That he would give unto them the saccage and pillage of the Towne; whereupon the Citizens within were wonderfully affraid, and yeelded themselves to his devotion, upon this condition: That the Barbarians would permit as many as were of free condition to go forth, everyman in his single garment, leaving behind them their armes, goods, money, slaves, and the City. Now the dames and wives of the Town, searing lest the enemies would search and rifletheir husbands as they went forth of the gates, and not once touch and meddle with them, tooke unto them short curtelasses or skeines, hid them under their cloaths, and so went forth together with their husbands. When they were all out of Town, Annibel (having fet a guard of Male-fylians to attend them) flaied them at the end of the suburbs: meane while the rest of his Army, without all order put themselves within the City, and fell to the spoile and saccage of it: which when the Malæfylians perceived, they grew out of all patience, and could not containe themselves, nor look well unto their prisoners; but were wondrous angry, and in the end meant for to have as good a part and there as the reft of the spoile: hereupon the women tooke up a cry, and gave unto their husbands the swords which they had brought with them, yea, and some of them fell upon the guard organion, infomuch as one of them was fo bold, as to take from Banon (the Truchman or interpreter) the speare which he had, and thrust at him with it, but he had on a good corps of a cuirace which laved him: but their husbands having wounded some of them, and put the rest to flight, escaped by this meanes away, together in a troupe with their wives; which when Annibal understood, he fer our immediately after them, and surprized those who were left behind; whiles the rest got away and saved themselves for the present, by recovering the mountaines adjoyning; but after they sent unto Annibal and craved pardon, who graciously granted it; yea, and permitted them to returne in safety and reinhabit their own City.

The Milesian Women.

The Milefan maidens upon a time were furprized with a very strong passionate sit of a searchill melancholick humour, without any apparant cause that could be rendred thereof, unselfest were so men most conjectured) that the aire was infected and emposioned, which might cause that alienation of the mind, and worke a distemperature in their braines, to the overthrow of their right wits; for all on a sudden every one had a great desire to dye, and namely, in a surious rage would needs hang themselves; and intruth many of them secretly knit their necks inhalters, and so were strangled; no reasons and remonstrances, no teares of father and mother, no perswasions and comfortable speeches of their friends would serve the turne; but look what keepers soever they had, and how carefully soever they looked unto them, they could find meanes of evasion to avoid and go beyond all their devices and inventions; in such fort, that it was thought to be some plague and punishment sent from the gods above; and such as no humane provision could remedy, mutill such time as by the advice of a sage and wise Citizen, there went forth a certaine edict, and the same enacted by the countell of the City: That if any one more happed to hang her selfe, she should be carried starke naked as ever she was borne thorow the market-place in the view of the whole world: this proclamation being thus ratified by the Common-councell of the City, did not only represe for a while, but also stated for altogether, this furious rage of the maidens and their inordinate defite to make themselves away. Thus we may see, that the seare of dishonour, shame, and infamy, is a great figne and infallible token of good nature and vertue, confidering that they feared neither death nor paine, which are the most horrible accidents that mencan endure; howbeit they could not abide the imagination of villany, shame, and dishonour, though it hapned not unto them, untill they were dead and gone.

The Women of CIO.

The manner and custome was for the young Virgins of Cio, to go altogether unto their publike Temples and Churches, and so to passe the time all the long day there, one with another: where their lovers who wooed them for marriage, might behold them disport and dance: and in the evening they went home to each of their houses, in order, where they waited upon their fathers and mothers, yea, and the brethren, one of another, even to the very washing of their feet. Now it happed fometimes that many young men were enamoured of one and the fame maid; but their love was io modelt, good and honeit, that io ioone as a maiden was affianced and betrothed muro one, all the rest would give over sute, and so cease to make any more love unto her: In sum, the good order and carriage of these women of Gio might be known in this: that in the space of seven hundred years, it was never known nor appeared upon record, that any wife committed adultery, nor virginity.

The Women of P HOCIS. maiden unmarried loft her virginity.

He Tyrants of Phocis Surprized upon a time and seized the City of Delphos by occasion whereof, the Thebans made that war upon them, which was called the Holy war; at which time it fo befell that the religious women confectated unto Baschus, named Thyades, being bestraught, and our of their right wits, ran wandring like vagrants up and down in the night, and knew not whither, untill cre they were aware, they ran into the City Amphiffa, where being weary (but yet not come again to their fenies) they lay along in the midft of the market place & couched, the meleyes (cattering here and and there to take their fleep: the wives of Amphila being advertised hereof, and fearing left their bodies should be abused by the souldiers of the Tyrants (wherof there lay a Garrison with in the City, for that Amphifa was of the league, & confederate with the Phocarans Iran all thinher to the place, standing round about them with filence, and not faying one word, and to long as they flept troubled them not; but to foon as they wakened of themselves, and were gotten up, they took the charge of them gave them meat, and each of them looked to one; yea, and afterwards having gotten leave of their husbands, they conveighed and accompanied them in lafety, fo far as to the mountaines and marches of their own territorie, VALERIA and CLOELIA.

He outrage committed upon the person of a Roman Lady, named Lucretia, and her vertue to-gether, were the cause that Tarquimus Superbus (the seventh King of the Romans after Roma-Im) was deprived of his royall estate, and driven out of Rome: This dame being married unto a great perionage, descended of the bloud royall, was abused and forced by one of the sons of the said King Tarquin; who was entertained and friendly lodged in her houle: by occasion of which villanous fact the called all her kinsfolke and friends rogether about her ; unto whom when the had declared and given them to understand the shamefull dishonour that he had done upon her body, she stabbed her selfe in the place before them: and Tarquin the father (for this cause being deposed from his Princely dignity, and chased out of his Kingdome) levied many wars against the Romans, thinking thereby to recover hisflate; and among the reft in the end wrought to effectually with Porfem. King of the Tuscanes, that he perswaded him to lay siege to the City of Rome, and to beleaguer it with a puissant power: Now over and besides this hostility, the Romans within, were afflicted also and lore pressed with famine; but hearing that the said Porfera was not only a valiant Captaine in armes but withall a good and righteous Prince, they were willing to make him the indifferent umpire and judge between them and Tarquin: but Tarquin standing stiffe in his own opinion, and highly conceited of himselfe, giving out also, that Porfena if he continued not a sast and constant ally he would not afterwards be a just and equall judge: whereupon Porfena fortaking him, and leaving his alliance, capitulated and promifed to depart in good tearmes of amity and peace with the Romans, upon condition to recover of them all those lands which they had occupied in Tuscane, and to have away with him those prisoners whom they had taken in those wars: now for the better affurance of this composition so concluded, there were delivered into his hands as hostages, ten boyes, and as many young maidens; among whom Valeria the daughter of Poplicala the Contull was one: which done, presently he brake up his campe and dislodged, yea, and gave over preparation of farther war; no twithstanding that all the articles of the said capitulation were not yet accomplished. These young virgins beforefaid, being in his Campe, went down as it were to bath and wash themfelves unto the river fide, which ran a good way from the Campe; and by the motion and infliga-tion of one among the rett, named Clockia; after they had wreathed their cloaths fast about their heads; they tooke the river which ran with a very strong streame and swift current, and by swimming crofe over it, helping one another what they could amid the deep channell, and furging whirlpooles thereof, until With much travell they hardly recovered the banke on the other fide. Some report, that this damofell Cloelia, made meanes to get an horse, mounted his back, and gently by little and little passed overthwart theriver, shewing the way unto the rest of herfellows, encouraging, yea, and supporting them as they swom on each side and round about her: but what the reason is of this their conjecture, I will shew anon: when the Romans saw that they were gotten overing lafety, they wondered at their boldnesse and rarevertue; howbeit they were nothing well pleased with their returne, neither could they endure to be challenged and reproached : that in fidelity and troth, they all should be inferiour to one man, and therefore gave commandement that these virgins should returne from whence they came, and sent with them a guard to conduct them; but when they were passed over the river Tybru againe, they escaped very hardly of being surprized by in ambush that Tarquin had laid for them by the way: as for Valeria the Consult Poplicola's daugher she fled at first with three servants into the Campe of Porsena: and the rest, Arnus the son of King Porfena, who ran prefently to the rescue, recovered out of the hands of the enemies : now when they were all presented and brought before the King; he demanded which of them it was, who had encouraged her companions to swim over the river, and given them counsell so to do: all the rest fearing lest the King should do Cloelia some harme, would not speake a word; but she her elfe contessed all: Porfena highly esteeming her valour and vertue, caused one of the fairest horses to be fetched out of his stable, richly trapped and set out with costly furniture, which he bestowed pon her, yea, and that which more is (for her fake, and to grace her) curreoully and kindly dif-mifed all her fellows, and fent them home. This is the guesse (I say) by which some thinke that Stockia passed over the river on horse-back: but others say no; who deliver the story thus. That the King marvelling at this valour and extraordinary hardinesse, above the proportion of that sex, shought her worthy of a present, which is wont to be given unto a valiant man at armes and a brave warrior: but how ever it was, for a memoriall of this act, there is to be feen her statue at this day, to wit, a maiden fitting on horse-backe, and it standeth in the street called Via facra, which some say, representeth Cloelia, others Valeria.

MICCA and MEGISTO.

Ristorimus having usurped tyranny and violent dominion over the Elians, bearing himselfe Amuch upon the favour and countenance of King Antigonus, established the same; but so cruelly and excessively he abused this power and authority under him, that in nothing he was tollerable; for over and befides that he was a man by nature given to violence (by reason that he stood in some servile feare, and was glad to please the guard that he had about him of mixt Barbarians, whom he had gotten together from divers parts, for the defence of his state and person) he suffered them also to commit many infolent parts and cruell outrages upon his subjects; and among the rest, that unhappy indignity which befell to Philodemnus, who had a faire damofell to his daughter, named Micca, unto whom one of the Captaines of the faid tyrant, named Lucius, seemed to make court, not for any true love and hearty affection that he bare unto her, but upon a wanton luft to abuse and dishonour her body: so he sent for this maiden to come and speake with him: her parents seeing, that whether they would or no, constrained they should be to let her go, gave her leave; but the damo-fell her selfe of a generous spirit and magnanimous heart classed them about and hung upon them, sell down at their seet, and humbly besought them, all that ever she could, rather to kil her out of hand, than to fuffer her thus shamefully to be betrayed, and villanously to be despoiled of her maideuhead : but for that she staied longer than was the good liking of the foresaid Lucius, (who burned all this whiles in luft, and had withall taken his wine liberally) he role from the table in great choler, and went himselfe toward her: when he came to the house, he found Micca with her head upon her fathers knees, and her he commanded to follow him; which she refused to do; whereupon he rent her cloaths from her body, and whipped her starke naked; and she, without giving one word againe, endured for her part with patience and tilence all the image and paine: but her father and mother, feeing, that with all their pitious prayers and tender teares, they could not prevaile nor boot anything with this wretch, turned to call and implore the help both of God and man, crying with a loud voice: Out upon such injurious indignity and intollerable villany: whereupon, this barbarous villaine (grown now to be furious and enraged, partly with choler, and inpart with drunkennesse) killed this filly poore girle, even as she couched her face in the very lapand bosome of her father: howbeit, for all this and such like wicked pranks plaied, the tyrant was nothing at all moved to pitty and compassion, but many Citizens he murdered, and more he banished and caused to leave their countrey; in such fort, that (as the speech went) no fewer than eight hundred fied to the Ætolians, craving at their hands to make meanes unto the tyrant, that they might have away their wives and little children also. Nor long after, the Tyrant of his own accord caused proclamation to be made by sound of trumper; that as many women as were willing to go unto their husbands, should make them ready and depart, yea, and carry with them as much of their goods as they would : now when he understood, that they all with great joy of this proclamation thus published, and that they were assembled together with much contentment of mind, to the number of fixe hundred, he commanded that they should depart, and put themselves in their journey all together on a certaine day by him prefixed, making semblant against that time, to provide a good convoy for their better fecurity: when the time appointed was come, they flocked thick to the gates of the City, having brought with them their truffes and fardles of such goods as they meant to have away with them, carrying some of their little babes in their armes, taking order for others for to be brought in waggons; and to they stated there, and attended one anothers comming: but suddenly, many of the souldiers and those of the tyrants guard, came running toward them, and crying aloud afar off, Stay, flay: now, when they approached neare, all the womenthey commanded to go back againe, but the waines and waggons they turned together with the hories full upon them, and drave them arrange thorow the midlt of the troupe and throng of the women, not suffering them either to follow, of to stay or succour their poore little infants, whom they saw to dyebefore their faces: for some of them perished with falling out of the chariots to the ground, others were destroyed and trampled under the horses feet; and all this while, these pensioners of the guard, with loud out-cries and with whipping, drave the women before them, like as they had been so many sheepe, and thronged them so hard, that one tumbled upon another; and thus they chased them, untill such time as they had cast them all into prison: but all their bag and baggage was seized upon, and brought unto Aristotimus. Now when the men of Elis were herewith mightily offended; the religious women confectated to the service of Bacchus, whom they call the Sixteene (carrying in their hands boughs of Olive trees, like suppliants, and chaplets of vine branches about their heads, which they tooke from the god whom they served) went to meet with Aristotimus about the Market-place of the City; his squires and pensioners about him for the guard of his body, made a lane for them, and feemed (upon some reverence) to give them way that they might come neare: and the women at first kept silence, doing nought else but in most humble and devout manner tender unto him their branches, like suppliants: but after that the tyrant understood that it was for the Eliens wives that they came thus to make supplication, and namely, that he would take some commileration of them; being wroth and displeased with his guard, he cried out upon them for suffering the said women to approach so neare unto his person; and thereupon commanded them to drive some, and to beat others, until they were all chased out of the Marketplace; and more than all this, he condemned these religious votaries in a fine of two talents a peece. During these occurrences, there was within the City one of the Burgesles, named Hellanicus, a man very farstept in age, who was the author of a conspiracy and insurrection against the tyrant; one that of all others he least distrusted, and whom he never thought likely to practise against him, both for that he was very aged, and also because but a little before he had buried two of his children: and it fortuned at the very same time, that from Eiolia the exiles before named passed into the territory of Elis, and leized upon a fort called Amymon, fituate in a very commodious place for to maintaine war; where they received and entertained many other inhabitants of the City, who immediately reforted thither, and ran apace: upon these tydings, the tyrant Aristotimus much fearing the fequel hereof, went unto their wives in prilon; and thinking to compate his defignes better by feare than favour and love he commanded them to fend unto their husbands, and to write unto them for to abandon their hold and depart out of the country, menacing the poore women, that if they did not so, he would cause their children first to be mangled with whips, and so killed before their face, and then put themselves also to death; all of them were silent a good while, and notwithstanding he importuned them a long time, and urged them to speake at once whether they would do it or no? They looked one upon another without faying a word, giving him thereby to understand, that they stood in no feare, and were not associated for all his threats: at the last, one of them, named Megisto, wife to Timoleon, and a woman whom the rest regarded and held as their captainnesse, as well in respect of her husbands honour, as her own vertue, deigned not to rise up from her feat her felfe, nor fuffered any of the rest to stand up; but sitting still in her place, thus said, If thou were a wife man thou wouldst not dealerhus as thou dost between women and their hufbands, but rather fend unto them, as to those who have the power and authority over their wives, and to deliver unto them better speeches than such, whereby thou hast deceived us; now if (being past hope to perswade them) thou thinkest to circumvent and delude them by the means of us, never looke that thou shalt abuse us any more northinke that they will be so ill advised, or so base minded, as that for to spare their wives and little children they will abandon and lose the liberty of their countrey: for furely the loffe of us will not be to them fo much, confidering that they now enjoy us not, as the gaine and benefit, in delivering their countrey and fellow-citizens from fuch outragious cruelty. Whiles Megisto entertained Aristotimus with these speeches, he could no longer endure, but commanded her little son to be brought before him, for to murder him before her eyes; and when the pensioners about the tyrant searched for him among other little boyes that were playing and wreftling together, his mother called unto him by name, faying, Come hither to me my boy, that thou maiest be delivered from the cruelty of this tyrant before thou hast any sense or understanding to know what tyranny is: for a greater griefe it would be unto meanother day to fee thee for to ferve like a flave unworthily, than to dye here presently: hereat Aristotimus through impatience of furious anger, drew his tword upon the woman her felfe, meaning to run her thorow; but one of his familiar friends, named Cylon (who made femblant to be true and faithfull unto him, but hated him secretly in his heart, and indeed was of the complices in that conspiracy of Hellaniess Atepped beforehim, and by his effectual prayers turned his hand, making remonstrance unto him, that it was no generous and manly deed, but a womanish act : neither savoured it of a Prince to mini, matter was no game who we to mannage great affaires of State, to deale in that fort, which he forced and pressed so instantly that hardly and with much ado though it were, Aristoniau was of a better mind, bethought himselfe and went his way. Now there betell unto him a frange accident, which presaged what mitchiefe was toward him; for about high noone it was, when being in his bed-chamber, and repofing himfelfe with his wife, whiles his dinner was now ready to be ferved up those of his houshold might perceive an eagle soaring round over his house; and she let fall abig stonedirectly upon the very place of the roofe of the said chamber where he lay, as if upon deliberate purpose she had aimed and levelled as it were so to do, himselfe hearing the noiseand rap that the stone gave upon the house top over him head, and withall, the outcry beneath of those who beheld the foule, was mightily affrighted, and demanded what the matter might be? when he understood what it was; he tent prefently for the wizard or foothfayer, whom he was wont to memory what a was, he left precedy to the wheat of homelet, whole the was worked bein such cases, and all troubled and perplexed in spirit, asked him what this signe might prelage? The soothsyer comforted him, and willed him to be of good cheare, saying unto himselfe: That is was Jupiter who wakened him, and shewed how willing he was to affift and succour him; but unto other Citizens whom he might trult, he expounded it otherwife, and affured them that it was the vengeance of God, which speedily would light upon the tyrants head : whereupon Hellanicus and his adherents were refolved to defer the execution of their defignes no longer, but to fet upon the enterpriethe next morrow: in the night that came between, Hellanicus as he flept, dreamed, and in that vision he thought, that one of his sons, late deceased, stood before him, and said, Father, what meane you to lie affeep, confidering that once to morrow you must be Captaine Generall and foveraigne Governour of this City: Hellanicus wonderfully encouraged by this vision, started up, and went to follicite the rest of his Complices and companions in the said conspiracy. By this time was Aristotimus advertised that Graterus was comming to aide him with a puissant Army, and lay encamped neare to Olympia; in the affurance and confidence whereof, he prefently tooke Cylon withhin, and went forth without any guard about his person: Hellanieus seeing the opportunity now offered, and taking the vantage thereof, gave not the fignall and watchword which was a greed upon, with those who first were to set to the execution of their intended enterprize; but firetching forth both his hands with a lond voice cried out: Now, now, my Masters and valiant men, what flay you for? Can you defire a fairer theater to shew your valour in, than to fight for the defence of your liberty, in the very heart of your native Countrey? At which words Cylen drew his fword first, and imote one of them that followed and accompanied Aristotimus; but Thrasibulus and Langis came afront, and ranupon the tyrant himfelfe, who preventing the venue of their stroke, fled for refuge and fanctuary into the temple of Jupiter, where they flew him out-right, and drew his dead corps into the Market place; and then affembled all the Citizens thither for to recover their freedome: but many of the people could not prevent the women; for they ran out with the first in great alactity, weeping and crying out for very joy, and environing their husbands round about, crowned them, and fet chaplets of flowers upon their heads: then the multitude of the common people fet upon the tyrants houle, and affaulted it; his wife having thut her felfe within her chamber, there hung her felfe, and whereas she had two daughters, virgins as yet, but in the prime and flower of their yeares, ready for marriage; those they tooke, and by force haled them out of the house, with full intent to kill them; in the end after they had abused their bodies first, and then perpetrated all the villany and shame they could devise unto them; which no doubt they would have put in execution, but that Megifto, with other honest matrons of the City, opposed themselves and came between, who cried aloud unto them; that into doing they should commit an indignity unbeforeming them, it confidering, that now being in the very traine and high-way of recovering their liberty, for to live from henceforth in a popular government, they should perpetrate as violent outrages, as the most bloudy and cruell tyrants are used to commit: the people in good respect and reverence to the honour and authority of this vertuous and honest dame, who pake hermind so frankly unto them with teares gushing out of hereyes, were reclaimed and advised to offer no abuse nor villany unto their persons; but to put unto their sword what death they would dye? and when they had brought them both back againe into the houle, and intimated unto them, that there was no other remedy but dye they must, and that presently; the elder of the twaine, named Myro, untied her girdle from about her waste, and with a running noose did it about her own neck immanner of an halter; then kissing and embracing her younger sister, she praied her to marke what she did, and according to her example to do thereafter: To the end (quoth she) that we may not die basely, unworthy the place from whence we are come and descended: but the younger defired againe, that she might dye first, caught hold of the girdle and inatched it from her; then the elder, Well sister (quoth she) I never yet refused to do any thing that you defined at my hands; and even now content I amto do so much for you as to endure and suffer that which will be more grievous unto me than death it selfe namely to see my most deare and best beloved fister to die before me; which said, she her selfe taught her how to fit the said girdle to her neck, and to knit it for the purpose, and when the perceived once that the life was out of her body, the tooke her down and covered her breathlesse orps: then addressing her speech unto dame Megisto her selfe, she besonght her, that she would not unser her body after the was dead, to lye shamefully above the ground, and not interred: the sight hereof, and the words withall were so patheticall, that there was not one present in hard hearted, or so spightfully and maliciously bent against the Tyrant, but deplored their wossile state, and pitted the generosity and magnanimity of their two young Ladies. Now abbeit there he infinite presidents of noble deeds, that in old time, women have done in companies together; yet me thinks these few examples which I have already delivered may suffice: from hencetout therefore I will rehearse the particular vertuous acts of severall women by themselves, as they come statering into my remembrance (for Isuppose that such narrations and histories as these, do not require of necessity the precise order and consequence of the times.

PIERIA.

F those Ionians who were come to dwell in the City of Miletum, some chanced to be at va-Oriance and debate with the children of Nolems; by occasion whereof in the end they thought the City too horfor them, and confrained they were to remove and retire themselves into the City Mym, where they made their abode and habitation; and yet even therealfo, much molested they were and troubled by the Milesians, who warred upon them, for their revolt and apostalie : howbeit this war was not so bloudy and mortall, but that they used to send one unto another, yea, and to communicate and negotiate reciprocally in divers things: for even upon certaine tolemne and festivall daies the wives and women of Myu would repaire boldly unto Miletum: now among these Myuntines, there was a Nobleman and of great name, one Pythes, who had to wife a Lady called Japygia, by whom he was father of a faire daughter, cleped Pieria: when as therefore the great feaft unto Diana and a folemne facrifice called Neleus, was celebrated by the Milefians: Pythes, fent thither unto this folemnity, his wife and daughter aforesaid, for they had requested leave of him to be partakers of the fealt. It fortuned whiles they were there, that one of the fons of Neless (a man of most credit and greatest authority in the City) named Phrygius, cast a fancy to Pieria; and in courting her after the manner of lovers, defired to know of her what it might be wherein he might gratifie her most, and best content her, unto whom she answered. If Sir you will so bring about that I my selfe with many more may oftentimes resort hither, you shall do me the greatest pleasure that that you can devise: Phrygim (conceiving presently what her meaning was, namely, that there might be continuall peace and amity between those two Cities) wrought so, that he composed the war on both fides: in regard hereof Pieria was highly effeemed and honoured in both Cities; in fuch wife, that unto this day the Milesian da mesdo wish ordinarily and pray unto the gods, that they they may be well beloved, as Pieria was of Phrygius.

POLT CRITE.

There was in times past war between the Naxians and the Milesians, about Neara the wife of Hippicreon, and the same arose upon this occasion. This Neara was enamoured upon Promedon, a Naxian, infomuch as she would embarke, take the sea, and saile with him: for why? an ordinary guest he was of Hypsicreous, and used to lodge in his house whensoever he came to Miletum: yea, and secretly she had him to lye with her, she loved him so well: but in proces of time when the feared that her husband perceived it, he faire tooke her cleane away with him to Naxos, where he ordained, that she should be a suppliant of Vesta. Hypsicreon sent for her againe; but when the Naxians in favour of Promedon refused to render her, alleaging for a colourable pretence of their excute the priviledge and franchifes of suppliants: hereupon the war began between them; in which quarrell the Erythræans favoured the Milesians very affectionately, and sided with them, insomuch as it grew to a long and lingering war, and many mileries and calamities that follow wars, it drew withall, as well to the one part as the other; untill at last the quarrell was finally ended by the vertue of one woman, like as it began first by the vice and wickednesse of another. For Diognetus the Captaine Generall of the Erythraans, (unto whom was committed the charge of keeping a fort feated upon a very commodious place to armoy and endammage the Naxians) made rodes and incurfions into their territory, wherewith many other huge booties that he drave and carried away, he took and led as his prisoners many maidens and wives of good houses and parentage; among whom there was one named Polycrine, whom himselfe fancied and sell in love with; her he kept and entertained not like a captive or priloner, but as if the had been his espoused wife: now it fortuned that the day was come when the Milesians lying in campe, were to solemnize a great feast; by reason whereof they sell to drinking freely and making good cheare, inviting one another as the manner was : then Polycrite asked Captaine Diognetus, whether he would be offended if the should fend certaine Tarts, Pies, and Cakes, provided for that feast, unto her brethren? who answered : that he not only permitted, but also willed her so to do: she taking the opportunity of good occasion, put within one of these Tarts a little thin plate of lead which was written upon, charging him expressely who had the carriage thereof, to say unto her brethren, that in any case none but they should taste of the said cakes or tarts: this message was done accordingly, and when they came to cate the tarts, they found within one a writing of their fifters; whereby the advertised and advised them not to fail, but that very night to come and affail their enemies, for that they through finder them in great diforder, without featine and expressing without any watch and ward at ally interest than they were all drunk by occasion of the goodscheer than they had made authat feat: having this intelligence, they prefently acquainted the Captains General of the Nations army therewith, praye ing them to enterprize this fervice by their direction and with them: thus were the Erythman dirifed of their throughold, and a great number of them within, put to the fword: but Pelevini craved Diegnetus of her fellow Citizens, and by that meanes faved his life; nove when the approach ched near unto the gates of Naxos, feeing all the inhabitants comming forth to meet her with exceeding great joy and mirth, putting garlands of flowers upon her head, and chaunting fongs of her praises, her heart was not able to endure so great joy; for she died at the very gate of the City, where afterwards she was enterred and entombed; and her monument was called, the Sepulcher of Envy, as if there had been some envious sortune, which had grudged unto Policiae, the thurson of so great glory and honour. Thus the Hilloriographers of Navo have delivered this nativities. how beit (Arifforte faith) that Polycrite was nevertaken prifoner; but Diognerse having had a fight of her by fome other meanes, became enamoused upon her fo far, that he was ready to give justo. her, and to do forthe love of her, whatfoever the would a alforhat the promind to go with thin, in case he would agree and grant one thing, and (as the faid Philosopher tellech the tale) thereppon the required of him an obligation of his oath; and after he had faithfully fworm unto her, the demanded that he should deliver unto her the Cassle Delio ; for that was the name of the fort or piece whereofhe had the charge, otherwise she said that she would never come in bed with him i where's upon he (as well for the great defire that he had to enjoy her love, as in regard of his forefaid bath, by which he was bound and obliged) quit the place and rendeted it into the hands of Polacillet who presently delivered it up unto her country men and fellow Citizens; by which means they being now able once againto make their parts good with the Milefians, made an accord and concluded peace, under what conditions they defired themselves.

LAMPSACE.

N the City Phocas, there were fometimes two brethren twins, of the house and family of the Codride; the one named Phobus, the other Blepfus; of which twain, Phohas was the fift that according as Charan the Chronicker of Lampfacum doch record) cash himless from the high socks and cliffes of Lampha through the high socks and the high socks are highly socked and the high socks and the high socks and the high socks and ther he went ; where he contracted amity, alliance and hospitality with Mandow Ring of the Bebrycians, furnamed Piryceffenes and by vertue of this new league he aided them, and in their behalfe made war with them, against other harbarous people their neighbours, who did them wrong and wrought them much damage: afterwards (when he was upon his departure and teturn home) Mandron among many other courtefies and tokens of kindnesse which he bestowed upon him, now ready to embark and take the sea, offered him the one moity of his Countrey and City, if he would come and dwell in the City Pinyaffa, with somepast of the Phocaans, for to people the place! whereupon Phobas after he was come home again to Phocas, proposed this matter unit the Phocas aris his Citizens; and having perswaded them to accept of the offer; he senth's own brother; as Leader and Captain to conduct this Colony of new inhabitants; who upon their first arrival and comming thither, found themselves as well entreated, and as courteously entertained as they could wish or look for at Mandron his hands : but in tract of time, after that they had gotten many advansages at the Barbarians hands, their neighbours and borderers, wandivers bootles from them; and gained much pillage and spoile; they began to be envied first, and afterwards to be dread and feared of the Bebrycians; who being defirous for to berid and delivered of fuch guests, dust not addreffe themselves unto Mandron, whom they knew to be an honest and just man, for to perswade him to practice any difloyalty or treachety, against men of the Greek nation; but espying a time when he was ablene and out of the Country; they completted and prepared to surprize the Phoexens by a wile, and to to dispatch them all at once out of the way: but Lampface (the daughter of Mustern a maiden yet unmarried, having some fore-inkling and intelligence of this forelayed am-buffi laboured and dealt, first with her familian friends to divert them from so wicked an enterprize, fliewing and proving unto them, that it was a damnable act before God, and abominable among meny to proceed for reacherously against their allies & confederares, who had been ready at all times to aid and affalt them in their need against their enemies, and besides, were now incorporate with them, and their fellow-Citizens: but when the faw that there would no good be dope, and that the could not diffwade them from it the acquainted the Greeks under-hand with this reason; which was a warping against them, and advised them to look unto themselves, and stand upon their own guard: fo the Photzans made a folemn facrifice and a publick feaff, invited the Physellenes to come out of the City into the hiburbs to take part thereof; and themselves they divided into two troops whereof the one feired the walls of the City, while the intrabitants were at the feaft, mean time the other were bulle in maffacting the guests that w. re bidden to it; and by this means they became mathere of the whole City, and fent for Mandron, whom they defired to participate with them in their confidels and affaits: as for Lampface his daughter, who fortuned to die of ficknesse, they interred magnificently, and in memorial of that good which she did unto them, called the City after her name Lamplacum; howbeit Mandron because he would not be suspected to have been a Traitor unto his own people, would not consert o dwel among them, but required to have of them, the Wives and Children of them who were dead; whom they sent unto him with all speed and diligence, without doing any harm or displeasure at all unto them: as for Lamplace unto whom before they had ordained heroick honours; they decreed for ever to satrifice unto her as unto a goddesse, and even to this day they do continue and observe the same divine worship unto her.

ARETAPHILA.

Recaphile of Cyrene, was none of them that lived in ancient time, but lately in the dayes of King Mitbridates; but the thewed vertue, and performed an act comparable to the magnanian mons counsels and designs of the most autick demi-goddesses that ever were: daughter she was to Aglator, and wifeto Phadimus, both noble men and great personages; fair and beautiful of visage, of deep conceit and high reach, and namely, in matters of estate, and affairs of government well experienced: the publick calamities of her country did illustrate her name, and caused her to be well known and voiced in the world: for Nicrocrates having ulurped the tyranny of Cyrene, put to death many of the chiefe and principal men of the City, and among the reft; one Melanippus the high Priest of Apollo, whom he flew with his own hands, for to enjoy his Priethood: he did to death allo Phesimus the husband of Aretaphila, and not content the rewith married her perforce, and sgainft her will: this tyrahe over and above an infinite number of other cruelties which he dayly committed, set certain warders at every gate of the City; who when there was carried forth any dead corps to burial out of the City, abused the same, with digging into the soles of their feet, with the points of their daggers and poniards, or ele with feating them with red hot irons ; for fear that, any of the inhabitants should be conveyed alive out of the City, undercolour of being borne to thegrave as dead : private and particular croffes had Aretaphila no doubt, which were grievous unto her, and hardly to be endured, although the tyrant was otherwise kind enough unto her, and led her a faire life, letting her have her own will, for the love he bare unto her s. infomuch as the tyrant suffered her to enjoy a great part of his puissance and regal power; for love had enthralled and subdued him amto her, and not one there was but the alone who knew how to use and handle him; forto all the others he was untractable, inflexible, and favage beyond all measure: but it grieved her most ofall, to fee her native country fo miferably abused, and so unworthily entreated by this tyrant ; for there was not one day went over his head, but he caused to be executed one Citizen or other, neither was there to be seen any hope of revenge or deliverance out of these calamities on any side; for that the exiled persons and such as fled, being weak and feeble every way, and altogether heartlesse and fearful, were feattered some in this place, others in that. Areaphila therefore (building upon her felle alone, the only hope of recovering and raising the state of the Common-weale, and proposing the magnanimous and renowned acts of Thebe, the wife of the tyrant of Phere; as examples to imitate ; but wanting and destitute altogether of faithful friends and trusty kinsfolk for to, help and second her in any enterprize, such as the present times and affairs did afford unto the other) assayed to make away the tyrant by some poylon; but as she was about the provision hereof, and affayed to make proof of the forces of many strong poylons, she could not carry her delign so secretly but it came forth, and was discovered: now when the thing was averted and evidently proved by strong presumptions: Calbin the mother of Nicorates (abloody woman, and of nature implacable) thought to have her put to many exquiste torments, and then to bring her soon after to her death; but the affection that Niever stee bare unto her wrought some delay in revenge, and dulled the edge of his anger, and withal Aretaphila, (who constantly and resolutely offered herselle to answerall imputations that were laid unto her charges) gave some colourable excuse unto the passionate affection of the tyrant: but in the end feeing that the was convinced by certain proofs and evidences, which the knew not how to answer, neither could the denythat the had some drugs in her closet, and did temper certain medicines; but confessed that indeed she had prepared certain drugs, yet fuch as were neither deadly nor dangerous: But my good Lord (quoth the unto her husband the ty-ram.) I am much perplexed and troubled with many things of great confequence, and namely how to preferve the good opinion which you have of mesthekind affection also which of your gracious fayour you bear unto me, by means whereof, I have this honor, as to enjoy a good part of your power and authority jointly with you; this maketh me to be envied of wicked women, at whose hands I (fearing forceries, charms, enchantments, and other cunning divellish casts, by which they would go about to withdraw, and diffract you from the love that you bear me) resolved at the length with my felf for to feek means how to meet, encounter, and prevent their devices; foolish peradventure they may be(as indeed the very inventions of a woman) but in no wife worthy of death; unless haply, Sir (in your judgmens) it be just and reasonable to put your wife to death, for that she mindeth to give you some love drinks, and amatorious cups, ordeviseth some charms, as desirous to be more loved of you then haply it is your pleasure for to love her. Nicocrates, having heard these excuses alledged by Aretaphila, thought good & refolved to put her to torture, whereat Cathia her mother was prefent, who never releated not feemed to be touched with her dolorous torments, but remained inexorable: now when the was laid upon the rack, and asked lundry questions, sheyeelded not unto the pains that the fulfamed, but continued invincible, and confessed no fault in the height of all extremities; until at length Calbia her felfe, even against her will was forced to give over tormenting her any longer ; and Nicrocrates let her go, being now fully perswaded, that the excuses alledged by her were true and to be credited, repenting that he had put her to such pain as he did and it was not long after (to deeply was the passion of love imprinted in his heart) but he returned to her and assayed to win her grace and good will again, by all honours, favours, courtefies and kindnesse that possibly he could shew unto her; but she, who had the power and strength to resist all torments and veeled unto no pains, would not be overcome with all his flatteries; But joining now unto her former defire of doing some vertuous deed, the animosity for to be revenged and to effect her purpose, assayed other means. One daughter the had marriageable, and beautiful the was beudes; her the inborned and let as an alluring bait to entrap and catch the tyrants brother, a young Gentleman, ease to be caught with the pleasures and delight of youth: and many are of opinion; that the uled certain charms and amatorious potions, as well as the object of her daughters beauty whereby the enchanted and bewitched the wits and ienies of this young man, whom they called Leander: when he was once enamoured with the love of this young damoiel, he prevailed to much by prayers and entreatywith his brother, that he permitted him to wed her no fooner was he matried but his fresh pointe maying inflinctions before hand from her mother) began to be in hand with him, and to perlivade him for to enterprize the recovery of freedom unto the City, shewing by good remonstrance, that himselfe enjoyed not liberty, so long as he lived under tyranny, neither had he power of himselfe, either to wed a wife, or to keep her when he had her, if it pleased not the tyrant on the other fide, his friends and other of his familiar acquaintance, for to gratifie Arctaphila and to do her pleasure, repaired unto him continually, forging fome new matter of quarrels and suspitions against his brother the tyrant; when he perceived that Arctaphila was also of the same mind, and had ther shand therein, he relolved to execute the enterprize i and thereupon he let one Diphais, a lervant of his own, in hand with the businesse, by whose means he killed Nicocrates : but after he was thus murdered, Leander would no more be advised by sireaphila, nor follow her counsel in the rest; but; shewed incontinently by his deportments and carriage in all actions, that a brother indeed he had murdered, but not killed a tyrant: for in his own government, he bare himselfelike a foole, and ruled infolently and furioufly: howbeir, unto Aretaphila he shewed alwayes some honour and reverence; conferring upon her some part of his authority in management of State affaires ? For that the made no femblant at all of discontentment, nor directly and in open manner feemed to warre against him, but privily practifed, and cunningly disposed alls for first and foremost, she raised warre upon him out of Lybia, by the meanes of a Prince there, named Anahia, betweene whom and her there passed secret intelligence: him shee sollicited and perswaded to invade this Country, and with a puissant Army to approach the City Cyrene: then the buzzed into Leanders' head, certain furmizes and suspitions of disloyalty in his Peers, his Friends and Captaines; giving him to underland, that their hearts flood not to this warre, but that they loved peace and quietnesse rather; Which (quoth she) to say a trnth, as things now stand, were better for you and for the establishment of your royal State and Dominion, in case you would ru'e indeed, hold under, and keep in aw, your Subjects and Citizens: and for mine own part, I hold it good policy for you to make meanes for a Treaty of peace, which I will labour to effect, and for that purpose bring you and Anabus together, to an interview and parly (if you think to good) before that you grow to farther terms of hostility and open war, which may breed a mischiefe, that afterwards will admit no cure nor remedy. This motion the handled and followed with fuch dexterity that Leander condescended thereto; and she her selse in person went to confer with the Lybian Prirce, whom the requelled, that fo foon as ever they were met together to treat of this pretended accord, he should arrest the tyrant as his prisoner; and to do this eat, she promised him great gifts and prefents, befides a good reward in money: the Lybian foon accorded hereto : now Learder made fome doubt at first to goe into this perly, and stayed a while, but afterwards (for the good respect that he had unto Aretophila, who promited in his behalf. that he should come to conference) he set forward, naked without Armes and without his guards: when he approached the place appointed for this enterview, and had a fight once of Andous, his heart milgave him again; and being much troubled and perplexed, he would not go on, but faid he would flay for his guard: howbeit, Aretaphila, who was there present, partly encouraged him, and in part rebuked and checked him, taying That he would be taken and reputed for a base minded coward, and disloyal person, who made no account of his word, if he should now flinch and start back: at the last, when they were at point to meet; the layed hold upon him, plucked him forward by the hand, and with great boldness & resolution haled him, until the had delivered him into the hands of the barbarous Prince: then immediately was he apprehended, and his body attached by the Lybians who kept himbound as a prisoner, and set a strait guard about him, until such time as the friends of Aretaphila with other Civizens of Cyrene, were come to the camp, and brought the money and gifts unto her which she had promised unto Anabus. For so soon as it was known in the City that Leander was taken prisoner and in sure hold a number also of the multitude ran forth to the place appointed of conferen e: and to soon as they had set an eye on Aretaphila, they went within a little offorgetting all their anger and malice which they bare unto the tyrant, thinking that the revenge and exemplary punishment of him was but acceffary and by-matter; as being nom wholly amused upon exemplary punitures and supposing the principal fruition of their liberty consisting in saluring and greeting her most kindly, and with so great joy, that the rears ran down their cheeks, infomuch as they were ready to kneel, yea, and cast themselves down prostrate at her feet, no lesse their before the lacred image and flatue of a goddeffe: thus they flocked unto her, by troops out of the City the later image and nature of a government as it was well in the evening before they could advise with themselves to feize upon the perion of Leander, and hardly before dark night did they bring him with them into the City. Now after they were well farisfied with giving all manner of praises, and doing what honour they could devise unto Aretaphila, in the end they turned to consultation what was best to be done with the tyrants? fo they proceeded to burn Calbia quick; and as for Leander, was bert to be uble. Within the standard fewed it up close, and then cash frimto the sea. Then ordained and decreed it was, that Aretaphila should have the charge and administration of the Weale publicks with some other of the principal personages of the City joined in commission with her: but the (as one who had played many fundry parts already upon the flage fo well, that the had gotten the garland and crown of victory) when the faw that her country and City was now fully free, and the garrand and crown or vectory or not into the data that the day were clothered up with women only, and would no more intermeddle in the affairs of State abroad; but the felf of her life the passed in peace and repose with her kinsfolk and friends, without setting her sesse any busnesse, lave only to her wheele, her web, and such womens works.

CAMMA.

Here were in times past, two most puissant Lords and Tetrarchs of Galaria, who also were in blood of kin one to the other, Sinatus and Synoria, Sinatus had esponsed a young virgin named Camma, and made her his wife; a Lady highly effeemed of as many as knew her, as well for the beauty of her perion, as the flower of her age; but admired much more in regard of her vertue and honesty; for she had not only a tender respect of her owingood name and honour, carried an affe-ctionate love and true heart unto her husband; but also, she was write magnanimous, and palling well beloved of all her Subjects and Tenants, in regard of her gentle nature, and her debonair and wen betover of an its supers and that which made her better reputed and more tenowned, was this; that she was a most religious Priestesse of Diams (a goddesse whom the Galatians most devously honour and worship) and also in every solemn procession and publick sacrifice, she would alwayer be feen abroad most sumptuosly fet out; and stately addried. It fortuned so, that Synoria was enamoured of this brave dame, but being not able to bring about his purpose and to enjoy her, neither by faire means nor foul, perswade he, or menace what he could, to long as her husband lived: the divel put in his head, to commit a most heinous and detectable fact: for he laid wait for Simatus. and treacherously murthered him: he stayed not long after, but he sell to wooing of Camma, and courting her by way of marriage; she made her abode within the temple at that time, and took the infamous act committed by Synorix, not piteoully, and as one cast down and dejected therewith, but with a flout heart and a flomach moved to anger, and yet confiderately, waiting the time and opportunity of revenge: On the other fide, Synorix followed his fute very earnestly, folliciting and entreating importunately: neither feemed he to alledge vain and frivolous reasons. but fuch as carried some colourable pretence of honesty: namely, that he had alwayes shewed himselse a man of more valour and worth then Sinatus; and whereas he took away his life, induced he was thereto for the exceeding love that he bare to Camma, and not moved thereto by any malice otherwise. This young dame at thefirst feemed to deny him, but yether denials were not very churlish, and such, as he might take for his final answer; for dayly by little and little, she made semblant that the relensed and inclined unto him, for that divers kinsfolk and friends also of hers, joined with him to second his sute, who (for to gratifie and do pleasure unto Synorix, a man of the greatest credit and authority in his country) perswaded, yea and forced her to yeeld unto this match: To be short, in the end she gave her consent, and Synorix was sent for to come unto her, where she kept her resiance that in the presence of the said goddesse, the contract of marriage might passe, and the espousals be solemnized: when he was come, she received and welcomed him with an amiable and gracious countenance, lead him unto the very Altar of Diana, where religiously and with great ceremony she poured forth before the goddes, a little of a potion which the had prepared, out of a bowle; the one part thereof she drunk her selfe, and the other she gave unto Synoriz for to drink: now this potion was made mingled with rank poylon; when the law that he had taken his draught, she serched a loud and evident groun, doing reverence also timto the goddesse: I protest and call thee to winefle (quoth she, most powerfull and honourable goddesse, that I have not survived Sinatas, for any other cause in the world, but only to see this day, neither have I had any joy of my life all this while that I have fived fince. But only integrat of hope that one day I might be reven-ged of his death, which feeing that now I have effected. I go most gladly and joyfully unso that iweet husband of mine; and as for thee (most accurred and wicked wretch in the world) give order to thy kinsfolk and friends, in flead of a nuprial bed, to provide a grave for thy burial; the Calatian (hearing these words, and beginning withal to feele the operation of the poison, and how it wrought & troubled him within his bowels & all parts of his body; mounted presently his chariot, hoping that by the jogging and agitation thereof, he might vomit and cast up the poylon; but immediately he alighted agains, and put himselse into an ease litter: but did he what he could, dead he was that very evening; as for Camma, she continued all the night languishing, and when she heard for certainty that he was deceased, she also with joy and mirth departed out of this world,

STRATONICE.

The felle fame province of Galatia afforded two other dames worthy of eternal memory, to wit, Stratonice the Wife of King Deiotarus, and Chiomaruthe Wile of Ortingon: as for Stratonice, the (knowing that the King her Husband was defirous to have chidren lawfully begotten; for leave to be his fucceffors and inheritors of the Crown, and yet could have none by her) prayed and intreated him to try another woman, and beget a Child of her body, yea, and permitted that it fhould be put unto her, and he would take it upon her as her own: Deiotarus wondered minch it this refolution of hers, and was content to do allthings according to her mind: whereupon fhee chose (among other captives taken prisoner in the wars) a proper fair maiden named El. Atra, whom she brought into Deiotarus bed Chamber, and shut them in both together: and all the Children which this Concubine bare unto him, his wife reared and brought up with as kind an affection, and as Princelike, as if she had borne them her selse.

CHIOMARA.

T what time as the Romans, under the conduct of Cn. Scipio, defeated the Galatians that in-A habit in Asia; it befel that Chiomara the wife of Ortiagon, was taken priloner with other Galatian women: the Captain whose captive she was, made use of his fortune did like a souldier and abused her body, who as he was a man given unto his slessly pleasure, so he looked also as much, or rather more unto his profit and filthy lucre; but so it fell out, that overtaken he was and entrapped by his own avarice: for (being promifed by the woman a good round quantity of gold, for to deliver her out of thraldome and set her at liberty; he brought her to the place which she had appointed for to render her and fer her free; which was at a certain bank by the river fide, where the Galatians should passe over, tender him the said money, and receive Chiomara: but she winked with her eye, and thereby gave a fignal to one of her own company for to kill the faid Roman Caprain, at what time as he should take his leave of her with a kisse and friendly farewel; which the party did with his fword, and at one stroak setched off his head: the head she her selfe took up, and wrapped it in the lap of her gown before, and to gat her away apace homeward: when the was come to her husbands house, down she cast his head at his feet, whereathe being assonied. Ah my fweet wife (quoth he) it is a good thing to keep faithful promife: True (quoth she) but it is better, that but one man alive should have my company. Polybins writeth of the same woman, that himselfe talked with her afterwards in the City of Sardis, and that he found her then to be a woman of an high mind, and of wonderful deep wit. But fince I am fallen to the mention of the Galatians, I will rehearse yet one story more of them.

AWoman of PERGAMUS.

KIng Mithridates fent upon a time for threeft ore of the principal Lords of Galaxia, to repair unto him upon trust and safe conduct as friends, into the City Pergamus: whom being come at his request, he entertained with proud and imperious speeches, whereat they all took great from and indignation, infomuch as one of them named Toredorix (aftrong and tall man of his hands, and befides wonderful couragious, Tetrarch of the Tossepians country) undertook one day this enterprise, to fet upon Mithridates, at what time as he fat in judgement, and gave audience from the tribunal feat in the publick place of exercise, and both him and seat together to tumble down headlong into the pit underneath: but it fortuned that the King that day came not abroad as his manner was, up into that place of open exercise, but commanded all those Galatian Lords, to come and speak with him at his houle: Toredorix exhorted them to be bold and confident, and when they were altogether in his presence, to run upon him from every side, to tear him in pieces and make an end of him: this plot was not projected fo closely, but it came to Mithridates eats, who caused them all to be apprehended, and sent to chop offall their heads one after another: but immediately after, he called to remembrance that there was one young Gentleman among the reft, for the flower of his years, for beauty also, and feature of body, the good lieft person that he had set eye on in his days; whom he took pity of, and repented that he had condemned him to die with his fellows, shewing evidently in his countenance, that hee was mightily greeved and disquieted in hismind, as thinking verily that he was executed already with the first: howbeit, at a very venture hee sent in all haste a countermand, that if he were yet alive, hee should be spared and let go: this young mans name was Bepolitanus; and verily his fortune was most strange and wonderful: for had away hee was to the place of execution in that habit wherein he was attached, and the same was a very faire and rich sute of apparel, which because the butcherly executioner defired to referve clean and unsprent with blood, he was somewhat long about the stripping of him out Mm 3 of it; and whiles he was so doing he might perceive the Kings men come running apace toward him, and with a lond voice naming Bepolitamus. See how coveroninesse, which had been the death of many a thousand, was the means beyond all expectation, to savethe life of this young gentlemans after Toredonias, after he was cruelly mangled with many a chop and hack, his body was cast forth unburied to the dogs; neither durth any of his friends come neer fortoenter it: one woman only of Perg.mus., whom this Galatian in his life time had known, in regard of her fresh youth and beauty, was so hardy as to hazard the taking of his dead corps away, and to bury it; which when the warders and watchmen perceived, they attached her, and brough the to the King: and it is reported that Mitbridates at the very first fight of her, had compassion for that she seemed to be a young and a simple harmlesse were hevery way; but when he understood withal that love was the very cause thereof, his heart melted so much the rather; whereupon he gave her leave to take up the body, and commit it to the earth, allowing her for that purpose funeral cloaths, and surnishing her at his own charges, with all other things meet for comely and decent burial.

TIMOCLIA.

Heagines the Theban, carried the like mind and purpose for the defence of his country and the common-wealth, as sometimes Epaminondas, Pelopidas, and the bravest men in the world had done; but his fortune was to fall in that common ruine of Greece, when as the Greeks loft than unfortunate battel before Charonea; and yet for his own part he was a victor, and followed them in chaie, whom he had disarrayed and put to flight; for he it was who when one of them that fled cried out unto him: How far wilt thou pursue and follow us; answered: Even as far as into Macedonic: but when he was dead, a fifter of his who furvived him, gave good testimony, that in regard as well of his ancestors vertue, as his own natural disposition, he had been a worthy personage, and worthy to be reckoned and renouned amongst the most valiant Knights in his dayes; for some fruit received and reaped she of vertue, which helped her to bear and endure patiently as much of the common miseries of her country as touched her; for after that Alexander the Great had won the City of Thebes by affault, and the fouldiers ran to and fro into all parts of the town, pilling and ranfacking whatfoever they could come by: it chanced that one feized upon the house of Timeclin, a man who knew not what belonged to honour, honefly, or common courtefie and civility, but was altogether vio ent, furious, and out of reason; a Captain he was of a Coronet of Thracian light hossemen; and carried the name of King Alexander his Lord and Mafter, but nothing like hewas unto him in conditions; for having filled himselse with wine after supper, and good cheer, without any respect unto the race and linage of this noble dame, without regard of her estate and calling; he was in hand with her to be his bed-fellow all that night, neither was this all; for he would needs fearth and know of her, where the had laid up and hoarded any gold or filver, one while threatning to kill her, unleffe the would bring him to it, another while bearing her in hand that he would make her his wife, if she would yeeld unto him: she taking vantage of this occasion which himselfe offered and presented unto her: It might have pleased the gods (quoth she) that I had died before this night, rather then remain alive; for though I had loft all befides, yet my body had been undefiled and faved from all violence and villany: but fince it is my fortune, that hereafter I must repute you for my Lord, my Master, and my Husband, and seeing it is Gods will to give you this puissance and soveraignty over me, I will not deprive and disappoint you of that which is yours, and as for my lelfe, I see well, that my condition from henceforth must be such as you will; I was wont indeed to have about me, costly jewels and ornaments for my body; I had filver inplate, yea, and some gold in good coin and other ready money; but when I saw that the City was lost, I willed my women and maid fervantsabout me to get all together, and so I cast it away, or rather indeed to say a truth, I best owed it, and reserved it in safety within a dry pit, wherein no water is, an odd blind corner I may fay to you, that few or none do know; for that there is a great stone lieth over the mouth of it, and amany of trees grow round about to shade and cover the same; as for you, this treasure will make you a man, yea, and a rich man for ever, when you have it once in your possession: and for my part, it may serve for a good testimony and sufficient proof, to shew how noble and wealthy our house was before-time. When the Macedonian heard these words, his teeth fo warred after this treasure, that he could not stay until the morrow, and attend the day light; but would needs out of hand be conducted by Timoelia, and her maidens to the place; but he commanded his wife to shut fast and lock the fore-yard-gate after them, that no man might fee and know; and so he went down in his shire into the foresaid pit: but cursed and hideous Clotho was his Mistresse and guide, who would punish and be revenged of his notorious wickedness by the hands of Timoclia, who food above; for when the perceived by his voice that he was now at the very bottom, the her selfe threw down a number of stones upon him, and her women also tumbled down many others, and those very big ones and heavy after him, until they had brained him, overwhelmed him, and in manner filled the pit up: which when the Macedonians heard of, they made means to draw up his dead body, and for that there was a proclamation published beforeby found of trumpet throughout the City, that they should not massacre one Theban more, they apprehended Timoclia, and brought her before King Alexander, whom they had already acquainted from point to point in particular, with that audacious act which she had committed the King judging (by her fetled and confident countenance, by her stayed gate also and portly pace) that the could not chuse but be of some great and noble house; demanded of her, first, what shee was? and she with rare boldnesse and resolution, without shewing any sign that she was daunted and aftonyed; I had (quoth she) a brother named Theagines, who being Captain General of the Thebans, against you, in the battel of Charonea, lost his life fighting manfully, in the defence of the liberty of Greece, to the end that we might not fall into that woful mifery, into which we are at this prefent fallen: but feeing it is so, that we have suffered those outrages and indignities which be unworthy the place from whence we are descended, for my selie I refuse not to die, and peradventure it were nor expedient for me to live any longer, and try such another night as the last was, unlesse your selfe impeach and debar such demeanors: at these words, the noblest and most honourable perions who were present, could not sorbear but weep; as for Alexander, he thought that the haughty mind and courage of this dame, was greater then to move pity and compassion; and therefore highly praising her vertue and commending her speech which he marked, and pondered well enough gave threight charge and commandment unto his Captains, to have a good eye, and careful regard, yea, and to take order presently, that there should no more such abuses be offered in any house of honour and nobility: and as touching Timoclia, he ordained immediately, that the should be set at full liberty, both her felfe, and also all those who were known and found any way to be of her blood and kinred;

ERTXO.

Attus who was firnamed Damon, that is to fay, Happy, had a fon whose name was Arcesilams, in nothing at all resembling the manners and conditions of his sather; for even diring his sathers life (for raising of battlements and pinnacles round about the walls of his own house,) he was condemned by his father himselfe in a fine of one whole talent; and after his death, being of a crooked, rough, and troublesome spirit, (according as his very name, Calepos, implyed) and for that he was governed altogether by the countel of a minion and favourite of his own, named Laurchus, a man of no worth nor respect, he proved a tyrant in sead of a King. And this Law chim aspiring likewise to be tyrant, either chased and banished out of the City, or else cansed to be put to death, the best and principal Citizens of all Cyrene; but when he had to done, he derived from himselfe all the blame and imputation upon Arcefilaus; and in the end gave him to drink a cup of poylon, to wit, a sea-hare whereupon he fell into a lingring and languishing dilease, whereby he pined away, and died at the last; by which meanes himselfe usurped the seigniory and rule of the City, under a colour of keeping it as a Tutor and Lord Protector, for the belioofe and use of Barras the lonof Arcifilam: for a very child he was, and lame withall; so that in regard as well of his nonage and minority. as the defect and imperiection of his body, he was despised of the people; but many there were, who drew and ranged themselves unto his mother, and were willing to obey and honour her, for that the was a wife Lady, and of a mild and courteous nature: befides, most of the mightiest men in those parts were knit to her either in blood and kindred, or else by bond of friendship; by means whereof, Laarchus made court to her, yea, and fued unto her for her good will by way of marriage. offering unto her (if the would be affianced and wedded unto him) to adopt Battus for his own for and make him partaker of his feigniory and dominion but Eryzo (for that was the name of this fibe ble Lady) being advised and counselled thereto before hand by her brethren, willed Lamehus to impart the matter unto them, for that upon conference with them (if they thought well of this matriage) she would be content and condescend thereto; Laarchus failed not so to do, but went and brake the thing unto her brethren accordingly; and they (as it was complotted before) drew the matter out in length, and drave him off from day to day; but Eryzo tent unto him fecretly one of her waiting maidens, to give him notice from her, that her brethren indeed for the present did contradict her mind and croffed her will, but were the knot once knit and confummate in bed together; they would contest and hast no longer, but be willing enough to like and approve theteof as a convenient match: and therefore she advised him (if he thought so good) to repair by night unto her: for if the thing were once well begun the rest no doubt would speed accordingly; this mesfage pleased Laurchus, and fitted his humour passing well: being therefore transported wholly besides himselse with these lovely and sugred words of this dame, he promised to attend her at what hour loever the would appoint. Now was this devite complotted and laid by the comfel of her eldest brother Polyarchus; and after that she had set down the just time when they should meet and company together, against that very instant, she took order that the said brother should secretly be conveyed into her chamber, who brought with him two lufty tall young men well appointed with good fwords, and who defired nothing more then to revenge their fathers blood, whom lately Laarchus had caused to be put to death: when all things were now in readinesse, she sent for Laarchus, willing him to come alone without any of his guard about him; no fooner was he entred into the chamber but these two young men charged upon him with their swords, wounded him in many parts of his body, that he died in the place: his dead corps they call over the walls of the house; which done, they brought the young Prince Battus abroad into the publick place, declared and proclamed him King after the manner and custome of the City. Thus Polyarchus rendered unto the Cyrenians their ancient government which they had from the beginning. Now there hapned to be at the same time in Cyrene many souldiers of Amasis the King of Egypt in whom Laarchus reposed his confidence, and found them fast and trusty unto him: by whose means he became dread and terrible to the Cyrenians : these sent in post with all speed unto King Amasis, messengers of purpole, to charge and accuse Eryxo and Polyarchus for this murder; whereat the King was wroth, and in great indignation intended out of hand to make sharp war upon the Cyrenians : but as he prepared to let forward this expedition, it fortuned that his mother departed this life : whiles therefore he was butie about her funerals, news came to Cyrene, how this King was highly displeased and refolved to levie war against them: whereupon Polyarchus thought good to addresse himselie in perfon to the faid King and to render a reason unto him of this late tast committed upon the body of La-rehus: neither would his litter Eryxotarry behind but follow him, and expose her own person to the same peril that he entred into: yea, and the mother of them both, named Critola (very aged though the was) was right willing to go, and accompanied her fon and daughter in this journey: now was the a great Lady, and most highly effeemed in this regard espe ially that the was the fifter in the whole blood to Battus the first of that name, surnamed the Happy. When they were arrived in Egypt, all other Lords and noble men of the Court approved well of that which they had done in this cale; and Amali himielte infinitely commended the pudicity and magnanimity of dame E. ryxo; and after he had honoured them with rich presents, and royally entertained them, he sent them all back (Polyarchus I mean, and the two Ladies) with his good grace and favour, to Cyrene.

XENOCRITE.

V. Enocrite a Lady of the City Cumes, deserveth no lesse to be praised and admired for that which Ashe practiled against Ar fridemus thetyrant, whom somethink to have been surnamed Malacos, that is to tay Soft and effeminate in regard of his loose and dissolute carriage : but they are deceived and ignorant in the true original and occasion of his name; for the Barbarians gavehim this addition Malaco:, which in their language fignifieth a Yonker: because being a very youth, with other companions of equal age, as yet wearing their hair long whom in old time they termed (orangla, (of their black locks as it should seem) he above the rest, in the wars against the Barbarius, bare himselse so bravely: (for he was not onely hardy and couragious in spirit, stont also and tall of his hands but withal full of wit, discretion and forecast and so far excelled all others in singularity) that he became right famous and renouned; whereupon he grew into such credit and admiration among his countrey men and fellow Citizens, that incontinently promoted he was, and advanced by them to the greatest offices of State and highest dignities in Common-weale; infomuch as when the Tuskans made war upon the Romans in the right and quarrel of Tarquinius Superbus, and namely, to reflore him again to his Crown and Kingdom, from which he was deposed: the Cumans made him Captain General of those torces which they fent to aid the Romans: in which expedition and warfare that continued long, he carried himselfe so remisly among his Citizens, (which were in the camp under his charge, and gave them so much the head to do what they would, winning their hearts by courtefies and flattery, rather then commanding them as their General) that he put into their heads, and persyaded them (upon their return home) to run upon the Senate, and to join with him in expelling and banishing the mightiest persons and best men of the City, By which practice he set up himselse as an absolute tyrant: and as he seemed wicked and violent otherwise in all kind of oppression and extortion; to most of all he was outragious, and went beyond himselse in villany toward Wives and Maidens to young Boyes also of good houses and free born: for among other enormities, this is recorded of him: That he forced young lads to wear their hair long, likelaffes; to have also upon their heads, borders, cawls, and attires with spangles of gold; contrariwile he compelled young maidens to be rounded, polled, and notted, and to wear fhort jackets, coats, and mandillans, without seeves after the fashion of springalds, howbeit, being exceedingly enamo-red upon Xenocrite the daughter of one of those principal Citizens who by him were exiled, herhe kept, not having espoused her lawfully, nor won her good will by fair periwasions, supposing that the maiden might think her felle well appayed, and her fortune very happy, to be entertained (in any fort what sever) by him, being by that means so highly reputed of and effected fortunate among all the Citizens; but as for her, all these savours did not ravish and transport her sound judgment and understanding; for besides that she was mightily discontented to converse and keep company with him not espoused, nor affianced and given in marriage by her triends, she had no lesse defire to recover the liberty of her country, then those who were openly hated of the tyrant. Nowit fortuned about the same time, that Aristodemus caused atrench to be cast, and a bank to be railed round about his territory, a peece of work neither necessary, nor profitable, which he did onely upon a policy, because he would thereby vex, out toile, consume, and waste his poor subjects; for he tasked every man, to cast up and carry forth by the day a certain number of measures full of earth. Xenocrite when the law him at any time comming toward her, would turn afide, and cover her face with the lappet of her gown; but when Ariftodemus was passed by and gone, young men her play-feres by way of mirth and passime, would ask her why she mussled and masked her selfe, as ashamed to see him onely, and was not abashed to see and be seen of other men as well; unto whom the would answer demurely, and that in right good earnest say: I wis I do it of purpose because there is not one man among all the Cumans but Aristedemus: this word touched them all very neer;

but such as were of any noble spirit and courage, it galled and pricked for very frame, yea, and gave them an edge to set in hand and enterprize some manly ask for to recover their street one? Which when Xemorita heard, she slaidly report, that she would rather her selfe carry earth in a basekt upon her own shoulders as others did, so her father, if he were there present, then participate in all delights and pleasures, yea, and enjoy great power and authority with Aristotemus. Then participate in all like speeches cast out by her, consistend those who were consisted and ready or its against the Tyrant, of whom the Chiestaine and principal Leaders was one Themoretics' suite these conspirators Xemorria gave free accesse and ready entry unto Aristotemus; who finding him alone, marmind an unguarded, sell many at once upon him, and so quickly dispatched him out of the way. We had unguarded, sell many at once upon him, and so quickly dispatched him out of the way. We had been a sell very of the way to be such as a sell very of the properties of the sell very of the s

The W.fe of PTTHES.

T is reported moreover, that the wife of rich Pythes, in the days of Xerxes when he warred up-I on Greece, was a vertuous and wife dame : for this Prihes having (as it should feem found cestain mines of gold, and fetting his mind thereon, not in measure, but excessively, and unsariably, for the greatsweetnels and infinite gains that arose thereby; both himselse in person bestowed his whole time therein; and also he employed all his Spojects and Citizens indifferently without respect of any person, to dig and delve, to carry, to purge, and clense the said gold Oare; not suffering them to follow any other trade, or exercise any occupationelle in the world: upon which unmeasurable and incessant toile, many died, and all were weary, and grumbled thereat, informich as at last, their wives came with olive branches, like humble suppliants to the gare of this Lady his Wife, fortomeverity, and befeech her for redrefte and fuccor in this case: The having heard their supplication, femt them away home to their houses with very good and gracious words; willing them not to diffrust and bediscomforted: meane while she sent secretly for gold-finers, goldsmiths, and other workmen in gold, fuch as shereposed most considence in, and thut them up close within a certain place, willing them to make loaves, pies, tarts, cakes, pastry works, and junkets of all forts, fweet meats, shits, all manner of meats and viands, such as she knew her husband Prives loved best, of clean gold; afterwards, when all were made, and hereturned home to his house (for as then he was abroad in a forraign countrey:) fo foon as he called for hipper, his wife ferbefore him a rable furnished with all kinds of counterfeit viands made of gold, without anything at all either good to be eaten or drunken, but all gold, and nothing but gold; great pleasure at the first cook Pythes for to see so rich a fight, and so glorious a banquet, wherein art had so lively expressed matter; but after he had sed his eyes sufficiently with beholding these goodly golden works, he called unto her in good earnest for fomewhat to eat ; but she fill whatsoever his mind stood to, brought it him in gold ; so that in the end he waxed angry, and cryed out, that he was ready to famish: Why Sir (quoth she) are nor your felfe the cause of all this? for you have given us fois on and store of this mettal, but caused extreame want and scarcity of meat and all things else, for all other trades, occupations, arts, and mysteries are decayed, and their use clean gone; neither is there any man that followeth husbandry, and tifferth the ground; but laying afide, and casting behind us all things that should be sowen and planted upon the earth for the food and fustemention of man, we do nothing elie but dig and fearth for firth things as will not ferve to feed and nourish us, spending and wearing out both our selves and our Citizens. These words moved Pythes very much; howbeit, for all this, he gave not overgetine the mines and mettal works, but enjoining the fifth part of his Subjects to travel therein by turns, one after another; he gave the relf leave to husband their lands, and ply their orther crafts and myfferies? But when Xerxes came down with that puissant army for to make war upon the Greeks, this Pythel shewed his magnificence in the entertainment of him, with sumptious surniture, costly gifts and presents, which he gave unto the King and all his train: for which he craved this only grace and favour at his hands again: that of many children which he had, he would dispense with him for one of them, that he might not go to the wars, to the end that the faid for might remain with him at home in his house for to tend and look unto him earefully in his old age: whereat Kenzes was fo wroth, that he commanded that one ion (whom he requested) to be killed preferrly, and his dead body to be cloven through in the midtl, and divided into two parts; and fo difloged and canfed his army to march between them both; the rest of his sons he led with him to the wars, who died all in the field; whereupon Pythes being discomforted, and his heart clean cast down, did that winch those ordinarily do, who want courage and wit; for heseared death, and hated life? willing he was not to live, and yet he had not the power to make an end of his life; what did he then? There was within the City a great bank or mount of earth, under which there can a river, which they called Pythopolites; within this mount he caused his comb to be made, and turned aside the course of the laid river, in such fort, that as it passed, the stream might glide upon this monument of his; which being prepared and done accordingly, he went down quick and alive into the fame tepulchret having religned over unto his wives hands, the City, and the whole feigniory thereof; enjoining her thus much; that the should not approach her selfe unto this Tomb or Monument, but only es very day once fend unto him, his supper in a little punt or boat down the riveret, and to continue this so long until the law, that the said punt went beyond the monument, having in it all his victuals whole and untoughed; for then she should not need to send him any more; but take this for an affured lign, that he was dead. Thus lived Pythes the rest of his dayes; but his wife governed and managed the State prudently, and wrought a great change and alteration in the toillome life of her

The Summary.

Moscover Plutanch in this Trestife hath difflayed his eloquence and all the skill and helps that he had by the meaner of Philosophy, set we see that the same is not sufficient to set the mind and spirit of man intruse repose; and that such consolations are (as they say) but palicative cures and no better: wherein alfo is discovered the want and default of light in the reason and misdom of man: yet notwithst anding, take this withal, that such discourses do recommend and shew unto us so much the better; the excellence of celeftial wifedom, which furnisheth us with true and affured remedies, and in stead of leaving the heart afflicted amid humane thoughts and considerations, taifeth and lifteth it up unto the justice, wisedom and bounty of the true God and Heavenly Father ; it, canfeshis to fee the effate of eternal life ; it affarethis of the fouls immortality, of the refurrection of the body, (points of learning, wherein the Pugans were altogither ignorant) and of the permanent and sugrelasting joyayahove, in the Kingdom of Heaven; Now albeit as this truth of God (revealed unto su in his sacred word) hath instructed and resolved in sufficiently, in will not be amife and impertinent, to learn of our Author and such others, those things which themselves did not well and throughly understand, neither in life, nor yen in death; for that the foundation failed them, and they milled the groundwork indeed, and in cleaving and lesning to (I wot not what) fortune and fual defing they caused man to rest and stay himself upon a vain shadow of vertue, and willed him (in one word) to feek for consolation, where there was othing but desolation for happone fe in misery, and for life in death. As touching the argument and coppents of this Treasife is adorned it is with mostle reasons, similardes, examples and testimonies, the substance whereof is this: That Apollonius (unto whom it is addressed) ought not to be over pensive and heavy for the death of his son, deceased in the slower of his age. To move and persuade him thereto, Plutarch after he had excused himselfe in that hewrote no sooner unto him, and showed that space of time comming between, doth better prepare mens hearts, which forrow and be in anguilh, to receive comfort; he condemneth as well block thand sensieffe folk, as also those that te waklings and over-tender in adversity. Which done, he entreth into a general review of the remedies which be appropriate to cure the miseries and afflictions of man; namely, that he ought to hold a meane, and to continue alwayes like himselfe; to cast his eye and have regard upon the divers accidents of our life, and in emoring the bleftings thereof; to think upon future crosses and calamistics; to be armed with reason for to beer all changes: to remember and carefully to think upon the estate of this mortal and transitory life: to confider the evils and miseries of the same : to endure patiently that which cannot be avoided and prevented with all the cares and lamentations that be: and to compare our own advertities with other mens. Then he proceedeth unto the particular consolations of those who are heavy and sorrowful for the death of their children, kinsfolk, or friends; to wit: That there is no harm nor evil at all indeath, but rather that it is a good thing, that the hour of it being uncertain, it is a comfort unto those whom it summoneth, who no doubt would be cast down and overthrown with the apprehension of miseries to come, in case they had any foresight thereof. After this, he proveth at large by three inductions and arguments of Socrates that there is not any evil in death; which he confirmeth by diversexamples; and then returning into his consolations, hee maintaineth and holdeth; That who seever die young, are most happy: that the consideration of Gods providence ought to retain and stay us it hat we are not to mourn and lament for the dead, neither in regard of them nor of our selves; that since over-long he avinesse and serrow maketh a man miserable, it were very good for himto be rid and dispatched of that pain quickly. Having finished this point, he resolveth and and affoileth certain difficulties which are prefented in these matters; and then taking in hand his purpose again, he ruleth andreformeth the affections of the living, toward them that are departed; he reclaimeth them from persisting and continuing obstinately in bewaiting their absence, willing them rather to bewait the case of those who are living ; and by many reasons doth prove and conclude, that they who die betime! have one marvellous advantage over those that remain alive in the world. Then he teacheth a man to maintain and carry himselfe as he ought, in all affairs; refuteth those who can abide no pain and trouble; and knitting up all the premises in sew words; he adjoinsth certain necessary and prositable completein such ac-cidents; and before that he concludes the whole greatife; he describes she tellicity of those whom death eidents; and before the preconcuration to whose treatises, he describeth the fedicity of those whom ideath emissions for the prime of their years having a special regard between to Apollomius the party amounted be written, and asserting the the recital of the good party and vertue which were in, his for lately departed, which the was without all question, in that place of repute and refer thich the Poets do magine. They which acceptant between the summer taking of the south acceptant between the immortality of the south according to the destrine of Plato and his followers which is the very end and closing up of all that had been delivered before.

And according as the wife Poet Euripides faith:

Each grief of mind, each malady Doth crave a several remedy If refile for forrow the heart torment, . Kind words offriends work much content. Where folly swayes in every action, Great meed there is a fibarp correction.

For verily among fo many passions and infirmities incident to the foul of man, dolor and heaviness have a constant to the foul of the foul o be most irksome and goe neerest into it. By occasion of anguish many a one (they say) hath runmad and fallen into maladies incurable; yea, and for thought, and heatts griefsome have been driven to make away themselves. Now to forrow and be touched to the quick for the losse of a long, is a parsion that ariseth from a natural cause, and it is not in our power to avoid; which being so, I cannot (for my part) hold with them, who to highly praile and extol, I wot not what bruitifth, hard, and blockish indolence and supidity, which if it were possible for a man to entertain, is not any way commodious and available. Certes, the same would be reave us of that mutual benevolence and sweet comfort which we find in the reciprocal interchange of loving others and being loved again: which (of all earthly blefings) we had most need to preferve and maintain. Yet do I not allow that a man should suffer himselfe to be transported and carried away beyond all compasse and measure, making no end of forrow; for even that also is likewife unnatural, and proceedeth from a corrupt and erronious opinion that we have: and therefore, as we ought to abandon this excels as simply naught, hurtful, and not befeeming vertuous and honest minded men; so in no wife must we diallow that mean and moderation in our passions, following in this point sage Cranter the Academick Philosopher: I could wish (quoth he) that we might be never fick; howbeit, if wee chance to fall into some disease, God send us yet some sense and seeling, in case any part of our body be either cur, plucked away, or difmembred in the cure. And I affute you, that senselesse impossibility is never incident unto a man, without some great mischief and inconvenience ensuing ; for lightly it falleth out, that when the body is in this case without feeling; the foole soon after will become as insensible; reason would therefore; this wife men in these and inchilite crosses, carrythems solves, neither wold of affections also gentler, more our of menture passionable? Top as the objects wrayeth a fell and hard heart; refamiling a small beath stock other discovereths solve and elithburgh and a stock of the stock o vours, as the fooming from so of fortune, which are fo ordinarily occurrent in this life: having the forecast with himselfe: That like as in a free State, and popular government of a Common-wealth. where the election of foversign magifitates patient by lots: the one whole hap is to be cholen, much be a tilter and a command thus the other who milest, out by patiently to take his formula in best the repulses even so in the diposition and course of all our worldly affairs, we are to be content with the reputer even to in the without grading and complaint, gendy to yeeld our felver ob-our portion allotted unto us, and without grading and complaint, gendy to yeeld our felver ob-dient; for furely they that cannot fo do, would never be able with wildom and moderation to weld any great prosperity: for of many wife speeches and well faid fawes, this sentence may go for one;

And as it falleth out in trees and other plants; that flowe years they bear their burden, and yeeld great flore of fruit, whereas in others they bring forth hone at all; also living eteatures one whiles be fruitful and breed many young, other whiles again; they be at barren for it; a and in the fea it is now temped, and then calme: femblably in this life shere happen many chroimbances and accidents, which wind and turn us into the chances of contrary fortunes: in rearrent of which we have the chances of contrary fortunes. wind and turn usinto the chances of contrary fortunes; in regard of which variety, a man may by good right and reason, say thus:

O Agamemnon, thy Father Atrens bea, Awayes to prosper back not be cotten thee: For in this life thou must have one day joy, Another, grief and wealth, mixt with annoy. And why? thou art by mortal nature fraile, Thy will againft this cour fecannot prevaile:

For foirs the professes the gods,

To make this charge, and work in man such ods.

As also that which to the same effect the Poet Menander wrote in this wise:

Sir, Trophimus, if you the only wight Of women born, were brought into this light with priviledge, to have the world at will, To taste no woe, but prosper always still? Or if some god had made you such behost, To live in joy, in folace and in rest?

To live in joy, in folace and in rest?

To mad just cause to fare thus as you do,

And chafes for that he from his word doth go, And kathdone what he cannot justific. But if fo be, as truth will teftific: Under one law this publick vital gire, You draw with us, your breath for to repair: I say to you (gravely in tragick stile) You ought to be more patient the while: To take all this in better worth (I fay)

Let reason rule, and stand for finall pay. And to knit up in few words, Trophimus Of this discourse the sum; I reason thus: A man you are, (that is as much to far) A creature, more prompt and subject ay To sudden change, and from the pitch of bliss, To lie in pit, where bale and forrow is, Than others all: and not unworthily: For why most weake by his own nature he Will needs himselfe in highest matters wrap, Above bis reach, secure of after-clap: And then anon, he falling from on high, Beares down with him all good things that were nigh: But as for you, the goods which heretofore O Trophimus youloft, exceeded not, no more Than those mishaps which you this day sustaine Excessive be, but keep within a meane: Henceforth therefore you ought to beare the rest Indifferently, and you shall find it best.

Howbeit, although the condition and estate of mens affaires stand in these tearmes, yet some there be, who for want of found judgement and good discretion are grown to that blockish stupidity, or vaine over-weening of themselves, that after they be once a little raised up, and advanced, either in regard of excessive wealth, and store of gold and silver under their hands, or by reason of some great office, or for other presidence and preeminence of high place which they hold in the Commonweale; or else by occasion of honours and glorious titles which they have acquired, do menace, wrong, and infult over their inferiours, never confidering the uncertainty and inconflance of muta-blefortune, nor how quickly that which was aloft may be flung down; and contrariwife, how foon that which lieth below on the ground may be extolled and lifted up on high by the fudden mutations and changes of fortune: to feeke for any certainty therefore in that which is by nature uncertaine and variable, is the part of those that judge not aright of things:

For as the wheele doth turne, one part we fee Offelly, high and low in course to bee.

But to attaine unto this tranquillity of spirit, void of all griefe and anguish, the most soveraigne, powerfull, and effectuall medicine, is reason and by the meanes thereof, a prepared estate and resolution against all the changes and alterations of this life: neither is it sufficient for a man only to acknowledge himfelfe to be by nature borne mortall; but also that he is allotted unto a mortalland transtory life, and tied as it were unto such affaires as soon do change from their presentestate unto the contrary: for this also is most certaine, that as mens bodies be mortall and fraile, so their fortunes also, their passions and affections be slitting and momentany; yea, and in one word, all that belongeth unto them is transitory; which is not possible for him to avoid and escape, who is himselfe by nature mortall : but as Pinda us faid :

With massie weights of strong necessiry, Of hell fo darke to bottome forc'd are me.

Very well therefore faid Demetrius Phalereus, whereas Euripides the Poet wrote thus:

No worldly wealth is firme and fure, But for a day it doth endure.

How small things may our state quite overthrow! It falleth out (as every man doth know)

That even one day is able down to cast Some things from height, and others raife as fast.

All the rest (quoth he) was excellently by him written, but far better it had been, if he had named, not one day, but the minute, moment, and very point of an houre:

For earthly fruits, and mortall mens estate, Turne round about in one and selfe same rate, Somelive, waxe strong, and prosper day by day, Whiles others are cast down and fade away.

And Pindarus in another place:

What is it for to be but one? Nay what is it to be just none? And verily a man is made To be the dreame even of a shade:

hath declared the vanity of mans life, by using an Hyperbole or excessive manner of an over-reaching speech, both passing wittily, and also to the purpose most significantly. For what is there more weake and feeble than a shadow? but to come in with the famalticall dream of a shadow; surely it is not possible that any other man should expresse the thing that he meant, more lively and in sitter teatmes. And verily, Crantor in good correspondence hereunto, when he comforteth Hippveler for the untimely death of his children, useth these words among theres: These are the ruies (quoth he) that all the schoole throughout of ancient Philosophy doth deliver and teach; wherein, if there be any point besides that we can admit and approve, yet this at least wise is most undoubted true, that mans life is exceeding laborious and painfull: for say that in the own nature it be not such; so it is, that by our own selves it is broughten that corruption: besides, this uncertaine fortune haunteth and attendeth upon us afar off, and even from our very cradle and swadling bands, yea, and ever fince our first entrance into this life accompanieth us, for no good in the world.

To fay nothing, how in all things whatfoever that breed and bud, there is evermore fome portion more or lefte of naughtineffe inbred and mingled therewith : for the very natural! feed(which at the first, when it is at beth; is mortal!) doth participate this primitive cause, whereupon proceed the untoward inclination and disposition of the mind, maladies, cares, and forrows: and from thence there creepe and grow upon us, all those tatall calamities that befall to mortall men. But what is the reason that we are digressed hitherto? softooth, to this end, that we may know that it is no news for any man to rafte of micriers and calamities, but rather ther we are all subject to the same: for (as for any man to rafte of micriers and calamities, but rather ther we are all subject to the same: for (as for my man to rafte of micries and calamities, but rather ther we are all subject to the same: for (as for any man to rafte of micries and calamities, but rather ther we are all subject to the same: for (as put the same of the same is one of the same is

Leaves fome blown down by mind outragiom.
Lie foed on ground, and others, numerous,
Bud froft in wood, when pleafant (bring doth call:
Mens boufes [6] (ome rife and others fall.

Now that this fimilitude or comparison of tree-leaves fitly expressed and represented the transitory vanity of mans life, it appeareth evidently by those verses which he wrote in another place:

You would not fay that I were wife; if I did armour take
To fight with you, in wretched ment behalfe, and for their fake,
Who much refemble leaves at firft, faire in sheir firsh verdure,
So long as they of earthly fruits do feed for nurture;
And afterward be like to them, with breed and dead againe, within humans actived lie hours, and no Rerneth dath remaine.

Simonides the Lyricall Poet, when as Paulaniae King of Lacedamon (bearing himfelfe high, and vaunting of his brave exploits) bad him (upon a time by way of mockery) to give unto him iome fage precept and good advertifement; (knowing full well the pride and over-weening spirit of the faid Prince) counfelled him only to call to mind, and remember, That he was but a man. Philip likewife, King of Macedon, heating news in one and the same day, of three leverall happy facefles: the first, That he had won the prize, at the great tunning of chariots drawn with horses, in the following of the Olympick games; the second, How his Lieutenant Generall, Parmenio, had defeated the Dardanians inbattell; and the third, That his wife Olympia was delivered fase of a jolly son: litted up his hands towards heaven, and faid. Of ortune, I befeech thee to send unto me in counterchange, some moderate adversity: as knowing full well, that she bare spight and envy alwaies to great felicities. Semblably, Theramene one of the thirty tytants of Athens, at what time as the house wherein he supped with many others sell down, and he alone accaped fase out of that dangerous ruine, when all others reputed him an happy man, cried out with a loud voice: O fortune, for what occasion of missortune reserved thou me? And verily within sew daies after, it hapned that his owne companions in government cast, him, in prison, and after much torture, put him to death. Moreover, it seemeth puro me, that the Poet Homer deserved fingular praise in this matter, of consolation, when he bringeth in Achilles speaking of King Prisama (being come unto im for toransome and redeeme the corps of his son Hector) in this wise;

Come on therefore and here sit down, by me upon this throne,
Let be all plaints, sorbeare we thus to weep, to sigh anagrone,
And though our griefe of heart be much; he tu the same represse;
For why? no teares will ought prevaile, nor help us in distresse.
To live in paines and for rous great men are predessinate
By good above, and they alone dwell age in blessed flate, Exemps from cares and discontents, for in the entrie-fill
Of Jove his house in heaven alost, swo tuns are shading fill,
Whereout he doth among men deale, such grifts as they comaine,
In one good blessings are bestowed, in the other curse and paine:
Now he to whom great Jupitet vouchsfares of both to give,
Sometime in 107, and other whiles in heavinesses shallow;
But if a man be only from that cursed welfell spead,
With shame, with want, and prunt he is full till bessed, Hesselse we won the earth to wander and to stray,

He spanners who was a permy be a part to pander and to stray.

He spanners with God and man until this dying day.

In much disprace with God and man until this dying day.

The Poet who came after himboth in order of time, and also in credit and reputation, He so due, although he taketh upon bimself the honour to have been a disciple of the Muses, having as well as the other included the miseries and calamities of mankind within one tuniwriterth that Pandora in opening it, set them abroad in great quantity, and spred them over all lands and leas, saying in this manner:

No some them this woman took, the great lid from the two.

No sooner than this sooman took, the great lid from the tun, With both her hands, but all abroad she scattered anon, A world of plaques and missives them wishelfer manifold. She wrought thereby to mortall men on earth both young, and old: Hope only did remaine behind, and shew not all abroad, But undermeath the upmoss from the dege it still abode, For why before it could get forth, the lid she clopt to fest: When other evid is infinite were sown from sight to less the wife to when the earth of sunday plagues, full was the sea likewise, Disease the earth of sunday plagues, full was the sea likewise, Disease the earth of sunday plagues, full was the sea likewise, Alls was the earth of sunday plagues, full was the sea the sunday sunday of the sunday and those by night to waske, and creep by stealth, Alls sunday without cause known, and do impeach mans health, Uncal d they come in silence deep they make no any nosse.

To these sayings and sentences the comical Poet according well, as touching those who torment themselves by occasion of such missortunes when they happen, writeth thus:

If seares could cure and heale all vur disease;
Or weeping skay at once our paine and griese;
We would our gold exchange for seares, to ease.
Our maladies, and so procure reliese:
But (Master,) now teares with them beare no sway,
Nor ought prevaile, for weep we, or weep not,
They hold their course, and still keep on their way,
So that we see by, plaints nothing is got;
What gaine we then? nought, shr, yet give me care,
Griese brings sorth cares, at treet their fruit do beare,

And Dittis when he comforted Danae, who for rowed overmuch for the death of her fon, spake untoher in this manner;

Thinke you that Pluto doth your teares regard,
And will for fighs and groan your fon back fend?.
No, no, ceale you to lob and weep fo hard,
Town neighbours cafe marke rather and intend:
Hearts eafe will come, if that you call to mind,

And make right life, it will you help init.

He giveth her counfell to confider the examples of those who have been more or lesse unfortunate than her selfe, as if the comparing of their condition might serve her turne very well, the better to endure her own calamity. And hereto may a manyery pertinently draw and apply the saying of Someone, who was of opinion; that if we laid forth all our advertices and mistortunes in one common heap, with this condition, that each one should carry out of it an egylad portion; not men would wish and be glad to take up their own and go away with all. The Poet, Antimachue also used the like induction, after that his wise whom he loved so entirely, was departed; for wheras her name was Lyde, he for his own confolation in that forrow of his, composed an Elegy of lamentable duty, was Lyacine for his wherein he collected all the calamities and misfortunes which hapned in old time to great Princes and Kings, making his own dolour and griefe the leffe, by comparing it with time to great PIRICES and AMES. IMPAIRED BY THE AMERICAN COMPARING IT WITH other mileries more grievous: wheteby it is apparant, that he who comfortest another, whole hear is afflicted with forrow and anguith, (giving him to understand that his infortunity is common to more besides him, by laying before his face the semblable accidents which have befallen to others,) changeth in him the lenie and opinion of his own grievance, and imprinteth in him a certaine letled perswation, that his misfortune is nothing so great as he deemed it to be before naught, faying in this wife:

How wrongfully have men death in disdaine,

Of many cult the remedy foveraigne?

For in imitation of him, right well faid he who foever was the author of this fentence:

Come death to cure my painfull malady, The only leech that bringeth remedy; For hell is th' haven for worlds calamity, And harbour fure in all extremity.

And verily, a great matter it is, to be able for to lay boldly and with confidence:

How can he be a flave juffly,

Who careth not at all to die? As alio: If death me help in my hard plight,

No spiritt non ghost shalt me affright.

For what hurt is there in death? And what is it that should to trouble and molest us when we die? A strange case this is, and I cannot see how it commeth to passe, that being so well known, so ordinarily, familiar, and naturall unto us as it is, yet it should seeme so painfull and dolorous unto us. For what wonder is it, if that be flit or cut, which naturally is given to cleave? If that melt, which is apt what wonder is the third, which is tubject to take fire? or if that perith and rot, which by nature is corruptible? and when is it that death is not in our felves? for according as Heraclaus faith) quick and dead is all one; to awake and to sleep is the same; in young and old there is no difference; considering that these things turne one inco another, and as one passeth, the other commeth in place: much after the manner of an imager or potter, who of one masse of clay is able to give the forme and shape of living creatures, and to rume the same into a rude lumpe, as it was before; he can fashion it at his pleasure, and confound all together, as he list: thus it lyeth in his power to do and undo to make and mar, as often as he will, one after another, unceffantly; semblably nature of the felie-fame matter framed in times past our ancestours and grandfires, and confequently, afterwards brought forth our fathers; then the made us; and in procedle of time will of using ender others; and so proceed fill to farther posterity; in such fort, that as the current (as it were) of our generation will never stay, so the freame also of our corruption will run on still, and be perpetuall; whether it be the river Acheron or Cocytus, as the Poets call them; whereof the one fignifieth privation of joy, and the other betokeneth lamentation. And even so, that first and principall cause which made us to live and see the light of the sun, the same bringeth us to death and to the darknesse of hell. And hereof we may see an evident demonstrationand resemblance, by the very aire that compasses us round about; which in alternative course and by turnes representeth unto us the day, and afterwards the night; it induceth us to a fimilitude of life and death, of waking and fleeping; and therefore, by good right is life called a fatall debt, which we must duly satisfie, and be acquir of: for our foreighers entred into it first; and we greto repay it willingly, without grumbling, sighing, and grouning, when so ever the creditor calleth for it; unlesse we would be reputed unthankill and unjust. And verily, I believe that nature seeing the uncertainty and shortnesse of our life, would that the end thereof and the prefixed houre of death should be hidden from us, for that she knew it good and expedient for us fo to be; for if it had been fore-known of us, some (no doubt) would have languished and fallen away before with griefe and forrow; dead they would have been before their death came. Confider now the troubles and forrows of this life; how many cares and croffes it is subject unco: Certes, if we went about to reckon and number them, we would condemne it as most unhappy, yea, we would verifie and approve that strong opinion which some have held: That it were far better for a man to die than to live : and therefore faid the Poet Simo-

Full feeble is all humane puissance: Vaine is our care and painfult vigilance: Manslife is even a short passage; Paine upon princis his arrivinges. And then comes death that spareth none, So flerces fo critell without pardon: Ober our heads it dothi depends And threats alike those that do found Their yeares in vertue and goodne ffe As in all fin and wickednesse.

Likewise Pindarus:

For bleffing one which men obtaine, The gods ordaine them curfes twaine. And those they cannot wisely beare, Fooles as they be, and will not heare. Or thus :

They cannot reach to life immortall, Nor yet endute that which is mortall,

And Sophocles:

Of mortall men when one is dead, Doub thine heart groan, and eye teares (heads Not knowing once what future gaine

May come to him devoid of paine?

As for Euripides, thus he faith :

In all this knowledge, canst thou find The true condition of mankind? I thinke well, No: For whence should come Such knowledge deep, to all or some? Give eare, and thou shalt learne of me The skill thereof, inverity : All men ordain'd are once to die, The debt is due, and paid must be: But no manknow's if morrow next, Unto his daies shall be annext : And whither fortune bends her way, Who can fore-see, and justly say?

If it be so then, that the condition of mans life is such indeed as these great clerks have delivered and described unto us; is it not more reason to repute them blessed and happy, who are freed from that servitude which they were subject to therein, than to deplore and lament their estate, as the most part of men do, through folly and ignorance? Wise Socrates said, that death resembled for all the world, either a most drough leep, or a voyage far remote into forraine parts, in which a manislong ablent from his native Countrey; or elfe thirdly, an utter abolition and finall diffolution both of foule and body. Now take which of thefethree you will, according to him, there is no hatme at all in death: for thus he discourfed through them well, and beginning at the first, in this wise he reasoneth: If death (quoth he) be a kind of sleep, and those that sleep seed no ill; we must needs confesselikewise, that the dead have no sense at all of harme: neither is it necessary to go in hand to prove, that the deepest seep is also the sweetest, and most pleasant; for the thing it selle is plaine and evident to all the world. To say nothing of Homers testimony, who speaking of sleepe writeth thus:

Most sweetly doth a man sleep in his bed, When least he wakes, and seemes most to be dead.
The same he iterateth in many places; and namely, once in this wile: With pleasant sleep she there did meet, Deaths brother germain you may weet, And againe: Death and sleep are sister and brother;

Boil twins refembling one another.

Where by the way, he lively declareth their similiride, and calling them twins; for that brothers and fifters twins for the most part be very like: and in another place besides, he calleth death a brazen sleep; giving us thereby to understand, how senselesse death is: neither seemeth he unclegantly and besides the purpose, who loever he was, to have expressed as much in this verse, when he said:

That fleeps (who doth them well advise)

Of death are petty mysteries.

And in very deed, sleep doth represent (as it were) a preamble, inducement, or first profession toward. death : in like manner alfo the cynick Philosopher Diogenes faid very wisely to this point, for being surprised and overtaken with a dead sleep, a little before he yeelded up the ghost, when the Physiclan wakened him, and demanded what extraordinary symptome or grievous accident was befaln unto him? None (quoth he) only one brother is come before another, to wit, fleep before death: and thus much of the first resemblance.

Now if death be like unto a far journey or long pilgrimage, yet even so, there is no evill at all therein, burrather good, which is clean contrary for to be inservitude no longer unto the flesh, nor enthralled to the passions thereof; which seizing upon the soule do impeach the same, and fill it with all follies and mortall vanities, is no doubt a great blessednesse and felicity: for as Plato saith: The body bringeth upon us an infinite number of troubles and hinderances about the necessary maintenance of it felle; and in case there be any maladies besides, they divert and turne us cleane away from the inquisition and contemplation of the truth; and instead thereof, petter and stuffe us full of wanton loves, of lufts, feares, foolish fancies, imaginations, and vanities of alliorts; infomuch, as it is most true which is commonly said: That from the body there commeth no goodnesse nor wildome at all. For what else bringeth upon us wars, seditions, battels and fights, but the body and the greedy appetites and lufts proceeding from it; for to fay a truth, from whence arife all wars, but from the coverous defire of money, and having more goods? a either are we driven to purchase and gatherstill; but only for to enterraine the body, and serve the turn thereof; and whiles we are amused and employed thereabout, we have no time to study Philosophy: finally (which is the worlt and very extremity of all) in case we find some leiture to follow our book, and enter into the fludy and contemplation of things, this body of ours at all times and in every place is ready to interrupt and put us out; it troubleth, it impeacheth, and to disquieteth us, that impossible it is to attaine unto the perfect fight and knowledge of the truth; whereby it is apparant and manifelt that if ever we would clearely and purely know any thing, we ought to be fequelized and delivered from this body; and by the eyes only of the mind, contemplate and view things as they be; then shall we have that which we defire and wish; then shall we attaine to that which we say we love, to wir, wisdome even when we are dead, as reason teacheth us, and not so long as we remaine alive : for if it cannot be, that together with the body we should know anything purely; one of these two things must of necessity enine, that either never at all, or else after death we should attaine unto that knowledge; for then and not before the soule shall be apart, and separate from the body; and during our life time fo much nearer shall webe unto this knowledge, by how much lesse we participate with the body, and have little or nothing to do therewith, no more than very necessity doth require; norbe filled with the corrupt nature thereof, but pure and neat from all such contagion, untill such time as God himselfe free us quite from it; and then being fully cleared and delivered from all fleshly and bodily follies, we shall converse with them and such like pure intelligences seeing evidently of our selves all that which is pure and fincere, to wit, truth it felfe; for unlawfull it is and not allowable that a pure thing should be infested or once touched by that which is impure; and therefore say that death feeme to translate men into some other place, yet is it nothing ill in that respect, but good rather, as Place hath very well proved by demonstrations in which regard Socrates in my conceit spake most heavenly and divinely unto the Judges, when he faid: My Lords to be affraid of death is nothing elle but to seeme wise when a man is nothing lesse and it is as much as to make semblance of knowing that which he is most ignorant of; for who worteth certainly what is death? Or whether it be the greatell felicity that may happen to a man? Yet men do feare and dread it, as if they knew for certainty, that it is the greatest evil in the world. To these sage sentences he accordeth well who said thus, Let no man frand in doutt and feare of death,

Since from all travels at him deliversth.

And not from travels only, but also from the greatest miseries in the world; whereunto it seemeth, that the very gods themselves give testimony: for we read that many men in recompence of their religion and devotion have received death, as a fingular gift and favour of the gods. But to avoid tedious prolixity, I will forbeare to write of others, and content my felfe with making mention of those only who are most renowned and voiced by every mans mouth: and in the first place rehearse I will the hillory of those two young Gentlemen of Argos, namely, Cleabis and Buon; of whom there goeth this report: That their mother being Priestelle to Juno, when the time was come that the should present her selfe in the Temple and the Mules that were to draw her coach thither, not in readinesse, but making stay behinds they seeing her driven to that exigent, and sexting left the houre should passe, underwent themselves the yoke, and drew their mother in the Coach to the said temple: the being much pleased, and taking exceeding joy to see, so great piety and kindnesse in herchildren, prayed unto the goddesse, that she would vouchfase to give them the best gift that could befall to man; and they the same night following, being gone to bed for to sleep, never role against for that the goddesse sent unto them death, as the only recompense and reward of their goddinesse. Pind rus also writeth as touching Agamedes and Trophonism. That after they had built the Temple of Apallo in Delphos, they demanded of that god their hire and reward; who promised to pay them fully at the seven-nights end; meane while he bad them be merry and make good, cheere; who did as he enjoyned them: so upon the seventh-night following they took their sleep, but the next morning they were found dead in bed. Moreover it is reported, that when Pindarus himselfe gave order unto the Commissioners that were sent from the State of Bastia unto the Oracle of Apollosfor to demand what was best for man? this answer was returned from the Prophetesse: That he who enjoyned them that errand, was not ignorant thereof, incase the history of Agamedes and Trophonins (whereof he was author) were true; but if he were disposed to make further triall, he should himselfe see shortly an evident proofe thereof: Pindarus when he heard this answer, began to think of death, and to prepare himselfe to dye; and in truth, within a little while after changed his life, The like narration is related of one Euthynous an Italian, who was son to Elysius of Terina, for vertue, wealth, and reputation, a principal man in that City, namely, that he died juddenly, without any apparent cause that could be given thereof: his father Elysius, incontinently thereupon, began to grow into some doubt (as any other man besides would have done) whether it might not be, that he died of poyson, for that he was the only child he had, and heire apparant to all his riches: and not knowing otherwise how to found the truth, he went out to a certaine Oracle, which used to give answer by the conjuration and calling forth of spirits or ghosts of men departed; where (after he had performed facrifices and other ceremoniall devotions according as the Law required) he layed him down to fleep in the place, where he dreamed, and five this vision: There appeared unto him (as he thought) his own father, whom when he law, he discoursed unto him what had fortuned to his for, requesting and beseeching him to be affished with him to find out the truth, and the cause indeed of his io sudden death: his father then should univer thus: And even therefore am I come hither; here therefore receive at this mans hands that certificate which I have brought unto thee, for thereby shalt thou know all the cause of thy griefe and forrow: now the party whom his father frewed and prelemed titto him, was a young man that followed after him, who for all the word inflature and yeares refembled his fon Europyrous; who being demanded by him, what he was (Made this aniwer: I am the ghoft or angell of your fon and with that offered unto him a littlef rowle or letter; which when Elyfins had unfolded he found written within it these three verses:

"Η ρου γήπιε Ηλύσιε φρένας ανθρών. Eulwio@ xerat poteteia Baruto. 'Our την γας ζώνιν αυτή καλδη ώτε γονεύσι. Which may be done into English thus:

Elvius thou foolish man, aske troing Sages read, Enthyttous by firall bomfe of d flinies is dead; For longer life would neither him nor parents frand in flead;

And thus much may suffice you, both as touching the ancient histories written of this matter, and also of the second point of the foresaid question.

But to come unto the third branch of Socrates his conjecture: admit it were true, that death is the utter abolition and definition as well of foule as body; yet even so, it cannot be reckoned simply ili: for by that reckoning there should follow a privation of all sense, and a generall deliverance from paine, anxiety, and anguish: and like as there commeth no good thereby, even so, no harme at all can enfue upon it; for almuch as good and evil have no being, but in that thing only which hath effence and subfiftence, and the same reason there is of the one as of the other : so as in that which is not, but utterly becommeth void annulled, and taken quite out of the world, there cannot be imagined either the one or the other. Now this is certaine that by this reason the dead returne to the fame estate and condition wherein they were before their nativity: like as therefore, when we were unborne, we had no tense at all of good or evill; no more shall we have after our departure out of this life : and as those things which preceded our time, nothing concerned us; so whatsoever hap-

No paine feelethey that out of world be cone:

To dye, and not be borne, I hold all one.
For the lattle flate and condition is after death, which was before birth. And do you thinke that there is any difference between, Never to have been, and to cease from being? Surely they differ no morethan either an house, or a garment, in respect of us and our use thereof after the one is fulned or failen down, and the other all rent and torn, from that benefit which we had by them before they were begun to be built or made; and if you lay, there is no difference in them in these regards; as little there is be you fure between our estate after death, and our condition before our nativity: 2 very pretty and elegant speech therefore it was of Arcestaus the Philosopher when he said: This death (quoth he) which every man tearmeth evill, hath one peculiar property by it selfe, of all other things that be accounted ill; in that when it is present, it never harmeth any man; only whiles it is ablem and in expectance it hurtest folk. And in very truth, many men through their folly and weak-neffe, and upon certaine flanderous calumbiations and false furmises conceived against death, suffer themselves to die, because (for footh) they would not die. Very well therefore and aptly wrote the Poet Epicharums in these words:

That which was knit and joyned fest, Is loofed and dissolved at last: Each thing returns into the same, Earth into earth, from whence it came: The spirit up to heaven anon ; Wherefore what harme herein? just none.

And as for that which Crefthontes in one place of Europides, speaking of Hercules said

If under globe of earth, with those he dwell,
Being none have left, laid once in grave:
A man of him might say, and that right well,
That puissance and strength he none can have.

By altering it a little in the end, you may thus infer :

neth after our death shall touch us as little.

If under globe of earth with those he dwell, Who being none, kave left, laid once in grave: A man of him might say and that right well, That fenfe at all of paine, he can none have.

Agenerous and noble saying also was that of the Lacedamonians: Now are we in our gallast prime,

Before as others had their time,

Andafter us [ball others flower,
But we shall never feet houre.
As also this:
Now dead are they who never stong bis,
That life or death were simple ough;
But all their care was for to dy
And live, sut they should, honestiff,
Right excellent also are those verses of Europides, as touching them who endure long maladies:
I hate all those by meat and drink,

I have all those by meat and drink,
Who to prolong their dauer do think:
By Magich art and soverry,
The course of de ash who turne awry,
Whereas they should be glad and faine,
When as they see it is but vaine
Ofearth to live upont be face.
For youngers than to quit the place.

As for Merope in pronouncing these manike and magnanimous words, she moveth the whole theater to this consideration of her speeches, when she faith;

tto this confideration of ner spectrus, which the fig.

I am not to only maker left,

Who of faire children am bereft;

Nor yet a widdow am I alone,

Who my deare huband have forgone:

For others infinite there be,

Who have felt like calamitee.

Unto this, a man may very aptly adjoine these verses also:

What is become of that magnificence?

Where is King Crasus with his opnience?

Or Xeruses, he whole monstrous works it was,

By bridge, the first of Hellespont to pass?

To Pluto now they are for ever gone, To houses of most deep oblivion.

Their goods, and their wealth, together with their bodies are perished; howbeit, beleeve me, some will say; many are moved perforce to weep and lament, when they see a young person die before due time; and yet I assure you, this half y and untimely death admitteth so ready consolation; that even the meanest and most vulgar comicall Poets have seen into the thing, and devised good means, and effectual reasons of comfort: for consider what one of them saith in this case, to him that motified and lamented for the unripe and unseasonable death of a friend of his, in these words:

If thou kadft known for certaine, that thy friend Who move is dead, should have been telffed as, Throughout that courfe of the which was behind, In cafe the gods had flaid his dying day, His death had been untimely, I would fay: But flong life, should bring birn griefes incurable, To him haply was death; than thou move favourable.

Seeing then uncertaine it is whether the iffue and end of this life will be expedient unto a man; and whether he shall be delivered and excused thereby from greater evils, or no; we ought not to take ones death so heavily, as if we had unterly loft all those things which we hoped for, and promite our selves by his life to enjoy; and therefore methinks that Amphiaraus in a certaine Tragedy of a Poet, did not impertinently and without good purpose comfort the mother of Archemorus, who rooke it to the heart, and grieved excessively, that her son a young infant died so long before the ordinary time: for thus he saith unto her:

No man there is of womans body born,
But in his dates much travell be doth beare:
Children some die the parents long beforn,
And are by them enterred: then they reare
And get young babes, for those that buried were:
Lasty, themselves into the graves do fall,
This is the course, this is the endof all,
Te men for them do weep and sorrow make,
Whose bodies they on biere to earth do send,
Although in truth a way direct they take,
At eares of corne full veyes which domnward bend,
As some begin, so others make an end.
Why should men grieve and sign an assurestore?
What mass shall be thinks in not hard therefore.

In fum, every man ought both in meditation within himfelfe, and in earnest discourse also with others,

Onices, to hold this for certaine; that the longest life is not best, but rather the most vermous: for neither he that plaieth most upon a lure or citerine, is commended for the cunningest musician; no more than he who pleadeth longest, is held the most eloquent Orator; not he that fitteth continually at the helme is praised for the best Pilot; but they that do best, deserve the greatest commendation: for we are not to measure goodnesse by the length of time, but by vertue, by convenient proportion and measure of all words and deeds: for this is that amiable beauty which is eftermed happy in this world, and pleasing to the gods: which is the reason that the Poets have left untous in writing, that the most excellent worthies or demygods, and such (as by their laying) were begotten by gods; changed this their mortall life, and departed before they were old: for even *he

Who was of mighty Jupiter, and Phœbus loved best, Permitted was not long to live, and in old age to rest.

For this we alwaies fee, that ordinarily the maturity of yeares, and the same well employed, is preferred before old age and long life: for thus we repute those trees and plants best, which in least time beare most fruit; as also those living creatures which in little space yeeld greatest profit and commodity to mans life: furthetmore, little difference you shall find between short time and long, in comparison of eternity; for that a thouland, yea, and ten thousand yeares according to Simonidas, are no more than a very prick, or rathed the smallest indivisible portion of a prick, in respect of that which is infinite. We read in histories that there be certaine living creatures about the land of Pontus, whose life is comprized within the compasse of one day; for in the morning they are bred, by noone they are in their vigour and at best, and in the evening they are old, and end their lives: would not these creatures thinke you, if they had the soule of man, and that use of reason which we have, feele the very same passions that we do, it the like accidents beiell unto them? Certes, those that died before noone, would minister occasion of mourning and weeping; but such as continued all day long should be reputed happy. Well, our life should be measured by vertue, and not by continuance of time; fo that we are to effeeme such exclamations as these, foolish, and full of vanity: Oh, great great pitty, that he was taken away so young; it ought not to have been that he should die yet; and who is he that dare say; This or that ought? But many things else have been, are, and shall be done hereaster, which some man might say, ought not to have been done: howbeit, come we are not into this life for to prescribe Laws, but rather to obey those Laws which are decreed and fee down already by the gods, who governe the world, and the ordinances of deftiny and divine providence.

But to proceed, those who so much deplote and lament the dead, do they it for love of themselves, or for their sake who are departed? If in regard of their own selves, for that they find how they are deprived of tome pleasure or profit, or else disappointed of support in their old age, which they hoped to receive by those who are departed? Surely this were but a small occasion, and no honest pretence of lamentation, for that it feemeth they bewaile not the dead persons, but the loss of those commodities which they expected from them: but in case they grieve in the behalfe of those that be gone out of this world, foon will they shake off their forrow, if they be perswaded and beleeve, that after death they feele no ill; and obey they will that ancient and wile sentence, which teacheth us to extend as much as we can all good things, but to draw in and restraine those that be ill: now if forrow is to be counted good, we ought to augment and encrease the same as much as possibly we can but if we acknowledge it (as it is indeed) to be naught, we are to shorten and diminish it, as much as we may, yea, and to abolish it quit, if it lie in our power; and that this may be easily effected, it appeareth by the precedent of such a consolation as this: We read that a certaine ansient Philosopher went upon a time to visit Queen Arinoe, who mourned and lamented much for a son of hers lately departed this life; and to her heused these or such like words: Madamat what time as 34piter dealt among the petty gods, goddeffes, and other heavenly wights, certaine honours and dignities, it chanced that dame Serron Masnot present among the rest: but after that the distribution and dole, was made, she also came in place and presented her felse, craving of Japier her part of honour as well as the other: Jupiter being thus driven to his shifts, for that he had divided and given away all before, not having anything electo bestow, gave unto her the honour which is done unto those that be departed this life; to wit, teares plaints, and lamentations : as other perty gods and goddefles therefore, lovethole who honour them, and none elle; even fo (good Lady) Servem (if you make not much of her and give her divine honour) will not come neare unto you i but in cale you worthip and honour her dutifully with those prerogatives which he allotted unto her, to wit, weeping, wailing, and lamentations, the will affect and love you, the will haunt you, yea, the will alway minifer matter unto you, that the may be continually honoured by you. This device of the Philosopher wonderfully wrought with the woman, and perfivaded her in such fortas she stated her plaints, gave over her weeping and cast off all her forrow

In one word a man may deale in this wife with one that is inforrow, and demand of him: Whether art thou minded one day to ceafe this mourning, and make an end of pirous lamentation? or to perfil fill in afficing and to menting, thy felfe as long as thou livefly for it hou continue all thy life time in this dolorous in guilfu, thou wilt procure and bring upon thy felfe perfect misery and infeiring in the the highest degree, through thy effeminate lostnelle and believel of heart; but if thou meanest at the length to change, this fit, and to lay all mouring affice, why doft not thou begin betimes, and relove our of hand, to be delivered from this milery at once? for look what reasons and meanes thou art to use hereafter, for to be freed from these paines and perplexities; by the help of the same thou maiest presently be quit of this unhappy plight and state wherein thou art. And as it fareth in our bodies, the sooner that we rid away the crasie indispositions and maladiesthereos, the better it is for us; even so it is in the diseases and passions of the soule; that therefore, which thou art minded and disposed to yeted unto long time, give forthwith unto reason, unto literature and knowledge; discharge thy selie (I say, and that with speed) of these calamities which now environ and compasse thee round about. But haply you will say, I never thought that this would have befain unto me, neitherdid I io much as doubt any fuch thing; yea, but you ought to call doubt afore-hand; you should long time before have considered and meditated of the vanity, weakenesse and instability of mans affaires; by which meanes you had not been surprised as you are, nor taken fo unprovided, as by some sudden incursion of enemies. Very well and wisely therefore it seemeth. that noble Thefeus in Euripides was prepared and armed against all such accidents of fortune, when he thus faid :

According as a wife man once me taught, I did in mind all mileries forecast; And namely how I might be overcaught With bitter spight; and not to sit so fast In native Soile, but forc'd to fly at last: Untimely death of wife, of child, of friend, How soone might hap, full crosse unto my mind. In fum, I did misfort unes manifold Efisones propose and set before mine eyes, To th' end that I acquainted thus of old With such fore-casts, might soone learne to despise, And fet naught by adverse calamities: For no mischance, or fortune overthwart,

Could now be firange, and nip meto the heart.

But those who are effeminate, base-minded, and not exercised before-hand in such premeditations, never pluck up their spirits, nor set their minds to deliberate and consult as touching any honest or profitable course, but suffer themselves to breake out into extremities and miseries remedilesse. afflicting and punishing their harmelesse bodies, and as Alcens was wont to say, forcing them to be fick with them for company, which ailed nought before. And therefore Plato (in my conceit) gaves very wife admonition: That in fuch casualties and mischances as these, we should be quiet; as well for that it is uncertain whether it be good or ill for them whose death we seeme to lament; as also, because there can no good ensue unto us by such pensuensite and forrow: for this is cer-taine, That as sage consultation in a mans selfe (as touching that which is hapned already)doth re-move forrow: so griefe impeatheth wile comfell, which would have a man to employ and acommodate all his affaires and occurrences the best way he can; like as inplaying at the tables, to dispose fo of his cast and chance whattoever, as may most serve to win the game.

If it be our hap therefore, to flumble and catch a fall, by the crooked aspect of adverse fortune, we must not do as little children, who laying their hands upon that part which is hurt, fall a puling or fetting up a cry; but apply our minds presently to seek for remedy; to set that upright, which is falm; to rectifie that which is out of frame, by help of good medicines; and in one word, to put away all moanes and lamentations.

Certes, it is reported, that he (who foever he was) that fet down Laws and Statutes to the Lycians ordained expressely; That when loever they were disposed to mourne and lament, they should be araied in womans apparell; as giving them thereby to understand, that to weepe and waile, was but a feminine and fervile passion, nothing at all besitting grave persons, well descended, or honestly brought up : for (to fay a truth) to weep and walle thus, is meere womanish, and bewraieth a bale and abject mind: and like as women ordinarily be more prone and forward thereto than men; fo Barbarians rather than Greeks; and the worle fort of people are given thereto morethan the better allo, if you go thorow all barbarous nations, you shall not find those who are most haughty-minded and magnanimous, or carry any generofity of spirit inthem, such as be the Almans or Gaules addicted hereunto; but Ægyptians Syrians, Lydians, and fuch other; for some of these (by report)use to go down into hollow caves within the ground, and there hide themselves for many daies together, and not fo much as fee the light of the fun, because (forfooth) the dead party whom they mourne for is deprived thereof. In which regard, Ion the Tragicall Poet having (as it should seeme) heard of fuch fooleries bringeth in upon the flage a woman speaking in this wife:

Come forth am I now at the last,

Tour nurse and childrent voverness.

Out of deep caves, where some dates pass;

Less in baseful heaviness.

Others there be also of these Babarians, who cut away some parts, and dismember themselves, flit their own nofes, crop their eates, miluse and disfigure the rest of their bodies, thinking to gratifie the dead in doing thus, if they feeme to exceed all measure, and that moderation which is according to nature. There are befides, who reply upon us, and fay, That they thinke we ought not to walle and lament for every kind of death, but only in regard of those that die before their time; for that they have not as yet tasted of those things which are esteemed blessings in this life, to wit, the joyes of marriage, the benefit of literature and learning, the perfection of yeares, the mannagement of Common-weale, honours, and dignities; for these be the points that they stand upon, and grieve common-wears, a ricinds or children by untimely death, for that they be disposinted and furthrate of their hopes before the time; ignorant altogether that this halty and overspeedy death, in regard of humane nature, differeth nothing at all from others: for like as in the returne to our common native Countrey, which is necessarily imposed upon all, and from which no man is exempted, some march before, others follow after, and all at length meet at one and the same place; even so in travelling this journey of fatall destiny, those that arrive late thither, gaine no more advantage than they who are thither come betime: now if any untimely or hafty death were naught simply, that of little babes and infants that fuck the breft, and cannot speake, or rather such as be newly born were work; and yet their death we beare very well and patiently, whereas we take their departure more heavily, and to the heart, who are grown to some good yeares, and all through the vanity of our foolish hopes; whereby we imagine and promite to ourselves assuredly, that those who have proceeded thus far, be past the worst, and are like to continue thus, in a good and certaine estate. It then the prefixed terme of mans lifewere the end of twenty yeares, certes, him that came to be fifteen yeares old we would not judge unripe for death, but thinke that he had attained to a com-petent age; and as for him who had accomplished the full time of twenty yeares, or approached neare thereto we would account him absolute happy, as having performed a most blessed and perfeet life: but if the course of our life reached out to two hundred yeares, he who chanced to dye at one hundred yeares end, would be thought by us to have died too soone; and no doubt his untimely death we would bewaile and lament. By these reasons therefore, and those which heretofore we have alledged, it is apparant, that even the death which we call untimely, soone admitteth consolation, and a man may be are it patiently; for this is certaine, that Troilus would have wept lesse; yea even Priamus himselse should have shed sewer teares, in case he had died sooner; at what time as the Kingdom of Troy flourished, or whiles himselfe was in that wealthy estates for which helamented fo much; which a man may evidently gather by the words which he gave to his fon Hetter, when he admonished & exhorted him to retire from the combate which he had with Achit-Returne my son within these wals, that thou from death maiest save for the Death of bis Son.

The Trej in men and women both let not Achilles have Of thee that honour, as thy life fo sweet to take away, By victory in fingle fight and hafte thy dying day: Have pitty yet my fon of me, thy wofull aged fire, Erethat my wits and fenfes faile, whom Jupiter in ire Will elfe one day at th' end of this my old and wretched yeares, Consume with miserable death, out-worne and spent with teares. As having many objects scene of sorrow and hearts griefe My fons out (hort by edge of sword, who (bould be my reliefe; My daughters trailed by baire of head, and ravished in my sight; My Pallace raz'd, their chambers fackt, wherein I took delight: And sucking babes from mothers brest pluckt, and their braines dash'd ou Against the stones of pavement hard, lie sprawling all about: When enemy with sword in hand, in heat of bloudy heart Slall havock make: and then my felfe at lost must play my part: Whom when some one by dint of sword, or launce of dart from far, Hath quite bereft of vitall breath, the hungry dogs shall arre About my corps, and at my gates hale it and drag along, Gnawing the flesh of hoary head, and grifted chin among, Mangling besides the privy parts of me a man so old, Unkindly Raine, a feet acle most pitious to behold. Thus spake the aged father though, and pluckt from head above His haires milk-white, but all these words did Hestor nothing move.

Seeing then, so many examples of this matter presented unto your eyes, you are to think and confider with your selve that death doth deliver and preserve many men from great and grievous calamities; into which without all doubt they should havefaln, if they had lived longer: But for to avoid prolixity. I will omit the rest, and satisfie my selfe with those that are related already, as being sufficient to prove and shew, that we ought not to breake out beside nature, and beyond measure into vain forrows and needlesse lamentations, which bewray nothing else but baseand feeble minds. Crantor the Philosopher was wont to say. That to suffer adversity causelesse, was no small easement to all sinister accidents of fortune: but I would rather say, That innocency is the greatest and most soveraign medicine to take away the sense of all dolour in adversity: Moreover, the love and affection that we beare unto one who is departed, confisteth not in afflicting and punishing our selves; but in doing good unto him to beloved of us: now the profit and pleasure that we are able to performe for them who are gone out of the world, is the honour that we give unto them by celebrating their good memorials; for no good man deserveth to be mourned and bewailed; but rather to be celebrated with praise and commendation: He is not worthy of forrow and lamentation, but of an honourable and glorious remembrance; he requireth notteares as testimonials of griefe and dolour : but honest offerings, and civill oblations: if it be true, that he who is gone out of this world, doth partake a more divine and heavenly condition of life, as being delivered from the fervitude of this body, and the infinite cares, perplexities, and calamities which they must needs endure, who abide in this mortalllife, until fuch time as they have run their race, and performed the prefixed course of this life, which nature hath not granted unto us for to be perpetuall, but according to the Laws of fatail defliny hath given to every one in several proportion. Such therefore as be wise and well minded, ought not in forrow and griefe for their triends departed, to passe beyond the bounds and limits of nature, and in vaine plaints and berbarous lamentations forget a meane, and never know to mits of natine, and in the many to make an end; expecting that which hath befallen to many before them, who have been fo far gone in heavinefic and melan holy, that before they had done lamenting, they have finished their daies, and ere they could lay off the mourning habit for the funerals of others, they have been ready themfelves to be carried orth to their unhappy fepulchre : infomuch as the forrows which they entertain ned for the death of another and the calamities proceeding from their own folly, have been builed together with them; so as a man might very well and truly say of them as Homer did: Whiles they their plaints and forrows made,

And therefore in such case we are estioones thus to speake unto our selves, and reason in this manner: What? shall we make an end once? or rather never cease so long as we live? but still keepa weeping and wailing as we do? For I assure you, to thinke that forrow should never end, were a point of extreame folly, confidering that oftentimes we see even those, who of all others take on and fare most impatiently in their fits of griefe and heavinesse, become (improcesse of time) so well appealed, that even at those tombs and monuments where they pitiously cried out and knockt their brelts, they met aiterwards solemnly to make magnificent seasts, with musick, minstrelse, and all the meanes of mirth that might be deviled. It is the property therefore of a mad man, and one bereft of his wits, to refolve and fet down with himselfe to dwell evermore in forrow, and not to give it over: but if men thinke and reckon, that it will cease at length and passe away, by occasion of something that may occur, let them cast this withall, that space of time will (after a fort) doit for that which once is done, cannot by God himfelfe be undon: and therefore that which now is happed contrary to our hope and expectation, is a sufficient proofe and demonstration of that which is wont to befall unto many others by the same meanes. How then? Is not this a thing that we are able to comprehend by learning and discourse of reason in nature? to wit:

The earth is full, and fealthewife, Cf fundry evils and miferies. As also: Such mischiefes are and strange calamities, Are daily one after another fent To mortall men by fatall destinies; The skie it felfe is not thereof exempt,

For not only in these daies, but time out of mind, many men (and those of the wifer fort) have deplored the mileries of mankind reputing life it felfe to be nothing else but punishment; and the very beginning of mans birth and nativity, to be no better than woe and milery. And Aristotle faith, That even Silenus, when he was caught and taken captive, pronounced as much unto King Midas. But foralmuch as this matter maketh to well to our purpose, it were best to set down the very words of the faid Philosopher; for in his book entituled, Endemus, or Of the Soule, thus he faith, Therefore (quoth he) O right excellent and of all men most fortunate, as we esteeme the dead to be blessed and happy, so we thinke that to make a lie or speake evill of them is meere impiety, and an intolerable abuse offered unto them, as being now translated into a far better and more excellent condition than before : which opinion and cultome in our Countrey is to ancient and of fuch antiquity, that no man living knoweth either the time when it first began, or the first author thereof, who brought it in but from all eternity this cultome hath been among us observed for a Law. Moreover, you know full well the old laying, that from time to time hath run currant in every mans mouth: And what is that? quoth he: then the other presently interred this answer, and said, That simply it was best, not to be born at all, and to die better than to live: and hereto have accorded and given testimony the very gods themselves, and namely, unto King Midas, who having in chase and hunting (upon a time) taken Silenus, demanded of him, what was best for man? and what it was that a man should wish for & chuse above all things in the world? At the first he would make no anfwer, but kept filence, and gave not to much as a word, untill fuch time as Midas importuned and urged him by all means; so as at length (seeing himselfe compelled even against his will) he brake out into this speech, and said unto him, O generation of small continuance! O seed of laborious and painfull destiny! O issue of fortune, wretched and miserable! Why force you me to say that unto you, which it were better for you to be ignorant of? For that your life is leffe dolorous and irkeiome, when it hath no knowledge at all of her own calamities; but fo it is, that men by no means can have that which simply is best, nor be partakers of that which is most excellent: for best it had been for all men and women both, never to have been borne at all; the next to it, and indeed the pring cipal and chief, of all those things that may be effected, (however in order it falleth our to be second) capat and triple on the original state one is born, So that it appeareth plainly, that Silentes judged and pronount is to disimmediately when the dead to be better then of the living. For the proof of which conclusion, ten thouland entences and examples there be, and ten thouland entences and examples there be, and ten thouland more upon the head of them, which may be alledged: but needlefle it were; to discourse farther of this point, and make more words thereof. Well then: we ought not to lament the death of young folk, in this regard, that they be thereor. Well then a we ought have to a miner to sample the state of the pole deprived of those bleftings and benefits which men do enjoy by long like: for uncertain it is (as we have shewed often times before) whether they be deprived of good things, or delikated from bad; considering that in mans life there be far more for rows then joyes and those (as few as they be) we get with much pains, great travel, and many cares; whereas calabities and evils come eafily unto to us; infomuch (as some men fay) they be round and united cloie, and following aprly one upon another; whereas good things be separated and disjoined, insomuest as hardly they meet togethet at the very end of mans life: and therefore it feemeth that we forget out lelves: for as Earip de faith & Not only worldly goods are not sou the day of the

but not any thing elie whatfoever; and therefore of all fuch things we are thus to fav:

The gods have all in rightful propertie, have lent and put into our hands, only for a little while; for even the banquets themselves Tas we were wont oftentimes to fay) are not displeased or offended when they be called unto, or constrained to render and give up thosestocks of money that have been committed unto them, if they be honest men, and well minded; for a man may, by good right say unto those who are in willing to redeliver the same; Hast thou forgotten that thou didst receive these moneys to repay agains and the very fame may be applyed unto all mortal men: for we have our life at Gods hands, who upon afatal necessity, have lent and left the same unto us; neither is there any time fore-fet or prefixed, within which we ought to yeeld the same; no more then the foresaid banquets are limited to some appointed day, on which they are bound to deliver up thosestocks of money which be put into their hands; but unknown and uncertain it is when they shall becalled unto for to render the same to the owners. He therefore who is exceeding much displeased and angry, when heperceiveth himselfe ready to die; or when his children have changed this life; is it not evident that he hath forgotters, both that himselfe is a man, and also that he begot children mortal? for surely it is no part of a man whose understanding is clear and entire, to be ignorant in this point, namely that a man is a mortal creature, or that he is born upon this condition, once to die; and therefore if dame Niebe, according as fables recount unto us, had been always furnished with this opinion and settled resolution; That as fables recount unto us, had been always infinined with this opinion and etted relocation that

Two rules and precepts there are written in the Temple of Apollo, at Delphos, which of all others be most necessary for mans life: the one is; Know thy selfe: and the other; Too much of nothing: for of these twaindepend all other lessons, and these two accord and found very well together; for it feemeth that the one doth declare the other, and contain the force and efficacy one of the other; for in this rule Know thy felfe, is comprised; Nothing too much: likewise in this, a man doth comprehend the knowledge of himselfe: and therefore Jon the Poet speaking of these sentences, faith thus;

Know thy selfe; a word but short, Implies a work not quickly done,

Notable is that precept of the Rythiagoreans: What part thou hast of griefe and wo, which unto man is fent,

And the tragical Poet Elchylus faid very well: Wife men and versuous in all we and diffreffe, Against God will not murmur more or leffe.

Asalio Enripides:

The man who yeelds unto necessity, Well skilled is in true divinity: And such we count, and not unworthily To bear themselves among men most wifely.

And in another place:

Who knowes the way, whatever doth befall With patience meekly to suffer all; In my conceit, he may be thought right well, Invertue and wifedom all men to excell.

But contrariwife, most men in the world complain and grumble at every thing; and what severy falleth out crosse and contrary to their hope and expectation; they imagine the same to proceed always from the malignity of fortune and the gods; which is the reason that in all accidents they weep, waile, and lament; yea, and they blame their own froward and adverse fortune: Unto whom we may very well and with great reason reply in this manner;

No Godit is, nor heavenly wight, That works thy wo, and all this fright.

but even thine own felfe, thy folly and error proceeding from ignorance: and upon this falleper-Iwasion and erroneous opinion it is, that these mencomplain of all forts of death; for if any of their friends chance to die in a forraign Country, they fetch a deep fight in his behalfe, and cry out, fav-

Alas poor wretch, wo's me for thee, that neither father tine, Nor mother deer shall prefent be, to close thy fightleffeeine.

Dieth he in his own native foil, and in the presence of father and mother? they mourn and lament, for that being taken out of their hands, he hath left unto them nothing elfe behind, but a deep impression of grief, in seeing him die before their eyes: Is it his hap to depart out of this world in se lence, and without giving any charge of ought concerning him or them? then they cry out amain, and break forth into these words ; as he did Homer :'

Also the while, that no wife speech and lesson how me gave,

Which while my breath and life doth last, I should remembed have.

Again, if he delivered any words unto them at the hour of his death, they will evermore have the fame in their mouths to kindle a new and refresh their sorrow: went he suddenly, and never bade his friends farewel, when he departed ; they lament and fay: That he was ravished away, and forcibly taken from them: if he languished, and was long in dying, then they fall a complaining, and give out, that he confumed and pined away, enduring much pain before he died: to beshort, every occasion and circumstance whatsoever, is enough to thir up their grief, and minister matter to maintain forrowful plaints. And who be they who have moved and brought in all these out-cries and lamentarions, but Poets, and even Homer himselfe, most of all other, who is the chief and Prince of the reft, who in this manner writeth :

Like as a father, in the fire of woful funerals, Burning the bones of his young son, soon after his espoulats, Sheds many tours for grief of mind, and weepeth bitterly: The mother likewise (tender heart) bewailes him piteously: Thus he by his untimely death, both parents miserable, Afflicts with forrows manifold, and wees inexplicable:

But all this while it is not certain whether it be well and rightly done, to make this forrow; for fee what followeth afterwards:

He was their only son, and born to them in their old age, Sole heir of all, and to enjoy a goodly heritage.

And who knoweth, or isable to fay, whether God in his heavenly providence, and fatherly carr of mankind, hath taken some out of the world by untimely death, foreseeing the calamities and miseries which otherwise would have happed unto them? and therefore we ought to think that nothing is befalled them which may be supposed edious or abominable.

For nothing grievous thought may be, Which comment by nesefficie:

Nothing (I say) that happert ho many either by primitive cause intimediately, or by consequence: as well in this regard, that often times most kinds of death preserve men from more grievous adversitles, and excuse them for greater miseries; as also for that it is expedient for some, never to have been born, and for others, to die in their very birth; for some, a little after they be entted into this life,

Thele and fuch like reatons, it we would conceive and impaint before hand mount minds we drawled before from this foolish heavings, and delivered from all melans holyin, and namely, considering how fiport is the term of our life between birth and death, which we ought specific to design and make much of, that we may passe the same in tranquillity, and not interrupk it with carling cares and doleful dumps, but laying a fide the marks and habits of heavineffe, have a regard hold sochetilh our own bodies, and allo co procure and promote the wellfare and good of those who live with us. Moreover, it will not be amifs to call to mind and remember those symments and realous which by great likelihood we have fometime nied to our kinsfolk and friends, when they were atflicted with like calamities, when as by way of confolation we exhorted and persuaded them to bear the common accidents of this life with a common course of patience, and humane cashs, humanely. Neither must we flew our felves to far fhort and faulty, as so here been sufficiently turnished for so appeale the fortow of others, and not be able by the remembrance of fire he comfacts, to deposit felves good: we ought therefore prefently to cure the anguish of our heate with the floresseportmedies and medicinable drugs (as it were) of reston; and to much the foomer, by how much there is may admit delay in any thingelie then indifficulting the heart of guest and indianated by the restoration of the second s as the common proverb and by-word in every mans mouths pronquince hithus much Who loves delayes, and his time fon to flack. i dimeren i hedisiani.

A man therefore is to imm his eys toward those worthy personages who have themselves magnanimous and of great generofity in bearing the death of their children: as for example, Ariavagoras the Clazomenian, Pericles, my in usung the death of their children as for example, Annuageum as Cazomenan, Fercher, and Demofibures of Athens, Dion the Sytaculian, and King Antigoma, befolestpainy column, both in these days also intimes path to whom, Annuageum (as were also bifus) having beard of his food that, by one who brought him newes thereof, even at what time as how acciding in natural Philotophy, and difcouring among his fabolars and diffuses, pauled a white, and thay and the courie of his fraction and that more but them to the whom the mean than the many and the courie of his speech, and said no more but thus unto those who were about him; Well I will than I begat my fon tobe a mortal man, And Pericles, who for his palling choquence and excellent varidom; was my ton some a mortan man, and retractive mortan participations are quarter apparent with furnamed O/mep/m, that is to fars, diving and heavenly in when tidings came to him that this two fons Partim and Xantippus had both changed this life, behaved himself cities manner and Protections are expected to him in these words: When his two fons (quoth he) both young and beautiful died within eight dayes, one after the other; be never thereod any sade dountenanced on heavy have been been protected by the contraction of the contr cheere, but took their death most patiently : for in truth hee was a man at all times inmissed with tranquillity of spirit, whereby hee dayly received great thait and commodity; not onely in respect of this happinesse, that he never tasted of hearts griefe; but also in that hee was betthat he never taked of house guernham foring him thus flouthy to take his infle and other the like crofles, effective him valiant, magnatimous, and offert excurage then him valiant, magnatimous, and offert excurage then himselfes each one being privy to his own heart, how he was wont to be upubled and afflicted in fach accidents. Dien likewise the Syracusian, when he was set one day in consultation, and deviling with his friends, hearing a great notic within his house, and a loud outcry, demanded what it was and when he heard the michance that hapned; to wit, that a fon of his was fallen from the top of the house. and dead with the fall; without any thew or fign at all of aftonishment or trouble of mind; he commanded that the breathlesse corps should be delivered unto women, for to be interred according to the manner of the Country; and as for himfelfe, he held on and continued the speech that he had begun unto his friends. Demosthenes also the Orator is reported to have followed his steps; after he had buried his onely and entirely beloved daughter, concerning whom; Alchimes thinking in reproachful wife to challenge her father, faid thus: This man within a fever-night after his daughter was departed, before that he had monmed, or performed the due observations according to the accustomed manner; being crowned with a chaplet of flowers, and putting on white robes, facrificed an Ox unto the Gods, and thus unnaturally he made no recking of her that was dead, his only daughter, and the that first called him father, wicked whetch that he is: This Rhetorician thus intending to accuse and reproach Demostheres, used this manner of speech, never thinking that ih blaming him after this manner he praised him, namely, inthat he rejected and cast behind him all mourning, and shewed that he regarded the love unto his native country, more then the natural affection and compation to those of his own blood. As for King Antigorius, When he heard of the death of his son Alexandri, who was flain in a battel, he beheld the mellerigers of these woful tidings, with a constant and undannted countenance; butafter he had mused a while with silence, and held down his head, he urrered thele words: O Alegoness, thou hast 16st thy life later then I looked for wenturing thy felie for efolutely as thou half done among thine enemies; without any care of thine own fafety; or respect of my admonitions. These noble personages, there is no man but doth admire, and highly regard for their contanty and magnanimity; but which it comet to the point and trial indeed, they cannot imitate them through the weaknesse and imbecillity of mind, which proceedeth from ignorance, and want of good intrinctions: howbeit, there be many examples of those who have right nobly and vertuously carried themselves in the death and losse of their friends and near kindmen, which we may read in Histories, as well Greek as Latine; but those that I have rehearled already may suffice (I suppose) romove you for to lay away this most irksome mourning, and vain forrow that you take, which booteth not, nor can ferve to any good: for that young men of excellent vertue, who die in their youth, are in the grace and favour of the gods, for being taken a-way in their best time, I have already shewed heretofore, and now also will I addresse my selfein this place as briefly as possibly I can to discourse, giving testimony of the truth to this notable wise ientence of Menander.

To whom the godt wouch afetheir love and grace,

He lives not long, but foon hath run his race.

But peradventure (my most loving and right deer friend) you may reply in this manner upon me: Namely, that young Apollouist, your ion, enjoyed the world at will, and had all things to his hearts defire i yea; and more befitting it was, that you should have departed out of this life, and been enter-red by him, who was now in the flower of his age, which had been more answerable to our nature, and according to the course of humanity. True it is I confesse, but haply not agreeable to that heavenly providence and government of this universal world: and verily in regard of him who is now in a bleffed effate, it was not natural for him to remain in this life longer then the term prefixed and limitted unto him; but after he had honeftly performed the course of his time, it was needful and requifte for him to take the way for to return unto his destiny that called for him to come unto her: but you will say, that he died an untimely death; trie, and so much the happier he is, in that he hath felt no more miseries of this life: for as Euripides said very well;

That which by name of life we call, Indeed istravel continual.

Certes this fon of yours (I must needs fay) is soon gone, and in the very best of his years and flower of his age, a young man in all points entire and perfect, a fresh Bachelor, affected, esteemed and wel reputed of all those that kept him company, loving to his father, kind to his mother, affectionate to his kinsfolk and friends, studious of good literature, and (to say all in a word) a lover of all men-respecting with severence (no lesse then sathers), those friends, who were elder then himselse, making much of his equals and familiars, honouring those who were his teachers; to firangers as well as to Citizens most civil and courteous, gracious and pleasant to all; generally beloved, as well for his fweet attractive countenance, as his lovely affability. All this (I confesse) is most true; but you ought to confider and take this withal: That he is translated before us in very good time out of this mortal and transitory life into everlasting eternity, carrying with him the general praise and and bleffed acclamation of all men for his piety and observance toward you, as also for your fatherly regard of him; and departed he is as from some banquet, before he is fallen into drunkenness and folly, which he could not have eschewed, but it would have ensued upon old age: and if the faying of ancient Poets and Philosophers be true, as it seemeth verily to be, namely: That good men and those that devoutly serve God, whensoever they die, have honour and preferment in the other world, and a place allotted them apart, where their fouls abide and converfe; furely you are greatly to hope very well, that your fon is canonized and placed in the number of those blessed Saints; concerning the state of which happy wights deceased, Pindarus, the Lyick Poet, writeth in his Capticles

And as for that divine Philosopher Place, he had disputed much, and alledged many reasons in his * Treatise of the soul, as touching the immortality thereof, like as in his books of Policy, in the Dia- * Called logue installed Menon, in that also which beareth the name of Gorgias, and in divers places of many or Phase. thers: But as concerning those discourses which he hath expressy made in his Dialogne; I will give you an extract thereof apart by it selfe, according to your request; and for this present I will deliver those points which are to the purpose, and expedient to the matter in hand, to wit, what Socrates faid to Callicles the Athenian, a familiar friend and scholar of Gorgias the Rhetorician. Thus therefore faith Socrates in Plate: Giverer then, and litten unto a most elegant speech, which you (I inpedie) will think to be a meer fable or tale, but I esteem an undoubted truth, and as a true report I will relate it unto you. Soit was, that (according to the narration of Honer) Impiter, Neptane and Pluto, parted between themselves the empire which sell unto them from their father: now this law there was concerning men, during the reign of Saurrae (which also stood in force time out of minde, and remaineth even at this day among the gods) That look what man soever lead a just and holy life, after his death he should take his way directly to certainfortunate Islands, there to remain in blis and happiness, freed from all misery and inselicity; but contrariwise, he that lived unjustly, without fear and reverence of the gods, should go to a certain prison of justice and punishment, named Tiriarus, that is to fay, Hell:now the Indges who fat judicially, and gave their doom of fuch persons, as well in Surames dayes, as he the Beginning allo of the reign of Japiner, were those mentalive, who have increment and judgements of other men living, even upon that very day wherein they were to depart this life: by realish whereof there passed many judgements, not good, whill sith time as the said of the contraction of more incrementals of those fortunate lifes came and made report the this aniver; it will take order from henceforth, and provide that it shall be so no more; for the take order from henceforth, and provide that it shall be so no more; for the cance of this dilorder and abuse in judgment is this; that they who are to be tried; controlled and arrayed unto the bar, for to receive their doom, whiles they are yet living; yea, and many of them happy having flitty foules, are apparelled (as it were) with fair and beautiful bodies, with nobity of birth and parentage, yea, and adorned with riches; and whiles they stand before the tributal to be judged, many there be who come to depose and give testimony in their behalfe, that they lived well: the Judges therefore (being dazled and amazed with these witnesses and depositions, being themselves also likewise arayed) to give sentence, having before, their minds, their eyes, their ears, and whole body covered; no marvel therefore if these be impediments to impeach sound and sincete judgement, to wit, as well their own vesture, as the raiment of the Judges. First and formost therefore, good heed would be had, that men may know no more before hand the hour of their death; for now they forefee the term and end of life; whereupon left Prometheus have first in charge, that from henceforth menmay have no fore knowledge of their dying day; and then all judgements, hereafter shall passe indifferently of them that be all naked. For which purpose it were requisite that they be all first dead, as well the parties in question, as the Judges themselves; so that they come to hear causes and fir in judgement with their soules only, upon the soules likewise of those who are departed; even so soon as they are separated from the bodies; being destitute now and solorn of all kinsfolk and friends to affult them, as having left behind them upon earth, all the vefture and ornaments which they were wont to have; by which means, the judgement of them may passe more just and right: which Iknowing well enough, before you were acquainted therewith, have ordained mine own sons to be Judges; namely, for Asiatwo, Minos, and Rhadamanthus, and one for Europe, to wit, Asiatwo: These therefore after they be dead, shall st in judgement within a meddow, at a quarrefour or crosse way, whereof the one leadeth to the fortunate isles, the other to Hell: Rhadamanthus thall determine of their in 1976; Aeuctu of those in Europe; and as for Minos, I will grant unto him a preeminence in judgement above the rest: in case there happen some master unknown to one of the other two, and steep their ceiting, he may upon weighing and esamining their opinions, give his definitive senence, and so it shall be determined by a most small and just doom, whether way each one shall go. This is that OC allietes, which I have heard, and bekeveto be most true; whereout I gather this conclusion in the end; that death is no other thing then the separation of the soul from the body. Thus you see O Apollonian my most deer friend) what I have collected with great care and diligence, to compose so your lake a Consolatory Oration, or Discourse, which I take to be most necessary for you, as well to assware and rid away your present grief, to appeale likewise, and cause to cease this nearwises and motivaring that you make, which of all things is most unpleasant and troublectome: as also to compite within it that praise authonour which (me thought) I owed as ducumto the memorial of your for Apollonius, of all others exceedingly beloved of the gods: which honoir inmy concelt is a thing nioft convenient and acceptable unto those, who by happy memory, and eventating glory are coinferrated to immortality. You shall do your part therefore, and very witely, if you offly those feations which are theren contained: you shall gratife your food likewise, and do him a great pleasure, in case you take up in time, and return from this vain affliction (wherewith you purifft and undo both body and mind) unto your accustomed, ordinary and natural course of life: for like as whiles he lived with us he was nothing well appayed, and took no contentment to fee either father or mother fad and desolate; even so now, when he converseth and solaceth himselfe in all joy with the gods, doubtleffe he cannot like well of this flate wherein you are. Therefore plack up your heart, and take con-tage like a man of worth, of magnatimity, and one that loveth his children well i release your lefte first and then the mother of the young Gentleman together with his kinstolk and friends from this kind of milety, and take to a more quiet and peaceable manner of life, which will be both to your fon departed, and to all of us (who have regard of your perfort, as it becometh is thore agree all

A consolatory Letter, or Discourse, sent unto bis own Wife, as touching the death of her and his daughter.

PLUTARCHanto bis Wife : Grecting.

He messenger whom you sent of purpose, to bring me word as touching the death of our life tle daughter, went out of his way (as I suppose) and so missed of me, as he journeyed toward Athens; howbeit, when I was arrived at Tanagra, I heatd that she had changed this life. Now, as concerning the funerals and enterring of her, I am verily perfivaded, that you have already taken sufficient order, so as that the thing is not to do; and I pray God, that you have performed that duty in such fort, that neither for the present, not the time to come, it work you any grievance and displeasure: but if haply you have put off any such complements (which you were willing enough of your felfe to accomplish) until you knew my mind and pleasure, thinking that in so doing, you should with better will and more patiently bear this adverse accident; then I pray you, let the same be performed without all curiofity and superfittion; and yet I must needs lay, you are as little given that way as any woman that I know: this only I would admonify you, (dear heart) that in this case, you shew (both in regard of your felle and allo of me) a couldary and tranquillity of mind; for mine own part, I conceive and meature in mine own heart, this loss, according to the country of the country o ding to the nature and greatnesse thereof, and so I esteem of it accordingly; but if I should finde, that you took it impatiently, this would be much more grievous unto me, and wound my heart more, then the calamity it seller that causeth it is and yet am into the opporten and both either of an Oak or a Rock; whereof you can bare me good witnesse, knowing that we both together have reared many of our children at home in house, even with our own hands; and how I loved this gille most tenderly, both for that you were very desirous (after four sons, one after another in a row sto bear a daughter, as also for that in regard of that fancy, I took occasion to give her your name; now, besides that natural fatherly affection, which commonly men have toward little babes, there was one particular property that gave an edge thereto; and caused me to love her above the rest; and that was a special grace that she had, to make joy and pleasure, and the same without any mixture at all of confinence or frowardnesses, and nothing given to whining and complaint; for the was of a wonder-ful kind and gentle nature, loving the was again to those that loved her, and marvellous desirous to gratifie and pleasure others : in which regards, the both delighted me, and also yeelded no small testimony of rare debonairity that nature had endued her withal; for the would make prety meanes to her nurle, and feem (as it were) to entreat her to give the breft or pap, not onely to other infants, like her felle, her play-feeres, but allo to little babies and puppers, and finch like gawds as little one stake joy in, and wherewith they use to play; as if upon a fingular courtefie and humanity fine could find in her hear to communicate and diffribute from her own table, even the best things that the had, among them that did her any pleasure. But I see no realon (sweet wife) why these lovely qualities and such like, wherein we took contentment and joy in her life time, should disquiecand troubleus now, after her death, when we either think of make relation of them: and I fear againe, left by our dolour and grief, we abandon and put clean away all the terriendrance thereby, like as Clymene defired to do, when she said :

Allexeroife abroad, favewell for me.
As avoiding alwayes and trembling at the remembrance and commembration of hee fou, which did no other good but renew her griefand dolour; for naturally we feek to flee all that troublethand offendeth us. We ought therefore to to demeation felves, that as whiles the lived, we had nothing in the world more fiveer to embrace, more pleasant to see, or delectable to hear then our daughter; so the cogitation of her, may still abide and live with usall our life time, having by many degrees our joy multiplyed more then our heavineffe augmented; if it be meet and fit that the reasons and arguments which we have often times delivered to others, should profit us when time and occasion requireth, and not lie still and idle for any good we have by them, nor challenge and accuse us, on requirem; and accuse us, for that in flead of joyes path, we bring upon our felves many more griefs by far. They that have come unto us, report thus much of you, and that with great admiration of your vertue, that you never put on mourning weed, nor fo much as changed your robe, and that by no means you could be brought to disfigure your felfe, or any of your waiting maidens and women about you, nor offer any ourrage or injury to them in this behalfe; neither did you fet out her funerals with any fump. tuous panegyrical pomp, as if it had been some solemn feast, but performed every thing soberly and civilly, after a fill manner, accompanied only with our kinsfolk and friends. But my selfe verilemade no great wonder (that you who never took pride and pleasure to be seen, either in Theater or in publick procession, but rather alwayes esteemed all such magnificence so vain, and sumptuosior inperfuous, even in those things that tended to delight) have observed the most lafe way of plain nesse and simplicity, in these occasions of fortow and ladnesse. For a vertuous and chaste, Matron ought not onely to keep her selfe pure and inviolate in Bacchanal feasts; but also to think thus with her selfe, that the turbulent storms of sorrow, and passionate motions of anguish had no lesseneed of continency to refift and withfland, not the naturall love and affection of mothers to their children, as many think, but intemperance of the mind. For we allow and graunt unto this natural kindnesse a certain affection to bewaile, to reverence, to wish for, to long after, and to beare in mind those that are departed; but the excessive and insatiable desire of lamentations, which forcethmen and women to loud out-tries to knock, beat, and mangle their own bodies, is no left unfeenly and shamefull, then incontinence in pleasures: howbeir, it seemeth by good right to deserve excuse and pardon, for that in this undecency, there is grief & bitterness of forrow adjoyned, wheras in the other, pleasure and delight : for what is more absurd and senselesse, thento seem for to take away excelle of laughter and mirth: but contrariwise to give head unto freams of tears which proceed from one fountain, and to fuffer folk to give themselves over to weeping and lamentation as much as they will; as also that which some use to do, namely, to chide and rebuke their wives for some fweet perfumes, odoriferous pomanders, or purple garments, which they are defirous to have; and in the mean while permit them, to tear their hair in time of mourning, to shave their heads, to put on black, to se unicemly upon the bare ground, or in ashes, and in most painful manner to cry out upon God and man; yea, and that which of all others is worlt, when their wives chastife excerfively, or punish unjustly their servants, to come between and stay their hands; but when they rigorously and cruelly torment themselves, to let them alone and neglect them in those crosse accidents, which contrariwise had need of facility and humanity? But between us twain, sweet heart, there was never any need of such fray or combat, and I suppose there will never be. For to speak of that frugality which is seen in plain and simple apparel, or of sobriety in ordinary dyet, and tending of the body: never was there any Philosopher yet converting with us in our house, whom you put not down and fruck into an extraordinary amaze, nor so much as a Citizen whom you caused not to admire (as a strange and wonderful sight, whether it were in publick sacrifices, or in frequent theaters, and folemn procedions) your rare fimplicity: femblably, heretofore you frequent great conflancy upon the like conflict and accident at the death of your eldeft fon; and again when that gentle and beautiful Charon departed from us untimely, in the prime of his years; and I remember very well that certain strangers who journeyed with mealong from the sea side, (at what time as word was brought of my sons death) came home with others to my house, who seeing all things there fetled, nothing out of order, but all filent and quiet (as they themfelves afterward made report) began to think that the faid news was falle, and no such calamity had hapned; so wisely had you composed all matters within house, when as I wis, there was good occasion given that might have excused some disorder and confusion : and yet this son you were nurse unto your selle, and gave it suckat your own pap; yea, and endured the painful incision of your breast, by reason of a cancerous hard tumor that came by a contusion. Oh, the generosity of a vertuous dame, and behold the kindnesse of a mother toward her children! whereas you shall see many other mothers to receive their young babes at the hands of their nurses, to dandle and play withal, for sooth, in mirthand passime: but asterwards the same women (if their insants chance to die) give themselves over to all vain mourning, and bootlesse sorrow, which proceedeth not doubtlesse from good will indeed; (for surely hearty affection is reasonable, honest and considerate) but rather from a soolist. opinion mingled with a little natural kindnesse; and this is it that engendereth savage, furious; and implacable forrows. And verily Esope (as it should feem) was not ignorant hereof, for hereporteth this narration: That when Jupiter made a dole or distribution of honors among the gods and goddesses; Sorrow came afterwards and made suit likewise to be honoured, and so he bestowed upon her, tears, plaints, lamentations; but for them only who are willing thereto, and ready to give herentertainment. And I affure you, this they commonly do at the very beginning; for every one of his own accord bringeth in, and admitteth forrow unto him, who (after the is once entertained, and in processe of time well setled, so that she is become domestical and familiar) will not be driven out of dores nor begone, if a man would never so faine; and therefore resistance must be made against her, even at the very gate, neither ought we to abandon our hold, and quit the fort, renting our garments, rearing or shearing our hairs, or doing other such things, as ordinarily happen every day ; cauting amanto be confused, shameful, and discouraged, making his heart base, abject and sautup, that he cannot enlarge it; but remain poor and timorous; bringing him to this passe, that he dare not be meany, inproving it alrogether unlawful to laugh, to come abroad and fee the funne-light, to converiewith men, of to eat or drink in company; into such a captivity is he brought through forrowand melancholy: upon this inconvenience after it hath once gotten head, there, followeth the neglect of the body; no care of amointing or bathing, and generally a rectheleftenede and concempt of all things belonging to this lifes whereas comparisoned by good reason, when them indistributions milited by the firength of an able and cheenfull body: for a great part of the fouls grief is allayed, and the edge thereof as it were dulled, when the body is fresh and disposed to alacrity, like as the waves of the sea be laid even, during a calme and fair weather a hur contratiwife, if by reason that the body be evil entreated, and not regarded with good diet and choice keeping, at is become dried; rough and hard, in such fort, as from it there breath no (weet and comfortable exhalations unto the foul, but all smoaky and bitter vapours of dolour, griefe, and fadnesse annoyher; then is it no easie matterfor men (be they never so willing and desirous) to recover themselves, but that their souls being thus seized upon by so grievous passions, will be afficked, and tormented still. But that which is most dangerous and dreadful in this case, I never seared in your behalfe (to wis) That foolish women should come and visit you, and then fall aweeping, lamenting, and crying with you lathing (Imay fay to you) that is enough to whet for iow, and awaken it it were alleep, not fuffering it either by it felte, or by means of help and inca cor from another, to paffe, fade, and vanish away is for I know very well what ado you had and into what a conflict you entred about the lifter of Theon; when you would have affilled her, and relifted other women who came in to her with great cries and loud lamentations, as if they brought fire with them, in all hafteto maintain and encrease that which was kindled already. True it is indeed; that when a friends or neighbours house is seen on fire, every man runneth as fast as he can to help for to quench the same : but when they see their souls burning in griefe and forrow, they contrariwise bring more fewel and matter fill to augment, or keep the faid fire: also if a man be discased in his eyes, he is not permitted to handle, or touch them with his hands, especially it they be spod-shotten, and possessed with any inflammation; whereas he who sits mourning and sorrowing at home in his house, offereth and presenteth himselfe to the first commer, and to every one that is willing to irritate, filt, and provoak his passion (as it were a sloud of stream, that is let out and set a rinning) inlomuch as where before the grievance did but itch or smart a little, it now begins to shoot, to ake; to be fell and angry, fo that it becometh a great and dangerous malady in the end: but I am verily periwaded (I fay) that you know how to preferve your felfe from these extremities. Now over and besides, endeavour to reduce and call again to mind the time when as we had not this daughter, namely, when the was as youndornshow we had no cause then to complain of forume then fee you join (as it were with one tenon) this present, with that which is pass, setting the case as if we were returned again to the same state wherein we were before: for it will appear (my good wife) that we are discontented that ever she was born, in case we make shew that we were in better condition before her birth, then afterwards ; not that I wish we should abolish out of our remembrance the two years space between her nativity and decease; but rather count and reckon it among other our pleatures and bleffings, as during which time, we had the fruition of joy, mirth and pattime; and not to eftern that good which was but little and endured a finall, while, our great infortunity; nor yet feem unthankful to fortune, for the favour which the hath done unto us, because the added not thereto that length of life which we hoped and expected. Certes to rest contented always with the gods; to think and speak of them revetently as it becometh; not to complain of fortune, but to take in good, worth what loever it pleaseth her to send, bringeth evermore a fair and pleasant fruit: but he who in these cases; putteth out of remembrance the good things that he hath, transporting and turning his thoughts and cogitations from obscure and troublesome occurrents, unto those which be clear and resplendent; if he do not by this means utterly extinguish his forrows; yet at leastwise by mingling and tempering it with the contrary, he shall be able to diminish or else make it morefeeble: for like as a sweet odour and fragtant ointment delighteth and refresheth alwayes the fense of smelling, and besides is a remedy against stinking savours; even so the cogitation of these be-nesses which men have otherwise received, serveth as a most necessary and present succour in time of advertity unto as many as refuse not to remember and call to mind their joyes passed, and who never at all for any accident what foever complain of fortune; which we ought not to do in reason and honefty, unleffe we would feem to accuse and blame this life which we enjoy, for some crosse or accidentias if we cast away a book, if it have but one blur or blot in it, being otherwise written throughout most clean and fair; for you have heard it oftentimes said, that the beattrade of those who are departed, dependeth upon the right and found discourses of our understanding, and the same tending to one constant disposition; as also, that the changes and alterations of fortune bear no greatsway, to infer much declination or casualty in our life; but if we also as the common fort, must be ruled and governed by external things without us, if we reck on and count the chances and casualties of fortune, and admittor judges of our felicity or milery, the bale and vulgar fort of people; yet take you no heed to those tears, plaints, and moans that men or women make who come to visit you at this present, who also (upon a foolish custome, and asit were of course) have them ready at command for every one ; but rather confider this with your selfe; how happy you are reputed, even by those who come unto you, who would gladly and with lall allots he artsibedite unto you, integral of those children who through the property of the p

Moreover, as conching that which you heard of others, who are wone to perfinede many of the vulgar fort, faying, That the foul once separated from the body; is difficited, and seeleth no pain of dolorat all: I amafured, that you yield no credit and beliefe to the positions 328 Well in regard of tholereasons and instructions which you have received by tradition from our Arrestors, as also of thole facred and fymbolical mysteries of Barchin, which we know well enough, who are of that religious confraternity, and professed therein. Being grounded thereforein this pithi jote, and holding it firmly for an undoubted truth : That our fould incorruptable did immortal spoil are to think charir fareth with it, as ir doth with little birds that are caught by the lowler alive, and came into mans hands : for if it have been kept and noneithed daintily along time within the budy, for harir be intred to be gentle and familiar unto this life; 'to wis, by the mainteenmot family affairs and long custome, it returned this fier again, and re-turies a second time (after many generations) into the body: it nevertaketh reft nor ceafeth, but is inwrapped within the affections of the fells. and entangled with the adventures of the world, and calamities intident to our nature : for I would not have you to think that old age is to be blamed and reprosthed for rivels and wrinkles, nor in regard of hoary white haires, nor yet for the imbeelies and feebleneffe of the body; but the world and most odious thing in it, is this: That it cansest the fort to take competent by the remembrance of those things whereof it had experience whiles it stayed therein, and was too much addicted and affectionate unito it, whereby it bendeth and bowerli, yea, and retainerly that form or figure which it took of the body, by being so long devoted thereto, whereas that which is taken away in youth, pretendeth a better effate and condition, as being framed to a gentler habit, more fort, tractable, and less compact, putting on now a natural rectifude, much like as fire, which being quenched, if it be kindled again; brineth out, & recovereth vigor incontinently : which is the cause that it is far better Berines to yeeld up on al breath, before that the south have taken too deep an imbiblision, or liking of terrefie things here below, and ere in be made soft and kender with the love of the body, and sair were by certain medicines and forcible charms united and incorporates into it. The truth hieros may appear yer better, by the sashions and ancient customes of this Cothstrey; for our Children's (when their children die young) burders offer mortraries, hot perform any savintees and determinates for them, as others are worn to do forthe deat. How it cometh that the Divine Justice deferreth other whiles the punishment of wicked persons.

The Summary.

Porasmuch as the order of all considerate justice imported analyequireth, that good men should be maintained and cheristed, but contravivis, wicked persons repressed and pumsed for their levid acts: the spicureams (drunken and importance with false supposals, setting to the conduct of this world affaire, some that be honest and versuous, diffield and appressed with the world and practices; where an or having ain, phobemangh and vicious, continue in repose, without any chustisement at all for their missioneral monthmeedstake from Godino dispose and givernment of humane affairs, holding and maintaining this point: That all things roll and run at uventure, and that there is no other cause of the good and buil accidents of this life, but either fortune, or elferthenoill of man. Now among other arguments which they have so confirm themselves, in this unhapp and impious opinion; the patience and long sufferland the Diwine Inflice, is one of the principal; concluding thereby very fondly; that (considering Mulefators at other Supported and farn to escape all chastifement) there is no Deity or Godhead at ally which regardeth men, either to remard them for vertue; or to panish and do vengeance for their iniquity and transferestion; Platach therefore, having to deale in his time with such dangerous spirits, consuteth them in this Treatife, which of all others is most excellent, and deserveth to be read and perused over again in these wretched dayts, wherein Epicurifms besteth up the head us high as as any time ever before. That is us (I configle) that Theology and Divinity is able to furnish us with reasons and answers more firm and effectivel (without comparison) then all the Philosophy of Pagans what server: howbest, for all that, there is there inflicted to the description to be found (at touching this point) for to stop the mouths of those who have any remains of shame, honely, or conscience behind in them. This present Treatise may very well be divided into principal parts: in the former; Epicurus being brought into dispute against Divine Providence, and so departing without stay for answer, other Philosophers deliberate to berefolved of this point in his absence: nind before that theyrefure his objection, two of them do amplific and exaggerate the same at large: which done, our dathor taketh the question in hand, and by seven forcible arguments, of sirm answers, refelleth the biasphemy of the Epicureans, proving by sundry argument, enriched with similitudes, sentences, examples and notable hiflories; that wicked persons never continue unpunished, but that the vengeance of God accompanies h quickly and continually their misseeds. In the second part, they debate a certain question depending of the precident objection, to wit, Wherefore children be chastised for the sins of their fathers and ancestoris? and there was a certain Philosopher named Timon, who handled this master, taxing after an oblique manner; the instice of God, which Plutarch maintaineth and defendeth; sheiring by divers reasons, that what sever Fimon had alledged, was meer false; and that God did no injury at all unto these children, in withdrawing his grace and favour from them, and chastifing them so together with their Parents, finding themselves, culpable for their part. But in this place, our author unswereth not sufficiently and to the purpose; asbeing ignorant of original fin, and the universal corruption of Adams children, which emerappeth them all in the Same condemnation, although some are farther gone in sinfullife, according as they be grown to more years, and so augment their punishment; insomuch as we may well marvel at this, that a poor Pagan hath so far proceeded in this point of Theology; and Christians have so much greater occusions olook unto themselves, in the midft of this light which directeth them, confidering how this man could fee fo cleer in dark heffe, which appeareth sufficiently in the end of this discourse ; where he entermedleth certain fables as touching the state of our souls after they be parted from the bodies.

How it cometh that the Divine Justice deferrerh other whiles the punishment of wicked persons.

and not blok at all in sood earder, but keep a practing and habiting begainst the providence, of God, farming and investing most bitterly, and in reproachful tearns, as if he had been in a fit of anger and rage. Then Parrocless that which he tracked, as routhing the long delay and stackeds for Divine Inputs in punishing the wicked, inmy conceit was a great objection and troubled me much, and to say a truth, their reasons and words which he delivered have imprinted in me a new opinion, so as now I am l'ecome a novice, and so Begin again to learfit. True it is that long fince I was discontented in my heart to hear Europides speak in this wife;

He putteth off from day to day,

For it were not meet and dee ent, that Godhould be flow in any action whatfoever, and leaft of all in punishing finners; who are themselves nothing floathful nor make delay in perpetrating wicked deeds, but are carried most speedily and with exceeding violence of their passions; pricked forward to do wrongand mischiefe, And verily when punishment ensueth hard after injury and violence committed ishere is nothing as (Thursdides faith) that fo foon Hoppeth up the passage against those who are most prone and ready to run into all kind of wickednesse; for there is no delay of paiment that formuch enfeebleth the hope, and breaketh the heart of a man wronged and offended, mor caufeth him to be fo infolent and audacious, who is disposed to mitchief, as the deferring of justice and punishment; whereas contrariwise the corrections, and chastisements, that follow immediately upon lewd acts, and meet with the malefactors betimes are a means both to represe all future outrage in offenders, and also to comfort and pacific the heart of those who are wronged. For mine ownpart the faying of Bias troubleth me many times; as often as I think upon it, for thus he spake unto a notorious wicked man : I doubt not but thou shalt one day smart for this geere, and pay for thy lewdnesse; but I fear I shall never live to see it. For what good unto the Messenians being slaine, before, did the punishment of Aristocrates, who having betrayed them in the battel of Copres, was not detected and discovered for his treason in twenty yearsafter, during which time, he was always King of Arcadia, and being at the last convicted for the said treathery, suffered punishment for his defens? mean while, those whom he had caused to be massacred, were not in the world to see it. Or what comfort and confolation received the Orchomenians, who lost their Children, kinsfolk and friends, through the treaton of Lycifeus, by the malady which long after feized upon him, eating and confuming all his body? who ever as he dipped and bathed his feet in the giver water, kept a swearing and curfing, that he thus rotted and was eaten away, for the treachery which most wickedly he had committed? And at Athen the childrens children of thosepoor wretches who were killed within the priviledged place of fanctuary, could never see the vengeance of the gods which afterwards fell upon those bloody and facrilegious caitifes, whose dead bodies and bones being excommunicate, were banished, and cast out beyond the confines of their parive country. And therefore me thinks Enripides is very abfurd, whento divert men from wickednesse he useth such words as these:

ard, when to divert men from manufact,
Juffice (fear not) will not thee overtake,
To pierce the heart, or deep nound ever make In liver thine; nor any mortal wight. Besides, though leudhe be, and do no right,

But flow five goes, and filent to impeach
And chaffief fuch, if ever them fire reach.

For I affire you, it is not like, that wicked and ungracious perfons use any other perswassions, but the very same to incite, move and encourage themselves to enterprize any lewd and wicked acts, as making this account and reckoning, that justice will quickly yeeld her fruit ripe in due time, and the same evermore certain; whereas punishment cometh late and long after the pleasure and fruition of the faid wickedness. When Patrocleas had discoursed in this wife, Olympiacus took the matter in hand and faid unto him ; Mark moreover (O Parrollow) what in convenience and abjurdity follow-eth upon this flownesse of divine justice; and prolonging the punishment of Maletactors? for it caufeth unbelief in men, and namely, that they are not perswaded that it is by the providence of God that such be punished; and the calamity that cometh upon wicked ones, not presently upon every finful at that they have committed, but long time after, is reputed by them infelicity, and they call it their fortune, and not their punishment; whereupon it cometh to pais, that they have no benefit thereby, nor be any whit better, for howfoever they grieve and be discontented at the accidents which befall unto them, yet they never repent for the lewd acts they have before committed. And like as in punishment among us, a little pinch, stripe, or lash given unto one for a fault or error, prefently upon the doing thereof, doth correct the party, and reduce him to his duty; whereas the wrings, scourgings, knocks, and sounding thumps, which come a good while after; seem to be given upon some occasion besides, and for another cause rather then to teach; and therefore well may they put him to pain and griefe, but infirmation they yeeld none; even so naughtinesse rebuked and repressed, by some present chastisement, every time that it trespassers and transgressets, howsoever it be painful at first, yet in the end it bethinketh it selfe, learneth to be humbled, and to fear God as a severe justicer, who hath an eye upon the deeds and passions of men, for to punish the mincontinently, and without delay; whereas this juffice and revenge which commeth fo flowly, and with a fost pace (as Emipides laith) upon the wicked and ungodly persons, by reason of the long intermisfion, the inconstant and wandring incertitude, and the consuled disorder resembleth chance and adventure more then the defign of any providence : infomuch as I cannot conceive or fee what profit can be in these grindstones (as they call them) of the gods, which are so long a grinding; especially, feeing that the judgment and punishment of finners is thereby obscured, and the fear of fin made ally, cerng that he pushed. Upon the delivery of these words; I began to fludy and muse with my effect then Timor: Would you (quoth he) that I should clear this doubt once for all, and to make selfer then Timor: an end of this disputation? or permit him first to dispute and reason against these oppositions? And what need is there (answered 1) to come in with a third wave for to overflow and drown at once what needs and discourse, if he be not able to refute the former objections, nor to escape and avoid the challenges already made. First and formost therefore to begin at the head, and (as the manner to be a support of the support o is, to fay) at the goddeffe Vefta, (for the reverent regard and religious fear that the Academick Phiis, to my at the good have unto God, as an heavenly father) we utterly dictaim, and refueto fpeak of the Deity, as if we knew for certainty what it is: for it were a greater prefumption in us who are of the Deity, 28 11 We knew for certainly what it is 100 11 were a greater prelumption in its who are but mortal men, to enterprise any fet speech or discovrie, as touching gods or demi-gods, then for one who is altogether ignorant in long, to dispute of musick or for them who never were in camp, nor faw so much as a battel fought, to put themselves forward to discourse of arms and warfare; taking upon us, (unskilful as we are, and void of art) a fantattical knowledge grounded onely upon fome light opinion, and conjecture of our own, as if we were right cunning workmen and artifanes: for it is not his part, who is not fludied in the art of Physick, to guesse at the reason and consideration that the Phylician or Chirurgian had, why he made incision no sooner in his Patient, but stayed long ere he proceeded thereto? or wherefore he bathed him not yesterday, but to day? semblably, it is neither easie nor safe for a mortal manto speak otherwise of the gods, then of those who knew well enough the due time and opportunity to minister a meet and convenient medicine, unto vice and fin; and exhibit punishment to every trespasse, as an appropriate drug, or confection to cure and heale each malady; notwithstanding that the same measure and quantity be not common to all delinquents, nor one only time and the same, is alwayes meet therefore. Now that the Phyfick or Medicine of the foul, which is called Right and Judice; is one of the greatest Sciences that are: Pindarus himself, besides an infinite number of others, beateth witness; when he calleth the Lord and Governour of the world, to wit, God, a most excellent and perfect artificer, as being the author and creator of justice, unto whom it appertaineth to define and determine, when, in what manner, and how far forth, it is meet and reasonable to chastise and punish each offender. what mannet, and in the Admorthe fon of Jupiter was (in this science) the distiple of his father; giving us hereby to understand, that it is not possible for one to carry himselfe well in the execution of justice, nor to judge a right of him that doth as he ought: unlesse he have before learned that Science, and be throughly skilful therein. Furthermore, the positive laws which men have established, feem not always to be grounded upon reason, or to found and accord in all respects with absolute equity and justice; but some of their ordinances be such, as in outward appearance may be thought ridiculous, and worthy of mockery : as for example. At Laced mon the high control!ers, called Ephori, to foon as they be enstalled in their magistracy, cause proclamation to be published by found of trumpet, that no manshould wear Mustachoes, or nourish the hair on their upper lips; also that willingly every man should obey the laws, to the end that they might not be hard or grieyous unto them. The Romans also, when they affranchise any slave, and make him free ; cast upon their bodies a little imalrod or wand: likewise when they draw their last wills or testaments, inftitute some for their heirs, whom it pleaseth them, but to others they leave their goods to sell; a thing that carrieth no fense nor reason with it, But yet more absurd and unreasonable is that statute of Solons making, wherein it was provided: That what Citizen foever, in a civil fedition, ranged not himlelfe to a fide, nor took part with one or other faction, should be noted with infamy, and diabled for being capable of any honourable dignity. In one word, a man may alledge an infinite number of abfurdities befides, contained in the civil laws; who neither knoweth the realon of the Law-giver that wrote them, nor the cause why they were set down. If then it be so difficult to conceive and understand the reasons which have moved menthus to do, is it any marvel that we are ignorant of the cause, why God chastiseth one man sooner and another later? howbeit, this that I have faid, is not for any pretence of flarting back and running away, but rather for to crave leave and pardon, to the end that our speech having an eye thereto, (as unto an haven and place of refuge;) might be the more hardy, with boldness to range forth still in probabilities, to the matter in doubt and question : But I would have you consider first, that (according to the saying of Plate) God having set himself before the eys of the whole world, as a perfect pattern and example of all goodness, doth unto as many as can follow and imitate his divinity, infuse humane vertue, which is in some fort conformable and like unto him; for the general nature of this universal world, being at the first a confused and disordered Chaos, obtained this principle and element, for to change to the better, and by some conformity and participation of the Idea of Divine Vertue, to become this beautiful frame of the World: And even the very same man saith moreover: That nature hath raised our eyefight on high, and lightned the same, that by the view and admiration of those celestial bodies which move in heaven, our foul might learn to embrace and be accustomed to love that which is beautiful and in good order, as also to be an enemy unto irregular and inordinate passions; yea, and to avoid doing of things rashly and at adventure, which in truth is the very source of all vice and sinne; for there is nothing in the world wherein a man may have agreater fruition of God, then by the example and imitation of his good and decent qualities, to become honest and vertuous: wherefore if we perceive him to proceed flowly, and intract of time to lay his heavy hand upon the wicked, and to punish them, it is not for any doubt or fear that he should do amisse, our epent afterward if he chaltileth them sooner, but by wearing us from all beastly violence, and hashinesse in our punjihments, to teach us not immediately to flie upon those who have offended us, at what time as our blood is most up, and our choler, let on a light fire, VV hen fur fous ire in heart so leaps, and boiles, making halte as it were to latisfie some great hunger, or quench exceeding thirst, but (by imitating his clemency, and his manner of prolonging and making delay) to endeavor to execute justice in all order, at good leifure, and with most careful regard; taking to counsel Time, which tekdom or ne-Veris accompanied with repentance: for as Socrates was wont to fay: Leffe harm and danger there is, if a man meet with a troubled and muddy water, and intemperately take and drink thereof, then whiles his reason is confounded, corrupt, and full of choler and furious rage, to be set altogether upon revenge, and run hastily upon the punishment of another body, even one who is of his own kind and nature, before the same reason be settled again, clensed and fully purified. For it is not thing to as Thinglisted writeth: That verigeance the neerer it is unto the offence, the more it is in the own kind; but clean contrary, the farther offit is, and longer delayed, the better it apprehenderh and judgeth of that which is fit and decent. For according as Melanthius faith:

even so reason performethall just and honest actions, when it hath chased and removed out of the way, ite and wrath and therefore men are mollified, appealed, and become gentle by examples of men, when they hear it reported, how Plato, when he lifted up his flaff against his Page, shood to a good while, and forbare to firike; which he did (as he faid) for to represe his choler. And Architas, when he found some great negligence and dilorder at his farm-house in the country, in his house hold servants, perceiving himselfe moved and disquieted therewith, insomuch as he was exceeding angry, and ready to fly upon them proceeded to no act, but only turning away and going from them, faid this: It is happy for you, that I am thus augry with you. If then it be 10, that fuch memora-ble lipeches of ancient men, and worthy acts reported by them, are effectual to represe the bitterneffe and violence of choler ; much more probable it is, that we (feeing how God himselie, although hestandeth not infear of any person, nor repenteth of any thing that he doth, yet putteth off his chafticements, and layerh them up a long time) should be more wary and considerate in such things, and esteem that clemency, long sufferance and patience is a divine part of vertue that God doth thew and teach us, which by punishment doth chastife and correct a few, but by proceeding thereto flowly, doth infruct, admonish, and profit many. In the second place, let us consider, that judiciall and exemplary processe of judice practiced by men, intendeth and aimeth onely at counterchange of pain and grief, resting in this point: That he who hath done evil, might suffer likewise; proceeding no farther at all: and therefore braying and barking(as it were) like dogs at mens faults and trespasses, they follow upon them, and pursue after all actions by tract and sooting: but God (as it should seem, by all likelihood) when he setteth in hand in justice to correct a sinful and disea-(ast mount continued to the victions passions thereof, if haply they may be bent and wrought so, as they will incline and turn to repentance: in which respect he stayeth long before that he inshift any punishment upon delinquents, who are not altogether past grace incorrigible: for considering withall, and knowing as he doth, what portion of vertue, foules have drawn from him in their creation, at what time as they were produced first and came into the world, as also how powerful and forcible is the generofity thereof, and nothing weak and feeble in it selfe; but that it is clean contrary to their proper nature, to bring forth vices, which are engendered either by ill education, or elfeby the contagious haunt of lewd company; and how afterward, when they be well cured and medicined (as it falleth out in some persons) they soon return onto their own natural habitude, and become good again: by reason hereof, God doth not make haste topunish all men alike, but look what he knoweth to be incurable; that he quickly riddeth a way out of this life and cutteth it off, as a very hurtful member to others, but yet most harmful to it selfe, if it shouldevermore converse with wickednesse; but to such persons in whom (by all likelihood) vice is bred and ingendered, rather through ignorance of goodnesse, then upon any purpose and will to chuse nuightinesse he giveth time and respit for to change and amend : howbeit, it they persist still, and continue in their lewd ways, he payeth them home likewise in the end; and never leageth that they shall escape his hands one time or other, but suffer condigne punishment for their deserts. That this is true, consider what great alterations there happen in the life and behaviour of men, and how many have been reclaimed and turned from their lewdnesse; which is the reason that in Greek our behaviour and conversation is called partly Toomes, that is to say, A conversion; and in part ทั่ง@ithe one because mens manners besubject to change and mutation; the other for that they be ingendered by art or custome and the impression thereof being once taken, they remain firm and fure; that is the cause also (as I suppose) that our ancients in old time attributed unto King Cecropshis own nature and form, calling him Double inot for that (as some said) of a good clement, and vertuous Prince, he became a rigorous, fell and cruel syrant, like a dragon; but contrariwile;

because (having been at the first perverse, crooked and terrible) he proved afterward, a mild and genrle Lord : and if we make any doubt hereof in him, yet we may be fure (at least wife) that Gelon and Hieroin Sicily, yea, and Pififtratus the fon of Hippocrates, all usurpers (who atteined to their tyrannical dominion by violent and indirect means) used the same vertuously : and howsoever they came nnto their foveraign rule by unlawful and unjust means, yet they grew in time to be good governors loving and profitable to the common-weale, and likewile beloved and dearunto their subjects; for fome of them having brought in and established most excellent laws in the country, and caused their Citizens and Subjects to be industrious and painful in tilling the ground; made them to be civil, sober and discreet, whereas before, they were given to be ridiculous, as noted for their laughter and Der alleumente der Lavis to be true labourers also, and painful, who had been idle and playful. And as for Gelen, after he had most valiantly warred against the Carthaginians, and deseated them in a great battel: when they craved peace, would never grant it unto them, unlesse this might be comprised among the Articles and Capitulations: That they should no more sacrifice their Children unto Sathere, In the city also of Megalopolis there was a tyrant named Lydiades, who in the midft of his usurped dominion repented of his tyranny, and made a conscience thereof, detelling that wrongful oppression wherein he held his subjects, in such fort, as he restored his Citizens to their ancient Laws and Liberties, yea, and afterwards died manfully in the field, fighting against his enemies in the defence of his country, Now if any one had killed Miltiades at the fift, whiles he exercised tyranny in Cherfonefus; orifany other had called judicially into question Cimon, enditing him for keeping his own filter, and so being condemned of Incest, had caused him to be put to death; or disfranchised and banished Themistocles out of the City, for his loose wantonnesse and licentious insolency shewed publickly in the Common place, as Alcibiades afterwards was served and profiribed, for the like exceffe and riot committed in his youth:

Where had been then that famous victory Atchieved on the plains of Marathon? Where had been that renowned chivalry Performed neer the stream Eurymedon? Or at the mount, fair Artemision? Where Athens youth (as Poet Pindare Said) Offreedom first, the glorious ground-work laid?

For so it is, that great natures and high minds can bring forth no mean matters; nor the vehement force of action which is in them remain idle, so lively and subtile it is, but they wave to and fro continually, as if they were toffed by tempest and windupon the sea, until such time as they come to be setled in a constant, firm, and permanent habitude of manners: like as therefore, he who is altogether unskilful of husbandry and tillage, maketh no reckoning at all of a ground which he feeth full of rough bushes and thickers, beset with savage trees, and overspread with rank weeds; wherein alfo there be many wild beafts, many rivers, and by consequence, great flore of mud and mire: but contrariwise, an expert husband, and one who hath good judgement, and can discern the difference ofthings, knoweth these and all such signs, to betoken a fertile and plentiful soile; even so great wits and hauty spirits do produce and put forth at the first, many strange, absurd, and lewd pranks, which we not able to endure, think that the roughnesse and offensive pricks thereof, ought immediately to be cropt off and cutaway: but he who can judge better (confidering what proceedeth from thence good and generous) attendeth and expecteth with patience the age and featon, which is cooperative with vertue and reason, against which time, the strong nature in such, is for to bring forth and yeeld her proper and peculiar fruit. And thus much may suffice of this mat-

But to proceed forward: think you not that some of the Greeks have done well and wisely, to make a transcript of a Law in Egypt, which commandeth: that in case a woman who is attained and convicted of a Capital crime, for which in justice she ought to die, be with Child, she should be kept in prison until she were delivered? Yes verily, they all answered? Well then (quorh I) Set case there be some one who hath no children conceived in his womb to bring forth,, but breedeth somegood counsel in his head, hr conceiveth a great enterprise in his mind, which he is to bring to light, and effect in time, either by discovering an hidden mischiefe, or setting abroad an expedient and profitable counsel, or inventing some matter of necessary consequence: Think you not that he did better, who deferred the execution of such an ones punishment and stay until the utility that might grow by him were seen, than he who inconsiderately, and in all haste proceedeth to take revenge, and prevent the opportunity of such a benefit? Certes, for mine own part, I am fully of that mind: and even we no leffe, answered Parrectear. Wellthen (quoth I) it must needs be so for mark thus much: If Dionysius had been punished for his usurped rule, in the beginning of his tyranny; there should not one Grecian have remained inhabitant in Sieil, for the Carthaginians would have held the same and driven them all our: like as it must needs have befallent othe City Apollonia, to Anastorium, and the Chersonese or demi Island Leucadia, if Periander had suffered punishment at first, and not a long time after, as he did. And I suppose verily that the punishment and revenge of Cassander was put off and prolonged of purpose, until by that means the City of Thebes was fully re-edified and peopled again. And many of those mercenary souldiers and firangers, who feized and held this Temple wherein we are, during the time of the facred warre-passed under the conduct of Timoleon into Sicily, who after they had deseated in battel, the Cartha-ginians, and withall suppressed and abolished sundry tyrannies, they came to a wretchedend, wicked wretches as they were. For God in great wiledome and providence, other whiles maketh ule of iome wicked perions, as of butchers and common executioners, to torment and punish others, as wicked as they or worse, whom afterwards he destroyeth; and thus in mine opinion he dealeth with most part of tyrants. For like as the gall of the wild beast Hyana, and the rendles or rennet of the Sea. Calfe, as also other parts of venemous beafts and terpents, have one medicinable property or other, good to heale fundry maladies of men; even fo God feeing fome people to have need of bit and bridle, and to be challifed for their enormities, sendeth unto them iome inhumane tyrant, or a rigorous and inexorable Lord to whip and scourge them, and never giveth over to afflict and vex them, until he have purged and cleared them of that malady wherewith they were infected. Thus was Phalaris the tyrant a medicine to the Agrigentines: thus Marius was fent as a remedy to curethe Romans; as for the Sicyonians, even god himielie Apollo foretold them by Oracle; That their City had need of certain Officers to whippe and courge them, at what time as they would perforce take from the Cleoneans, a certaine young boy named Teletias, who was crowned in the Solemnity of the Pythian games, pretending that he was their Citizen, and born among them, whom they haled and pulled in such sort, as they dismembred him: But these Sicyonians met asterwards with Orthago as that tyrannized over them; and when hee was gone, they were plagued also with Myron and Clistenes, and their favorites, who held them in to short, that they kept them from all outriges, and stayed their intolent sollies: whereas the Cleoneans, who had not the like purgative medicine to cure them, were subverted, and through their middemeanor come to nothing. Mark well therefore that which Homer in one place

His fon he was, and in all kind of valour did surmount

His faster far, who miss (to fay a truth) of tase account.

And yet this son of Copress never performed (in all his life) any memorable act, be seeming a man of worth and honour: whereas the off-spring of Siffphus, the race of Antolyous, and the posterity of Phleggas flourished in glory, and all manner of vertue among great Kings and Princes. At Athens likewife, Pericles descended from an house excommunicate and accurled: And so at Rome Pompeius furnamed Magnus, that'is, the Great, had for hisfather one Strabo, a man whom the people of Rome so hated, that when he was dead, they threw his corps out of the biere wherein it was carried forth to burial, and trampled it under their feet. What absurdity then were it, it as the husband man never cutteth up, or flocketh the thorn or bush, before he hath gathered the tender sprouts and buds thereof: nor they of Libya burn the boughs of theplant Ledrom, until they have gotten the aromatical gum or liquor out of it called Ladanum; even to God never plucketh up by the root, the race of any noble and roial family (wicked and wretched though they be) before it hath yeelded some good and profitable fruit: for it had been far better and more expedient for the men of Phocis, that ten thouland Beefs, and as many Horses of Iphitus had died; that the Delphians likewise had lost much more Gold and Silver by far, then that either Ulysses or Afenlapins should not have been born; or others in like case, whose parents being wicked and vicious, were themselves honest and very profitable to the Common-wealth. Are we not then to think, that it werefar better to punish in due time and manner convenient, then to proceed unto revenge hastily and out of hand? like as that was of Callippus the Athenian, who making semblance of triendship unto Dion, stabbed him at once with his dagger, and was himselfe afterwards killed with the same, by his friends? as also that other of Mitius the Argive, who was murdered in a certaine commotion and civil broil: for it hapned to, that in a frequent affembly of the people, gathered together in the market place, for to behold a folemn shew, a statue of brasse fell upon the murderer of Mittus, and killed him outright. And you have heard (I am fure) O Patrocleus (have you not?) what beful unto Beffus the Peronian, and Ariston the Oction, two Colonels of mercenary and forraign souldiers? No verily (quoth he) but I would gladly know: This Ariston (quoth I) having stolen and carried away out of this Temple, certain jewels and costly furniture of Queen Eriphyle. which of long time had there been kept fafe, by the grant and permiffion of the tyrants who ruled this City, carried them as a present to his wife; but his son being on a time (upon some occasion) displeased and angry with his mother, set fire on the house, and burne it with all that was within it. As for Beffut. who had murdered his own father, he continued a good while not detected, until fuch time, as being one day at supper with certain of his friends that were strangers, with the head of his speare he pierced and cast down a swallows nest, and so killed the young birds within it: and when those that flood by, seemed (as good reason there was) to say unto him: How cometh this to passe, good six? and what aile you, that you have committed so lewed and horrible an act? Why (quoth he again) do these birds cry aloud and bear false witnesse against me, testifying that I have murdered mine own Father? he had no sooner let fall this word, but those who were present took hold thereof, and wondering much thereat, went directly to the King, and gave information of him; who made fo diligent inquifition, that the thing upon examination was discovered, and Beffas (for his part)punished accordingly for a Parricide. Thus much (I say) have we related, that it may be held as a confessed truth and supposition, that wicked men other whiles have some delay of their punishment: as for the relt, you are to think that you ought to hearken unto Heffodus the Poet, who faith not as Plato did, that the punishment of fin doth follow fin hard at the heeles, but is of the same time and age, as born and bred in one place with it, and springing out of the very same root and stock: for these be his words in one place:

Bad counsel who deviseth first, Unto him (elfe shall find it worft.

And in another:

Who doth for others mischiefe frame, To his own heart contrives the same.

The venemous flies Cantharides are faid to contain in themselves a certain remedy, made and compounded by a contrariety or antipathy in nature, which ferveth for their own counter-poison; but wickednesse ingendering within it selse (I wot not what) displeasure and punishment, not aftera finful act is committed, but even at the very inftant of committing, it beginneth to suffer the pain due to the offence: neither is there a malefactor, but when he feeth others like himfelfe punished in their bodies, bear forth with his own crosse; whereas mischievous wickednesse trameth of her felie, the engines of her own torment, as being a wonderful artifan of a milerable life, which (together with shame and reproach) hath in it lamentable calamities, many terrible frights, fearful perturbations and passions of the spirit, remorie of conscience, desperate repentance, and continuall troubles and unquietnesse. But some men there be, who for all the world resemble little children, that beholding many times in the Theatre, lewd and naughty perions arrayed in cloath of gold, rich mantles, and robes of purple, adorned also with Crowns upon their heads, when they either dance orplay their parts upon the stage, have them in great admiration, as reputing them right happy, until inch time as they fee them how they be either pricked and pierced with goads, or fending flames of fire out of those gorgious, costly and sumptuous vestments. For to say a truth, many wicked perions, who dwell in stately houses, are descended from noble parentage, sit in high places of authority, bear great dignities and glorious titles, are not known (for the most part) what plagues and punishments they sustain, before they be seen to have their throats cut, or their necks broken, by being cast down headlong from on high; which a man is not to term punishments simply, but rather the final end and accomplishment thereof. For like as Herodicus of Selymbria, being fallen into an incurable phthinck or confumption by the ulcer of the lungs, was the first man (as Plato sixth) who in the cure of the said disease, joyned with other Physick, bodily exercise, and in so doing, drew out and prolonged death, both to himselfe and all others who were likewise infected with that malady; even so may we say, that wicked persons (as many as seem to have escaped a present plague, and the stroak of punishment out of hand) suffer in truth, the pain due for their sinful acts, not in the end only and a great time after, but sustain the same a longer time: so that the vengeance taken for their finful life is nothing flower, but much more produced and drawn out to the length; neither be they punished at the last in their old age, but they wax old rather in punishment, which they have endured all their life. Now when Ispeak of long time, I mean it in regard of our selves: for in respect of the gods, the whole race of mans life (how long soever it be thought) is a matter of nothing, or no more then the very moment and point of the instant. For say, that a malesactor should suffer the space of thirty yeares for some hainous sact that he hath committed, it is all one, as if a man should firetch him upon the rack, or hang him upon a gibbet in the evening toward night, and not in the morning betimes; especially, seeing that such a one (all the while that he liveth) remaineth close and salt shut up (asit were) in a strong prison or cage, out of which he hath no means to make an escape and get away. Now if in the mean while they make many seasts, mannage sundry matters, and enterprize divers things; if they give presents and largestes abroad; and say they give themselves to their disports and pleasures; it is even as much, and all one, as when malefactors (during the time they be in prison) should play at dice or cockall game, having continually over head the rope hanging, which must strangle them: for otherwise, we might as well ay, that prisoners condemued to die, suffer no punishment all the whiles they lie in hard and cold irons, noruntil the executioner come and strike the head from the shoulders; or that he who by sentence of the Judges hath drunk the deadly potion of hemlock, is not punished, because hee walketh fill, and goeth up and down alive, waiting until his legs become heavy, before the general cold and congelation surprise him, and extinguish both sense and vital spirits, in afe it were fo, that we esteem and call by the name of punishment, nothing but the last point and extremity thereof: letting passe and making no reckoning at all of the passions, sears, painful sings, expectance of death, pricks and forrows of a penitent confcience, wherewith every wice ad person is troubled and tormented: for this were as much as to say, that the fish which hath wallowed down the hook, is not caught, until we see the said fish cut in pieces, or broiled, roaed and sodden by the Cook. Certes, every naughty person is presently become prisoner unto justice, so soon as he hath once committed a finful act, and swallowed the hook together with the bait of sweetnesse and pleasure, which he taketh in lewdnesse and wrongful doing; but when the remorfe of conscience imprinted in him, doth prick, he feeleth the very torments of hell, and can-

But as in fea the Tuny fish doth swiftly crosse the waves, And travers still while tempest lasts, so he with anguish raves. For this audacious rashnesse and violent insolence (proper unto vice) is very puissant, forward, and rago.

ready at hand, to the effecting and execution of finful acts; but afterwards, when the paffion (like unto a wind) is layed, and begins to faile, it becometh weak, base, and feeble, subject to an infinite number of fears and superflitions; in such fort, as that Stefichors the Poet seemeth to have devised the dream of queen Clytemnestra, very conformable to the truth, and answerable to our dayly experience, when he bringeth her in, speaking in this manner:

Methoughts I saw a dragon come apace, Whose * crest alost on head * with blood was stein'd; With that anonthere did appear in place Plithenides the King, who that time reign'd.

For the visions by night in dreams, the fantastical apparitions in the day time, the answers of Oracles, the prodigious figns from heaven, and in one word, whatloever men think to be done immediately by the will and finger of God, are wont to firike great troubles and horrors into fuch persons fo affected, and whole confciences are burdened with the guilt and privity of fin. Thus the report goeth of Apollodor 11, that he dreamed upon a time, how he saw himselfe first flayed by the Scythia ans, then cut as small as sless to the pot, and so boiled; he thought also that his heart spake softly from our of the Cauldron, and uttered these words : I am the cause of all these thy evils : again, hee imagined in his fleep, that his own daughters, all burning on a light flaming fire, ran round about him in a Circle. Semblably Hipparcus the fon of Pifistratus, a little before his death, dreamed that Venus out of certain vial sprinkled blood upon his face. The familiar friends likewise of King Pedomem, fiftnamed Cercunos, that is to fay, Lightning, thought verily in a dream that they faw Seleu-cus accuse and endite him judicially before wild Wolves, and greedy Geirs that were his Judges, where he dealt and distributed a great quantity of flesh among his enemies. Paisfunias also at Bizantium, sent for Cleonice, a Virgin and Gentlewoman free born, of a worshipful house; intending perforce to lie with her all night, and abuse her body; but being halfe asseep when the came to his bed, he awakned in a fright, and inspecting that some enemies were about to surprize him killed her outright; whereupon ever after he dreamt ordinarily, that he faw her, and heard her pronounce this To judgement feat, approach thou mer Ifig, ipeech:

Wrong dealing is to men most huriful ar. Now when this vision as it should seem ceased not to appear unto him night by night; he embarked and failed into Heraelca, to a place where the spirits and ghosts of those that are departed be raised and called up, where after he had offered certain propitiatory facrifices, and poured forth funeral effusions, which they use to call upon the Tombs of the dead; he wrought so effectually that the ghost of Cleonice appeared; and then she said unto him, that so soon as he was arrived at Lacedamon, liee should have repose and end of all his troubles : and to in very truth, no sooner was he thithercome. but he ended his life and died. If therefore the foul had no fense after it is departed ont of the body, but cometh to nothing; and that death were the final end and expiration as well of thankful recompenses, as of painful punishments, a man might say of wicked persons who are quickly punished, and die soon after that they have committed any mildeeds; that God dealeth very gently and mildly with them: For if continuance of time, and long life bringeth to wicked persons no other harm; yet a man may at least wife fay thus much of them, that having known by proof, and found by experience, that injuffice is an untruitful, barren, and thankleffe thing, bringing forth no good thing at all, nor ought that delerveth to be effeemed after many travels and much pains taken with it; yet the very feeling and remorfe of confcience for their fins, disquieteth and troubleth the mind, and turneth it upfide down. Thus we read of King Lyfimachus, that being forced through extream thirst. he delivered his own person, and his whole army into the hands of the Getes; and when being their prifoner, he had drunk and quenched his thirst, he said thus: O what a mitery is this, and wretched case of mine, that for so short and transitory a pleasure, I have deprived my selfe of so great a Kingdom, and all my royal estate. True it is, that of all things it is an exceeding hard matter to relist the necessity of a natural passion; but when as a man for coverousnesse of money, or defire of glory, authority, and credit among his country-men and fellow-Citizens, or for fleshly pleatures, falleth to commit a foul, wicked, and execrable fact, and then afterwards in time, when as the ardent thirst and furious heat of his passion is past, seeing that there abide and continue with him, the filthy, shameful, and perilous peturbations only of injustice and simulnesse; but nothing at all that is profitable, necessary, or delightsome; is it not very likely and probable, that he shall estsoones, and oftentimes recal into this thought, and confideration? how being seduced and carried away by the means of vain glory, or dishonest pleasures, (things base, vile, and litheral) he hash perverted and overthrown the most beautiful and excellent gifts that men have, to wit, right, equity, justice, and piety; and in stead thereof, hath siled and polluted his life with shame, trouble, and danger? For like as Simonides was wont to say in mirth: That he found one coster of silver and money alwayes; full; but that other of favours, thanks, and benefits, evermore empty; even so wicked men, when they come to examine and peruse aright the vice that is in themselves, they find it presently (for one pleasure which is accompanied with a little vain and gloting delight) void altogether and destitute of hope; but fully replenished with fears, cares, anxieties, the unpleasant remembrance of misdemeanors past inspicion of suture events, and distrust for the present: much after the manner as wee doe hear Lady Ino in the Theaters, repenting of those foul facts which she had committed, and speaking these words upon the stage:

How should I now, my friends, and Ladies deer Begin to keep the honfe of Athamas Since that all whiles that I have lived here, Naught hath been done by me that decent was? Or thus: How may I keep, O Ladies deer alas,

The house again of my Lord Athamas, As who therein had not committed ought Of those level parts which I have done and wrought.

For femblably it is meet that the mind and foul of every finful and wicked person should ruminate and discourse of this point in it selfe after this manner: After what fort should I forget and put out of remembrance the unjust and lewd parts which I have committed? how should I cast off the remorie of conscience from me? and from henceforth begin to turn over a new lease, and lead another life: for furely with those in whom wickednesse beareth sway, and is predominant, there is nothing affured, nothing firm and constant nothing fincere and found, unlesse haply we will say and maintain; that wicked persons and unjust were some Sages and wise Philosophers. But we are to think, that where avarice reigneth and excessive con upiscence, and love of pleasure, or where extream envy dwelleth, accompanied with spight and malice; there if you mark and look well about, you shall find superstitionlying hidden among, slothand unwillingnesse to labour, fear of death, lightnesse and quick mutability in changing of mind and affection, together with vain-glory proceeding of arrogancie; those who blame them, they fear, such as praise them, they dread and suspect; as knowing well how they are injured and wronged by their decentful temblance, and yet be the greatest enemies of the wicked, for that they commend so readily, and with affection, those whom they suppose, and take to be honest: for in vice and sin (like as in bad iron) the hardnesse is but weak and rotten, and the stiffnesse also brittle and easie to be broken: and therefore wicked men (learning in process oftime, better to know themselves what they are) after they come once to the full consideration thereof, are displeased, and discontented, they have themselves, and detest their own lewd life: for it is not likely that it a naughty person otherwise (though not in the highest degree, who hath regard to deliver again a pawn or price of money left in his hands to keep; who is ready to be surrety for his familiar friend, and upona bravery and glorious mind, hath given largefles, and is pred to maintain and defend his country, yea, and to augment and advance the good estate thereof) soon repent and immediately be grieved for that which he hath done, by reason that his mind is so mutable, or his will fo apt to be feduced by an opinion or conceit of his: considering that even some of those who have had the honor to be received by the whole body of the people in open theater, with great applause and clapping of hands, incontinently fall to figh to themselves, and groat again, so foon as avarice returneth fecretly, in place of glorious ambition: those that kill and sacrifice men to ulurp and fet up their tyrannies, or to maintain and compasse some conspiracies, as Apollodorus did; circumvent and defraud their friends of their goods and moneys, which was the practice of Glancus the fon of Epicydes, should never repent their misdeeds, norgrow into a detestation of themselves, nor yet be displeased with that they have done: For mine own part, I am of this opinion (if it be lawful fo tofay) That all those who commit such impieties and misdemeanors, have no need either of God or man to punish them; for their own life only being so corrupt and wholly depraved and troubled with all kind of wickednesse, is sufficient to plague and torment them to the full: But confider (quoth I) whether this discourse feem not already to proceed further, and be drawn out longer then the time will permit. Then Timonaniwered: It may well so be, it peradventure weregard the length and prolivity of that which followeth and remaineth to be discussed: as for my self, if am now ready to rise as it were out of an ambush, and to come as a fresh and new Champion with my last doubt and question, forasmuch as me thinks, we have debated enough already upon the former: for this would I have you to think, that although we are filent and fay nothing, yet we complain as Euripides did, who boldly challenged and reproached the gods for that

The parents sin, and their iniquity

The turn on children and posserit;
For say that themselves, who have committed a sault, were punished, then is there no more need to chastile others, who have not offended, considering it were no reason at allro punish twice for one fault the delinquents themselves: or be it so, that through negligence they having omitted the punishment of wicked persons and offenders, they would long after make them to pay for it who are innocent; furely they do not well, by this injustice to make amends for the said negligence. Like as as it is reported of Afope, who in times past came hither to this City, being fent from King Crasus with a great sum of Gold, for to sacrifice unto god Apollo in magnificent wise, yea, and to distribute among all the Citizens of Delphos, four pounds a piece: but it fortuned lo, that he fell out with the habitants of the City upon some occasion, and was exceeding angry with them, infomuch as het introduced. performed indeed the factifice accordingly, but the reft of the money which he should have dealt among the people, he sent back again to the City of Sardio, as if the Delphians had not been worthy to enjoy the Kings liberality; whereupon they taking great indignation, laid faciledge unto his charge, for deteining (in Inch fort) that facted money i and in truth-after they had condemned him thereof, they pitched him down headlong from that high rock they call Hyampia, for which act of theirs, God Apollo was so highly displeased, that he sent upon their land sterility and barrenness, befides many and fundry strange and unknown diseases among them, so as they were constrained in the end, to go about in all the publick leafts and general assemblies of the Greeks, of purpose, to make proclamation by found of trumpet: That wholoever he was (kiniman or friend of Afoge) that would require fatisfaction for his death, should come forth, and exact what penalty he would defire: and thus they ceased not continually to call upon them? until at length, and namely, in the third generation alter, there presented himselfeacertain Samian, named lamon, who was nothing at ail of kinto Afope, but onely one of their posterity, who at the first had bought him for a flat ein open market, within the life of Samos and the Delphians having in tome measure made fatisfaction and recompense unto him, were immediately delivered from their calamities: and it is said, that from that time forward, the execution of facrilegious persons, was translated from the foresaid rock Hyampia, unto the cliff of Nauplia. And verily, even those, who of all others most admire Alexander the Great, and celebrate his memorial, of which number we also confesse our selves to be, can in no wife approve that which he did unto the Branchides, when he razed their City to the very ground, and put all the inhabitants thereof to the fword, without respect either of age or of fex, for ground, and the first the first the state of they demanded of him the occasion why he forraged their life, made them this answer: Because (quoth he) your fore-fathers in times part, received and entertained Wyfer. Semblably, when the Islanders of Ithecamade complaint unto him of his fouldiers, for driving away their sheep: Why? (quoth he) your King, when he came one time into our Island, not only took away our sheep, but also put out the eye even of our sherherd: Think you not then that Apollo dealt more absurdly & unjustly then all these, indestroying the Pheneotes at this day, in stopping up the mouth of that bottomlesse pit that was wont to receive and soak up all the waters which now doe overslow their whole country; because that a thousand yeers ago (by report) Hercules having taken away from the Delphians that facred trefeet, from which the Oracles were delivered, brought the fame to the City Pheneum? And as for the Sybarites, he answered them directly: That their miseries should then ceale, when they had appealed the ire of Juno Lencadia, by three fundry mortalities. Certes, long ago it is not, fince that the Locrians defisted and gave over fending every year their daughters, virginst unto Troy,

Who there went bare-foot, and did feroe all day from morn to night, In habit of poor wretched flaves, in no apparelaight; No coife, no caule, nor honest vail, were they allow do wear In decent wise, for woman-bood, though aged now they were Resembling such as wever rest; but Pallas Temple sweep, And sacred Altar dayly cleanse, where they do alway keep.

and all for the lascivious wantonnesse and incontinence of Ajax. How can this be either just or reasonable, considering that we blame the very Thracians, for that (as the report goes) they usestill (even at this day) to beat their wives in revenge of Orpheus death? Neither do we commend the barbarous people, inhabiting along the river Po, who (as it is faid) do yet mourn and wear blacksfor Phaeton his fall, Yet (in my conceit) it is a thing rather fortish and ridiculous, that whereasthe men who lived in Phaeton his time, made no regard of his ruine: those that came five (yea, and ten) ages after his woful calamity, should begin to change their raiment for his sake, and bewail his death for surely, herein there is nothing at all to be noted, but meet folly : no harm, no danger or abstrdity (otherwise) doth it contain. But what reason is it, that the wrath and judgment of the gods , hidden (upon a judden) at the very time of some hainous fact committed (as the property is of some Rivers) should break out, and shew it selfe afterwards, upon others, yea, and end with some extream calamities? He had no sooner paused a while, and stayed the current of his speech : but I doubting whereto his words would tend, and fearing left he should proceed to utter more absurdities and greater follies, presently made this reply upon him: And think you fir, indeed, that all is true that you have faid? What if all (quoth he) be not true, but some part thereof only, think you not yet, that the same difficulty in the question still remaineth ? Even so peradventure (quoth I) it tareth with those who are in an extream burning feaver, who whether they have more or lesse cloathes upon them, feel evermore within them the same excessive heat of the ague; yet for to comfort and refresh them a little, and to give them some ease, it is thought good to diminish their cloaths, and take off some of them. But if you are not so disposed, let it alone, you may do your pleasure; howbeit, this one thing I will say unto you, that the most part of these examples resemble fables, and fictions, devised for pleasure: Call to mind therefore and remembrance, the feast celebrated of late in their honour, who sometime received the gods into their howes, and gave them entertainments also that beautiful and honorable portion set by apart, which by the voice of an herald was published exprefly to be from the posterity descended from Pindarus, and reccord with your selfe how honorable and pleasant arthing this seemeth unto you. And who is there (quoth he) that would not take pleasure to see this preeminence and preference of honour so naturally so plaine, and ancient, after the manner of old Greeks; unless the best such an one, as (according to the same Pindarus)

Whose heart all black of mettall forg'd iwis And by cola flame, made fliffe and hardened is. I omit (quothI) to speake of the solemn commendation published in Sparta, which ensued ordinarily after the Lesbian fong, or canticle in the honour & memoriall of that ancient Terpander: for it seemeth, that there is the same reason of them both: But you who are of therace of Ophelies: and think your felfe worthy to be preferted before all others, not Baorians only, but Phocaans also; and that in regard of your flock-father Da phanes, have affilled and seconded me, when I maintained before the Lycormians & Satilaians (who claimed the priviledge and honour of wearing coroners due by our lawes and statutes unto the progeny of Hercules) That such dignities and prerogatives ought inviolably to be preserved and kept for those indeed who destend in right line from Hercules, in regard of his beneficiall demerits, which in time past he heaped upon the Greeks, and yet during his life, was not thought worthy of reward and recompence: You have (quoth he) revived the memory of a most pleasant question to be debated, and the same marvelous well beleeming the profession of Philosophy: But I pray you my very good friend (quoth I unto him,) forbeare this vehement and accusatory humor of yours, and be not angry, if happily you see that some, because they be borne of leud and wicked parents, are punished; or else do not rejoyce so much, nor be ready to praise, in case you see nobility also of birth to be so highly honored: for it we stand upon this point, and dare avow, that recompence of vertue ought by right and reason to continue in the line and posterity; we are by good consequence to make this account, that punishment likewise should not stay and cease together with misdeeds committed, but reciprocally fall upon thole that are descended of misdoers and malefactors: for he who willingly seeth the progeny of Cimon, honoured at Athens and contrariwife is offended and displeased in his heart, to see the race of Lachares of Ariston banished and driven out of his City; (he I say) seemeth to be too soft, tender, and passing esseminate, or rather to speake more properly, over-contentious and quarrelsome, even against the gods, complaining and mourning of the one side; if the children, and children children of an impious and wicked person to prosper in the world: and contrariwlle is no less given to blame and finde fault, if he do fee the posterity of wicked and ungratiousmen to be held under, plagued, or altogether destroyed from the face of the earth; accuning the gods if the children of a naughty man be afflicted even as much as if they had honelt perions to their parents: But as for their exalons alledged, make you this reckoning, that they be bulwarks and ramparts for you, opposed against such bitter & sharp accusers as these be. But now taking in hand againe the end(as it were) of a clew of thread, or a bottome of yarne, to direct us as in a dark place, and where therebe many cranks, turnings and windings to & fro (I meane the matter of Gods secret judgements) let us conduct and guide our touls gently and warily, according to that which is most likely and probable, considering that even of those things which we daily manage, and do our ielvs, we are not able to set down an undoubted certainty: as for example, who can yield a found reason, wherefore we cause and bid the children of those parents who died either of the ptysick & consumption of the lungs; or of the droply, to fit with their feet drenched in water, until the dead corps be fully burned in the funeral fire? For an opinion there is that by this meanes the maladies shal not passunto them as hereditary, nor take hold of their bodies; as also, what the cause should be, that it ago at hold in her mouth the herb called Eryngites, that is to fay, Sea-holly, the whol flocke will fland fill, untill fuch time as the goat-herd come and take the laid herb out of her mouth; other hidden properties therebe, which by secret influences & passages from one to another, work strange effects, and incredible as well (pedily, as in longer track of time: and in very truth, we wonder more at the intermition and flay of time between, then we do of the diffance of place, and yet there is greater ocarno to marvel thereat: as namely, that a peftilent malady which began in Aethiopia, should reigne in the Citty of Athens, and fill every freet and corner thereof, in such sort, as Periode died, and Thucydides was sick thereof; than that when the Phoca and Sybarits had commitred some hainous fins, the punishment therefore should fall upon their children, and go through their posterity? For surely these powers and hidden properties have certain relations and correspondences from the last to the first; the cause thereof, although it be unknown to us, yet it ceaseth not secretly to bring forth her proper effects. But there seemeth to be very apparent reason of justice, that publick vengeance from above should fall upon Cities many a year after; for that a City is one entire thing, and a continued body, as it were, like unto a living creature, which goeth not befide or out it selfe for any mutations of ages, nor in tract or continuance of time, changing first into one, and then into another by succession, but is alwayes uniforme and like it felfe, receiving evermore, and taking upon it, all the thanke for well doing, or the blame for mil-deeds, of whatfoever it doth or hath done in common, so long as the fociety that linketh and holdethit together maintaineth her unity: for tomake many, yea, and innumerable Cities of one, by dividing it according to space of time, were as much as to go about to make of one man many, because he is now become old, who before was a young youth, and in times pastalso a very stripling or springall; or else to speak more properly, this resembleth the devises of Epicharmus, whereupon was invented that manner of Sophisters arguing, which they call the Croissant argument; for thus they reason: He that long fince borrowed or took up mony, now oweth it not, because he is no more himselie, but become another: and he that yesterday was invited to a feast, commeth this day as an unbidden gueft, confidering that he is now another man. And verily, divers ages make greater difference in each one of us, then they do commonly in Cities and States : for he that had feen the City of Athens thirty years agoe, and came to visit it at this day, would know it to be altogether the very same that then it was; insomuch as the manners, customs, motions, games, paftimes, ferious affaires, favours of the people, their pleasures, displeasures and anger at this present, resemble wholy those in ancient time: whereas if a man be any long time out of sight, hardly his very familiar friend shall be able to know him, his countenance will be somuch changed; and as touching his manners and behaviour, which alter and change so soone upon every occasion, by reason of all forts of labour, travell, accidents and lawes, there is such variety and so great alteration, that even he who is ordinarily acquainted and conversant with him, would marvell to see the strangenesseand novelty thereof; and yet the man is held and reputed still the same, from his nativity unto his dying day: and in like cate, a City remaineth alwayes one and the selfe same; in which respect we deem it great reason, that it should participate aswell the blame and reproch of ancestours, asenjoy their glory and puissance, unlesse we make no care to cast all things in the river of Heraclitus. into which (by report) no one thing entreth twile, for that it hath a property to alter all things and changetheir nature. Now if it be so, that a City is an united and continued thing in it selfe, we are to think no lefte of a race and progeny, which dependeth upon one and the same stock, producing and bringing forth a certain power and communication of qualities, and the same doth reach and extend to all those who descend from it : neither is the thing engendred of the same nature that a piece of worke is, wrought by art, which incontinently is feparate from the workman, for that it is made by him, and not of him; whereas contrariwife, that which is naturally engendered, is formed of the very substance of that which ingendered it, in such fort as it doth carry about it some part thereof, which by good right deserveth either to be punished or to be honoured even in it selle. And were it not, that I might be thought to jest and speak in game and not in good earnest, I would aver and pronounce assuredly, that the Athenians offered more wrong and abuse unto the braien statue of Caffander, which they caused to be defaced and melted; and likewise the dead corps of Dionysius suffered more injury at the hands of the Syracusians, which after his death they caused to be caried out of their confines, then if they had proceeded in rigor of juffice against their of spring and posterity; for the laid image of Cassander did not participate one whit of his nature; and the foule of Dionysius was departed a good while before out of his body: whereas Nifeus, Apollocus. tes, Antipater, Philip and all luch other, descended from vicious and wicked parents, reteined still the chief and principall part which is in them inbred, and remaineth not quiet, idle and doing no-thing, but fuch as whereby they live and are nourished, whereby they negociate, reason and discourse neither ought it to feem strange and incredible, that being of their issue, they should likewise retaine their qualities and inclinations. In some, I say and affirme, that like as in Physick whatsoever is holfome and profitable, the same is also just; and worthy were he to be laughed at and mocked, that calleth him unjust, who for the Sciatica or disease of the huckle-bone, would cauterize the thumbe; or when theliver is impostumate, scarifie the belly; and if kine or oxen be tender and fost in clees, anoint the extremities and tips of their hornes; even so he deserveth to be scorned and reproved as a man of a shallow conceit, who in chastisment of vice, esteemeth any other thing just, than that which may cure and heale the same; or who is offended and angry if the medicine be applied, or a course of Physick used into some parts for curing others; as they do who open a veine for to heale the inflammation of the eyes fuch an one (I fay) seemeth to see and perceive no surther then his owne outward senses lead him, and remembreth not well, that a schoolmaster often times in whipping one of his schollers, keepeth all the rest in awe and good order, and a great captaine and generall of the field, in putting to death for exemplary justice, one souldier in every ten, reformeth all besides, and reduceth them to their duty; and even so there happen not only to one part by another, but allo to one foul by another, certaine dispositions, aswell to worse and impairing, as to better and amendment, yea, and much more than to one body by the meanes of another; for that there to wit, in a body, there must (by all likelyhood) be one impression and the same alteration; but here, the soul which oftentimes is led and carried away by imagination, either to be confident, or distrussfull and timorous, fareth better or worse accordingly. And as I was going forward to speake, Olympiacus interrupting my speech: By these words of yours (quoth he)you feem to fet down as a supposall, a subject matter of great consequence and discourse, to wit, the immortality of the foul, as if it remained still after the separation from the body: Yea mary (quoth he) and even this have I inferred by that which you do now grant, or rather have granted therefore; for our discourse hath been from the begining prosecuted to this presupposed point: That God dealeth and distributes to every of us according as we have deserved. And how (quroh he) doth this follow necessarily, that in case God doth behold all human affaires, and dispose of every particular thing here upon earth, the fouls should become either immortal and incorruptible, or else continue in their entire estate long after death? O good sir(quoth I be content, is God think you) so base minded, or imployed in so smal and triffing matters, and having so little to do, that (when we have no divine thing in us, nor ought that in any fort resembeth him, or is firm and durable, but that continually decay, fade and perish like unto leaves of trees (as Homer faith), and that in a small time) he should all on a sudden make to great account of us (like to those women, who cherish and keep their gardens (as they lay) of Adomi within brittle pots and panns of sarrhy 38 to make our souls, for one dayto shourth and looke green within our stelly body, which is not capable of any strong root of life, and then within a while after, suffer them to be excinguished and to dy upon the least occasion in the world? But if you please, let us, passe other gods, and consider wee a little this our God only, him I meane, who is honoured and advocated in this place, nangely, whether he (knowing that the souls of the dead age presently exhaled and vanished away to spothing, like unto a vapour or imoak, breating forthof our bodies) doth order in incoprimently obtained by the offered, and propitiatory sarringes, to be made for the departed? and whether he definit no abuse and deceive those that beleeve accordingly? For I assure you jor any place, I will not be dead in the the foul dieth, but remainenth stillaster death, unlesse song one or other (as by saport Hercutes did in old time) come fift and take away the prophenical stool or revigato Prophing and destroy the oracle for ever regarding any more, anivers, as it shard delivered sympator these our dayes, inch as by reportwas given in old time to Corar the Naziapin these words.

Impery great it is for 10 believes.

That foults do the, and not for ever first.

Then Patrocles: What prophetic (quoth he) was this? and who was this Corner in for the patrocles. thing it felie, and and that very name, be both of them frange and unknown to me a That cannot be (quoth I) but think better of the matter; for it is long of me who have used this furname; in first of this proper name; for I meane him who flew Archifectus in battel, whose name indeed was Callondar, but men furnamed him Corax: This man was at the first rejected by the prophets & Pythia, 48 2 murderer who had killed a worthy perionage confectated & devoted unto the Mules, but atterwards having used certaine prayers and requests, together with divers allegations of excuse, precending to justific his fact, in the end he was enjoyated by the oracle, to go to the house and habitation of Jesus. and there by certain expiatory factifices & oblations, to appeale and pacific the gholt of Aschil tolars now this house of Tettix was the cape of promontory Tanarus; for it is said, Tettix the Candian, arriving with his fleet in time past, at the head of Tanarus, there built a City, and inhabited it, near unto the plac ewhere the manner was to conjure Spirits, and raife the ghosts of those that were departed: The iemblable answer being made to those of Sparta, namely, that they should, make meanes to pacifie the foul of Paufanias, they fent as far as into Italy for factificers exorcides, who had the skill to conjure Spirits, and they with their facrifices chaled his ghost out of the Temple: This is one reason therefore (quoth I) that doth confirme and prove, that both the world is governed by the providence of God, and allo, that the foules of men do continue after death: neither is it poffible that we should admit the one, and deny the other if it be so then that the soule of man hath a substance and being after death: it is more probable and soundeth to greater reason, that it should then either tall of paine or punishment, or enjoy honour or reward: for during hereupon earth, it is in continual combat in manner of a champion; but after all combats performed and finished, then the receiveth according to her deferts. Now as touching those honours and punishments which it receiveth in that other world, being alone by her selfe, and separate from the body, the same concerne and touch us nothing at all, who remaine alive; for either we know them not, or give no beliefe thereto; butfuch as be either conferred or inflicted upon their children and posterity, for that they be apparent and evident to the world, those doscontaine and curb wicked men, that they do not execute their malicious designes: And considering that there is no punishment more agnominious, or that commeth neerer the quick, and toucheth the heart more, then for menaolee their ofspring, or those that depend upon them, afficted for their sake and punished for their saults; and that the foul of a wicked person, enemyto God and to all good lawes, seeth after his death, not his Images and Statues, or any enfignes of honour overthrown, but his owne children, his friends and kinsfolk ruinate, undone and perfecuted with great miferies and tribulations, fuffering grievous punishment for it, there is no man I think, but would chuse rather to forgoall the honours of 3* piter, if he might have them thento become againe either unjust or intemperate and lascivious. And for the better testimony and truth thereof, I could relate unto you a narration which was delivered unto me not long fince but that I am afraid you will take it for a fabulous tale, devised to make port: In regard whereof I holdit better to alledge unto you nothing but substantial reasons and arguments grounded upon verygood likelihood and probability. Not so (quoth Olimpiasus) in any case; but rehearseuntous the narration which you speake of And when others also requested the fame at my hands: Suffer me yet first (quoth I) to fet abroad those reasons which carry some good shew of truth, and then afterwards if you think well of it I will recite the fable also if so be it is a fable: As for Bion, when he faith, that God in punishing the children of wicked men and sinners for their fathers, is much more ridiculous than the Physitian, who for the malady of father or grandfire goeth about to minister medicine unto the children or nephew; surely this companion faulteth therein that things be partly semblable, and in part divers and unlike; for if one be cured of a dilease by medicinable meanes, this doth not by and by heal the malady or disposition of another: For never was there man yet being fick of a leaver, or troubled with bleered and impostumate eyes became cured by feeing an oyntment applied, or a falve laid unto another. But contrarywife, the punishment or execution of juffice upon malefactors, is for this cause done publikely before all the world, that juffice being ministred with reason and discretion. Should effect thus much, namely, to keep in, and retaine some by the chastisement and correction of others: But that point wherein the forelaid comparison of Bion answereth to our matter in queltion, himselfe never understood; for many times it falleth out, that a man being fallen fick of a dangerous difeate, howbeit not uncurable, yet through his inemperance and diforder afterwards, fuffereth his body to grow into greater weakness and decay, untill at last he dyeth: whereupon his fon after him being not actually surprised with the same disease, but onely disposed thereto, a learned physician, some trusty friend, or anexpert annointer, and mafter of exercises, perceiving so much, or rather indeed a kind friend pert announcer; and matter of corrections, when a carefulleye over him, taketh him in hand, bringeth him to an exquisite manner of austere diet, cutteth off all superfluity of viands, dainty cates, & banketting diffies, debarreth him of unfeafonable drinkings, and the company of women purgeth him continually with foveraigne medicines, keepeth his body down by ordinary labour and execrife & fo doth diffipate and dispatch the first beginning and small inlination to a dangerous disease, in not permitting it to have head and to grow forward to any greatness: And is not this an usual practise among us to admonish those who are borne of six kly and diseased parents, to take good heed unto themfelves, and not to neglect their indisposition, but betimes and even at the very first to endevor for to remove and rid away the root of such inbred maladies, which they bring with them into the world? for fure it is an easie matter to expell and drive out, yea, and to conquer and overcome the fame, by prevention in due time: Yes verily answered they all. Well then (quoth I) we commit no absurdity, nor do any ridiculous thing, but that which is right, necessary and profitable, when we ordeine and prescribe for the children of those who are subject to the falling sickness, to madnesse, phrenesse and the gout, execrises of the body, diets, regiments of lite, and medicines appropriate for those maladies, not when they are sick thereof, but by way of precaution, to prevent that they should not fall into them: for the body ingendered of a corrupt and dileased body, nejther needeth nor deferveth any punishment, but physick rather by good medicines and carefull at-tendance; which diligence and heedfull regard, if any one upon wantonnesse nicety and delicacydo all chastifement, because it deprive th a man of pleasures and delights, or happily inferreth some prick of dolour and paine let him go as he is, we pais not for him. Now if it be expedient to cure and medicine carefully one body issued and descended from another that is corrupt, is it meet and convenient to let go the resemblance of an hereditary the, which beginneth to bud and spront in a young man, to say and suffer it (I say) to grow on still, burgen and spread into all affections, untill is appear in the view of the whole world? for as Pindarm saith:

The foolish heart doth bring forth from within

Her hidden fruit, corrupt and full of fin.

And think you not that in this point God is wifer than the Poet Hesiodus, who admonishesh us and giveth counsell in this wife:

No childrenges, if shoue be newly come From dolefull grave or heavy funerall: But pare not when shou are returned home From solemne feast of Gods celestials.

as if he would induce men to beget their children, when they be jocund, fresh and merry, for that the generation of them received the impression, not of vertue and vice onely, but also of joy, sadnesse, and all other qualities: howbeit, this is not a work of humane wildome (as Hesiodus suppofeth) but of God himselfe, to discern and foreknow periectly either the conformites or the diverfities of mens natures, drawn from their progenitors before such time as they break forth into some great enormities, whereby their passions and affections be discovered what they are: for the young whelps of beares, wolves, apes and tuch like creatures shew presently their naturall inclination, even whiles they be very young because it is not disguised or masked with any thing; but the nature of man casting it selfe, and serling upon manners, customs, opinions and lawes, concealeth often times the ill that it hath, but doth im itate and counterfeit that which is good and honest in such fort as it may be thought either to have done away clean all the staine, blemish & imperfection of vices inbred with it, or elfe to have hidden it a long time, being covered with the vaile of craft and subtilty, so as we are not able, or at least wise have much adoe to perceive their malice, by the sting, bit and prick of every feverall vice. And to say a truth, herein are we mightily deceived, that we think men are become unjust then only and not before, when they do injury; or diffolure, when they play fome infolent and loofe part; cowardly minded, when they run out of the field; as if a man should have the conceir, that the sting in a scorpion was then bred and not before, when he gave the first prick; or the poilon in vipers was ingendred only, when they bit or stung; which furely were great simplicity and meer childishnesse: for a wicked person becommethnot then such an one, even when he appeareth so, and not before; but he hath the rudiments and beginnings of vice and naughtinesse imprinted in himselfe, but he shewethand useth the same, when he hath meanes, fit occasion, good opportunity, and might answerable to his mind; like as the thiefe spieth his time to rob, and the tyrant to violate and break the lawes. But God, who is not ignorant of the nature and inclination of every one, as who fearcheth more into the fecrets of the heart and minde then into the body never waiteth and stayeth untill violence be performed by frength of hand; impudencie bewraied by malepart speech; or intemperance and wantonnesse frength of name; impludence between by manager speech, or intemperance and wantonnelle perpetrated by the naturall members and privy parts; ere hepunish: for he is, not revenged of an unrighteous man, for any harm and wrong that he hast received by him; nor angry with a thiefe of robber, for any forcible violence which he hath done unto himine yet hateth an adulterer, because he hath suffered injury by his meanes; but many times he chastiseth by way of medicine, a perion that committeeth adultery, a covetous wretch & a breaker of the laws; whereby other whiles he riddeth them of their vice, and preventeh in them (as it were) the falling fickness before the fit surprise them. We were erewhite offended and displeased, that wicked persons were over-late and too slowly punished; and now discontented we are, and complaine, for that God doth express and chattie the y punition and victous disposition of some, before the act committed; never considering and knowing, that full often a further mifchief is worfe and more to be feared, then the prefent; and that which is secret and hidden, more dangerous then that which is open and apparent, Neither are we able to comprehend and conceive by reason, the causes wherfore it is better otherwhiles to tolerate and futfer some persons to be quiet, who have offended and transgressed already; and to prevent, or flay others, before they have executed that which they intend : like as (in very truth) we know or tray others, before they have contained and the fine the reason, why medicines and physicall drugs (being not meet for some who are fick) be good and wholsome for others, though they are not actually dieased, yet happily in a more dangerous estate than the former. Hereupon it is that the gods turne not upon the children and posterity, all the rfaults of their fathers and ancestors: for if it happen, that of a bad father there descend a good son, like as a fickly and crasse man may beget a found, strong and healthful child, such an one is exempt from the pain and punishment of the whole house and race, as being translated out of a vicious samily, and a-dopted into another: but, that a young son (who shall conforme himself to the hereditary vice of his patents) is liable to the punishment of their sinfull life, as well as he is bound to pay their debts by right of incceffion and inheritance. For Antigonus was not punished for the sines of his father Demetrius; nor to speak (of leyed persons) Philes for Augens, ne yet Nessor Nelseus his sake; how albeit they were descended from most wicked fathers, yet they proved themselves right honest but all fuch, as whole nature loved, embraced and practifed that which came unto them by descent and parentage, in these (I say) divine justice is wontto persecute and punish that which resembleth vice and fin: for like as the warts, black moles, spots and free kles of fathers, not appearing at all upon their own childrens skin, begin afterwards to put forth and shew themselves in their nephews, to wit, the children of their ions and daughters: And there was a Grecian woman, who having brought forth a black infant, and being troubled therefore, and judicially accused for adultery, as if shee had been conceived by a black-moor, shee pleaded and was found to be her selfe descended from an Aethiopian, in the fourth degree removed: As also it is known for certaine, that of the children of Python the Nisibian who was descended from the race and line of those old Spartans, who were the first lords and founders of Thebes, the youngest, and he that died not long fince, had upon his body the print and forme of a speare, the very true and naturall mark of that ancient line; folong and after the revolution of many years, there fprang and came up again as it were out of the deep, this relemblance and flock and kindredeven for it falleth out many times, that the fifth generations and descents, do hide and after a fort drowne those qualities and affections of the mind which are affected and appropriat to some kindred; but afterwards, at one time or other, put them forth, and drive them outward to appear in those that follow, and the same do represent that which is proper to each race, as well in vertue as invice. Now when I had finished this speech, I held my peaces and with that Olympicus smiled and said: We would not have you to think (quoth he) that we commend you, as having infliciently proved your discourse by demonstration, left we might feem to have forgoten or to neglect the tale or narration which you promited to relace unto us: Mary then will we give you our sentence and opinion therof, when we shall keep ite have heard the same. Thus therefore I began against to enter into speech, and follow my intended purpose. There was one Thispessus, of the City Soli in Cilicia, a great friend and samiliar of Protogenes, who fomtime here converted with us, who having led his youthfull days very loofely, within a final time had wated and confumed all his goods, whereby he was fallen for a certain pace into extream want & necessity, which brought him also to a leud life informed has he proved a very badman; and repenting his former follies and dispence, began to make thirts, and leek all means to recover his fare against much thire means the fact of the first and of the control of the flate againe; much like unto those loose and lastivious persons, who make no account of their lawfull and esponsed wives, nor caring at all for them whiles they have them; afterwards, when they have cast them off, and put them away, seeing them wedded unto others, sollicit them to yield their bodies, and give the attempt to force & corrupt them most wickedly. Thus he forbare no leud, indirect, and shameful practices; so they turned to his gaine and profit, and within a little while, he gar rogether not great store of goods, but produced himselfe a bad name of wicked dealing, much shame, and infamy: Bue the thing that made him famous, and much spoken of; was the answer delivered unto him by the oracle of Amphilocus, for thither had he fent, as it should feem, to know whether he should live the rest of his life better then he had done before, Now the oracle returned this answer: That it would be better with him after he was dead; which in some sort happened unto thin not long after: For being fallen from ar high place with his head forward, without any slambe broken not wound made; only with the fall, the breath went out of his body, and therehe lay for dead; and three dayes after, preparation being made for his funerals, carried forth he was to be buried; but behold all on a sudden, he revived and quickly came to himselse againe; whereupon there enfued fuch a change and alteration in his life, that it was wonderfull; for by the report and teltimony of all the people of Cilicia, they never knew man of better conficience in all his affaires and dealings, whiles he did negotiate and dwell amongst them; none more devout and teligious to God-ward, none more fast and sure to his friends, none bitterer to his enemies; insomuch, as they who were most inward with him, and had kept his company familiarly a long time, were very defirous and earnest with him, to know the cause of so strange and sudden alteration; as being perfivaded that fogreat amendment of life(foloose and dissolute as it was before) could not come by meer chance and cafualty, (as in truth it did) according as himfelf made relation unto the faid Pro-togenes, and other such familiar friends of hissmen of good worth and reputations for thus herepoots unto them & faid. That when the spirit was out of his body, he feared at the first (as he thought himfelf)like unto a pilot, flung out of his ship, and plunged into the botom of the seasio wonderfully was he aftonished at this change; but aferwards when as by little and little he was raised up again and recovered, fo that he was awate that he drew his breath fully, & at liberty, he looked round about him, for his foul feemed as if it had been one eye fully open; but he beheld nothing that he was wont to view, only hethought that he faw planets and other stars of a huge bigness, distant an infinite way afunder, and yet for multitude innumerable, casting from them a wonderful light, with a colour admirable, and the same glittering and shining most resplendent, with a power and sorce incredible, in such fort, as the faid foul being gently and eafily carried, as in a chariot, with this splendor and radiant light, as it were upon the lea in a calme, went quickly whether foever the would; but letting pass a great number of things worthy there to be feen; he faid that he beheld how the foules of thole that were departed this life, as they rose up and ascended, resembled certaine small sirie bubbles, and the aire gave way and place unto them as they mounted on high but anon when these bubbles by little and little braft in funder, the foules came forth of them, and appeared in the forme and shape of men and women, very light and nimble as dikharged from all polic to beare them down: howbeit, they did not move and befir themfelves all alike and after one fort; for fome leaped with a wondeful agility, and mounted directly and plumb upright; others turned round about together like unto bobins or spindles, one while up and another while down, so as their motion was mixed and consused, and solinked together, that unneth for a good while and with much adoe, they could be staied and severed asunder. As for these soules and spirits, many of them he knew not (as he said) who they were; but taking kowledge of two or three among them who had been of his old aquaintance, he pressed forward to approach near to speake to them: but they neither heard him speak, nor indeed were in their rightsenses; but being after a fort aftonied and beside themselves, resulted onceto be either seen or felr, wandring and flying to and fro apart at the first; but afterwards, encountring and meeting with a number of others disposed like unto themselves, they closed and clung unto them, and thus linked and coupled together, they moved here and there diforderly without discretion, and were carried every way to no purpose, uttering I wot not what voices, after a manner of yelling or a blacke-fanchus, not fignificant nor diffinet, bur as if they were cries mingled with lamentable plaints and dreadfull feare. Yet there were others to be seen aloft in the upmost region of the aire, jocund, gay and pleasant, so kind alfo and courteous, that often times they would feem to approach neer one unto another, turning away from those other that were tumultious and diforderly; and as is thould feem, they shew. ed some discontenument, when they were thronged and hudled close together; but well appaied and much pleafed, when they were enlarged and fevered ar their liberty. Among these (by his owne faying) he had a fight of a foul belonging unto akmiman and familiar friend of his, and yet he knew him not certainely, for that he died whiles himselfe was a very child; howbeit, the *That his faid foul comming toward him, faluted him in these termes: God lave you Thespessur whereat he maryelled much and fald tinto him: I am not The fpe fine, but my name is Arule me: True indeed (quoth the other) before-time you were so called, but from henceforth * The fpe fine, shall be your name; for dead you are not yet, but by the providence of God and permission of defliny, you are hither come, with the intellectual part of the foul; and as for all the rest, you have left it behind, sticking fall as an abshor to your body: and that you may now know this and, evermore hereafters take this for a 'cettain rule and token.' That the spirits of those who are departed and dead indeed, yeeld no shadow from them sthey neither wink nor open their eyes. The species hearing these words began to pluck up his spirits so much the more for to consider & discourse with himself elooking therefore every way about him, he might perceive that there accompanied with hima certain shadowy and dark lineartife, whereas the other fouls shone round about, and were clear and transparent within forth, howbeit, not all slike; for some yeelded from them pure colour, uniforme and equall, as toth the full moon when she is at the cleered; others had (as it were) sales or cicatrices, dispersed here and there by certaine distant spaces between some agains, were wonderfull hideous and strange to fee unto; all to be specked with black spots, like unto serpents skins; and others had light serifications and obscure risings upon their yilage. Now this kinsman of These feets (for there is no danger at all ro terms soules by the pages which men had whiles they were living discounted series. verally of each thing, saying. That Adraftia, the daughter of Jupiter and Neaffitie, was placed highert and above the rest, to punish and to be reveninged of all forts of crimes and hairous first; and that of finful wretches, there was not one (great of final) who, either by force precunning could ever save himselfe and escape punishment: but one kinde of paine and punishment (for three forts there be in all) belonging to this gaoler or executioner, and another to that; for there is one which is quick and freedy, selled your that is, penalty, and this taketh in hand the execution and chaffigment of thote, who immediatly in this life (whites they are in their bodies) be punished by the body, after a milde and gende manner, leaving unpunished many light saults, which require only fone body, after a milde and gende manner, leaving unpunished many light saults, which require only fone gengation but such as require more adoe to have their vices and some cured, God committee the committee of them to be punished after death to a second tormentresse, named Dice, that is to say, Revenge; mary those who are so laden with sinnes, that they be altogether incurable, when Dire hath given over and thrust them from her, the third ministresse of Adrassia, which of all other is most cruell, and named Erinnys, runneth after, chafing and purfuing them as they wander and run up and downs these (Lay) she courseth and hungeth with great misery and much dolor, until such time as she have oxertaken themall and plunged them into a bottomless pit of darkness inenarrable and invisible. Now of these three forts of punishments, the first which is executed by Pane, in this life resembleth that which is nifed in some barbarous nations; for in Persia, when they are by order of law and judicially to be punished, they take from them their copped capsor high-pointed curbants, and other robes, which they pluck and pull hair by hair, yea, and whip them before their faces, and they themselves shedding teares and weeping, cry out piteously and beseech the officers to cease and give overs femblably, the punishments, inflicted in this life in body or goods, are not exceeding sharp nor come very neer to the quick, neither do they pierce and reach unto the vice and fin it felfe, but the most part of them are imposed according to a bare opinion only, and the judgement of an outward nacurall sence. But if it chance (quoth he) that any one escape hither unpunished, and who hath not been well purged there before, him Dice taketh in hand all bare and naked as he is, with his foule discovered and open, as having nothing to hide, palliate and mask his wickednesse, but lying bare and exposed to the view throughout, and on every side, she presenteth and sheweth him first to his parents, good and honest persons (if happily they were such declaring how abominable he is how degenerate and unworthy of his parentage; but if they also were wicked, both he and they suffeine so much more grievous punishment, whiles he is tormented in seeing them, and they likewife in beholding him how he is punished a long time, even untill every one of his crimes and finnes be dispatched and rid away with dolorous and painfull toments, surpassing in sharpnesse and minus to compare the management of the state fine and vice remaine to be feen, in some more, in others less. But observe well (quoth he) and confider the divers colours of these soules of all forts; for this blackish and soule duskish hue, is properly the tincture of avarice and niggardife; that which is deep red and fiery, betokeneth cruelty and malice; whereas, if it stand much upon blew, it is a signe that their intemperance and looseness in the me of pleasure, hath remained a long time, and will be hardly scowred off, for that it is a vile vice: but the violet colour and swertish withall, proceedeth from envy, a venemous and poisoned colour, resembling the ink that commeth from the cuttle fish, for in life, vice, when the faile is altered and changed by passions, and withall doth turne the body, putteth forth sundry colours: but here it is a signe that the purification of the soule is fully finished, when as all these tinctures are done away quite, whereby the foul may appear in her native hew, all fresh, near, cleare and lightsome: for so long as any one of these colours remaineth, there will be evermore some recidivation and returne of patitions and affections, bringing certaine tremblings, beatings as it were of the pulle, and a panting in some but weake and teeble, which quickly stateth, and is soone extinguisheds and in other morestrong quick and vehement. Now of these soules, some there be which after they have been well and throughly chaffiled, and that fundry times, recover in the end a decent habitude and dipolition; but others again are such, as the vehemence of their ignorance, and the flattering shew of pleasures and luftfull defire, transporteth them into the bodies of brute heasts; for the feebleness and defect of their understanding, and their sloth and slackness to contemplate and discourse by reaion, maketh them to incline and creep to the active part of generation; but then they find and perceive themselves delitute of a lascivious organ or infirument, whereby they may be able to execute and have the fruition of their appetite, and therefore defire by the meanes of the body to enjoy the fame for a much as here there is nothing at all but a bare shadow, & as one would say a vaine dream of pleasure, which never commeth to perfection and full ness. When he had thus said, he brought and lead me away, most swiftly, an infinite way; howbeit, with ease, and gently, upon the raies of the light, as if they had been wings unto a certaine place, where there was a huge wide chinke, tending downward (till, and thither being come, he perceived that he was forlorne and forlaken of that prowerfull spirit that conducted and brought him thither; where he faw that other foules also were in the same cases for being gathered and flocked together like a fort of birds, they fly downward round about this gaping chawn, but enter into it directly they durft not; now the faid chink refembled for all the world within the caves of Bacchus, so rapissed and adorned they were with the verdure of great leaves and branches, together with all variety of gay flowers, from whence arose and breathed forth a sweet and mild exhalation, which yeelded a delectable and pleasant savour, wonderfull odoriferous, with a most temperate aire, which no less affected them that smelled thereof, than the fent of wine contenteth those who love to drink: in such fort as the soules feeding/and feasting themselves with these fragrant odours, were very cherefull, jocund, and merry; so as round about the faid place, there was nothing but pastime, joy, solace, mirth, laughing and singing much after the manner of men that rejoice one with another, and take all the pleasure and delight that possibly they can. And he said moreover, that Bacchus by the way mounted up into the iociety of the gods, and afterwards conducted Semele; and withall, that it was called the place of Lethe, that is to fay, Oblivion: Whereupon he would not let The spefius, though he were exceeding desirous, to stay there, but drew him away perforce; instructing him thus much, and giving him to understand, the reason and the intelligible part of the mind is dissolved, and as it were melted and moilined by this pleasure; but the unreasonable part which savoreth of the body, being watered and incarnate therewith, reviveth the memory of the body; and upon his remembrance, there groweth and raifeth a luft and concupiteence, which haleth and draweth unto generation (for fo called it) to wit, a confent of the foule thereto, weighed down and aggravated with overmuch moisture: Having therefore traversed another way asslong as the other, he was aware he sawa mighty standing boll, into which divers rivers seemed to fall and discharge themselves, whereof one was whiter than the fome of the Sea, or driven snow, another of purple hew or scarlet colour, like to that which appeareth in the raine-bow; as for others, they feemed a farte off to have every one of them their diftinct luftre & feverall tincture But when they approached neer unto them, the forefaid boll, after that the air about was discussed and vanished away, and the different colours of those rivers no more seen, lest no more flourishing colour, except only the white: Then he saw three Damons or Angels, fitting together in triangular forme, medling and mixing the rivers together, with certaine mealures. And this guide of The popular loude faid morever, that Orpheus came to faire when he went after his wife; but for that he kept not well inmind, that which he therefaw, he had fown one false tale among men; to wit: That the oracle at Delphi was common to Apollo, and the night, (for there was no commerce or fellowship at all between the night and Apollo) But this oracle (quoth he) is common to the moon and the night, which hath no determinate and certaine place upon the earth, but is alwayes errant and wandering among men, by dreames and apparitions; which is the reason that dreames compounded and mingled as you see, of falshood and truth, of variety and simplicity, are spread and scattered over the world. But as for the oracle of Apollo, neither have you feen it (quoth he) nor ever shall be able to fee; for the terrene substance or earthly part of the foul, is not permitted to arise and mount up on high, but bendeth downward, being fastned unto the body: And with that he approached at once neerer, endevouring to show him the shining light of the three-feet or three-footed floole, which (as he faid) from the bosom of the goddess Thenis, reached as far as to the mount Pernafus: and having a great define to fee the same yet he could not his eyes were so dazeled with the brightness thereof; howbeit, as he passed by, a loud and shrill voice he heard of a woman, who, among other things delivered in meter, uttered also as it should seem by way of prophese, the very time of his death: And the Damon said, it was the voice of Sibylla; for the being carried round in the globe and face of the moon, did toretell and fing what wasto come; but being descrous to heare more, he was repelled and driven by the violence of the moonas it were with certaine whirle puffs, a clean contrary way; so he could heare and understand but few things, and those very short; namely, the accident about the hill * Vefavius, and how Dicearchia should be confumed and burnt by casuall fire, as also a clause or peece of a verie, as touching the emperour who then reigned, to this effect:

Agracious prince he is, but yet must die, And empire leave by force of maladie

After this they passed on forward to see the paines and torments of those who were punished; and there at first they beheld all things most piteous and horrible to see to; for Thespesius who doubted nothing leffe, met in the place with many of his friends, kinstolks, and familiar companions, who were intorment, and suffering dolorous paines, and infamous punishment, they mouned themselves, lamenting, calling and crying unto him; at the last he had a fight of his own father, rifing out of a deep pir, full he was of pricks, gashes, and wounds, and stretching forth his hands unto him, was (mauger his heart) forced to break filence, yea, and compelled by those who had the charge and superintendence of the said punishments, to consesse with a loud and audible voice, that he had been a wicked murderer of certaine ftrangers, and guests whom he had lodged in his house; for perceiving that they had filver and gold about them, he had wrought their death by the meanes of poilon: and albeit he had not been detected thereof in his life time, whiles he was upon earth, yet here was he convicted and had fusteined already part of his punishment, and expected to endure the rest afterwards. Now Thefpefius durft not make sure nor interceed for his father, so affrighted he was and astonied; but defirous to withdraw himfelfe and be gone he loft the fight of that courteons and kind guide of his, which all this while had conducted him, and he saw him no more: but he might perceive other horrible and hideous spirits, who enforced and constrained him to passe farther, as if it were recessary that it should traverse still more ground: so he saw those who were no torious malefactors, in the view of every man (or who in this world had been chassised) how their shadow was here tormented with lesse paine, and rothing like to others, as havirg been feeble and imperfect in the reason effe part of the soule, and therefore subject to passions and affections; but such as were disguised and cloaked with an our ward apparence and reputation of vertue abroad, and yet had lived covertly and secretly at home in wickedness, certaine that were about them, forced some of them to turne the inside outward, and with much pain and griefe to lay themselves upon, to bend and bow, and discover their hypocriticall hearts within, even against their own nature, like unto the colopenders of the sea, when they have swallowed down an hook, are wont to turne themselves outward but others they flayed and displaied, discovering plainly and openly, how faultly, perverse and wicked they had been within, as whose principall parts of the reatonable soul, vice had possessed. He said morover, that he saw other iouls wounded and interlaced one within another, two three and more together, like to vipers and other repents, and those not forgetting their old grudge and malicious runker one against another, or up-on remembrance of losses and wrongs sustemed by others; fell to gnawing and devouring each other. Also, that there were three parallel lakes ranged in equall diltance one from the other; the one feething and boyling with gold, another of lead exceeding cold, and a third, most rough, confifting of iron: and that there were certain spirits called Damons, which had the overlooking and charge of them; and there, like unto mettall-founders, or smiths, with certain instruments either plunged in, or else drew out, fouls. As for those who were given to filthy lucie, and by reason of infatiable avarice, committed wicked parts, those they let downinto the lake of melted gold, and when they were once fer on a light fire, and made transparent by the fixength of those flames within the fail lake; then plunged they were into the other of lead is where after they were congarded and hardned in manner of haile, they transported them anew into the third lake of iron, where they became exceeding black and horrible, and being cracks and broken, by reason of their drinesse and hardnesse, they changed their forme, and then at last (by his saying) they were thrown agains into the forelaid lake of gold, suffering by the means of these changes and mutations, intolerable paines. But those souls (quoth he) who made the greatest moane unto him, and seemed most miserably (of all others) to be tormented, were they, who thinking they were escaped and past their punishment, as, who had suffered sufficiently for their deserts at the hands of vengeance, were taken again, and put to fresh torments; and those they were, for whole sinnes their children and others of their posterity suffered punishment; for whensoever one of the souls of theie children or nephewes in lineall deicent, either met with them, or were brought unto them, the same sell into a fit of anget, crying out upon them, shewing the marks of the toments and paines that it fulleined, reproaching and hitting them in the teeth therfore; but the other making half to fly and hide themselves, yet were not able so to doe; for incontinently the tormentors followed after and pursued them, who brought them back again to their punishment, crying out, and lamenting for nothing so much, as that they did forsee the torment which they were to suffer, as having experience thereof already. Furthermore he faid that he faw fome, and those in number many, either children or nephewes, hanging together fast, like bees or bats, murmuring and grumbling for anger, when they remembred and called to mind, what forrowes and calamities they fufferined for their lake. But the laft thing that he faw, were the louies of fuch as entred into a fecond life and new nativity, as being turned and transformed forcibly into other creatures of all forts, by certain workemen appointed therefore, who with tools for the purpole and many a froake, forged and framed some of their parts new, bent and wrested others, tookeaway and abolished a third fort; and all, that they might fort and be intable to other conditions and lives : among which he espied the foul of Nero afficted already grievoully enough otherwife, with many calamities, pierced through every part with spikes and nailes red hor with fire: and when the artilans atoresaid tooklit in hand to transforme it into the shape of a viper; of which kind (as Pindarus faith) the young ones gnaweth through the bowels of the dam to come into the world, and to devoure it, he faid that all on a sudden there shone forth a great light, out of which there was heard a voice giving commandement that they should metamorphose and transfigure it into the forme of another kinde of beaft, more tame and gentle, forging a water-creature of it, chanting about standing lakes and mari-Thes; for that he had been in some fort punished already for the sins which he had committed, and befides, some good turne is due unto him from the gods, in that of all his subjects, he had exempted from taxe, tallage and tribute, the best nation and most beloved of the gods, to wit, the Greeks. Thus far forth, he said, he was only a spectator of these matters; but when he was upon his returne, he abid all the paines in the world, for very feare that he had; for there was a certaine woman, for vifage and stately bigness, admirable, who took hold on him, and said. Come hither, that thou maiest keep in memory all that thou maiest keep in memory all that thou has seen the better wherewith she put forth unto him a little rod or wand all firy, such as painters or enamellers use, but there was another that staid her; and then he might perceive himselse to be blown by a strong and violent wind with a trunk or pipe, so that in the turning of an hand he was within his owne body againe, and so began to look up with his eyes in manner, out of his grave and sepulcher.

The Summary.

"Hey who have given out that manis aliving creature endued with reason, have in few words ex-They who have given out that manual alreing creature chance with the for want of declaring prefet that which every one of its ought principally to confider in him. But for want of declaring what this word Reason doth import, themselves for the most part have not well under food this definition, but as much as in them is, reduced the condition of men to a worse estate, then that of brute beefts: For albeit mans body moved and governed by his immortal foul, hath many excellent advantages above beafts; yet if reason the guide of the soul, have no other help then of her self: Certes, it may be well and truely said; that man is the most miserable creature in the world: and herein it is, that Philosophers destitute of the light of GaditVord, are become and foremain far short, as being ignorant of Adams fall, original sin, and the hereditary source and spring of so many defects and imperfections which proceed from the anderstanding and the will, so much depravate and corrupt in ut by fin, that when we are to range and reduce rea-Son to her true devoir and duty indeed; namely, to know and serve God, according as be commandeth, she is stark blind, yea and a very enemy her self to that good grace which is offered unto her. By reason therefore, which maketh the difference between us and brute beafts, we are to understand the true knowledge of God, for to serve and glorifie him according to the tehour of his word all the dayes of our life; this is called true religion, of which if man be definine, according to the sentence of our Savion: It bootesh not him to have gained the whole world, if he less his own soul: as also. That it were better for a scandalous mon, and him by whom offence cometh, never to have been born, or a leastwife foon exterminate andros-ted out: Likewife, that whosever is presid of him selfel, and forgeteth his God; is no more a man, but re-sembleth brute beasts, whose soul perisheth together with the body. But to enter no farther into this Theological discourse, we seeinthis present Dialogue somewhat thereof, and that the intention of Plutarch was to show, that the intelligence and cogitation of God; Is the only true priviledge prerogative and advanta ge which men have above bealfs : howbest, left he hash this work imperfect, even in that very point, which of all other is hardest, and impossible to be proved by him or his like; for what found understanding, apprehension, or conceit could they have of God, who knew not at all the true God? So then, it may be faid, that this parcel or remnant of the disparation, containeth a form of processe against all Pagans and Abesses, to prove that brute beasts excel them, and be in more happy estate then they. Astouching the discomfeit sets, to the end that it might not be odiour, in case he had handled it as his own invention, he helpath himselfe with the fabriloustale of Clace, who transformed into beasts the companions of Ulystes: By which aumicia with the powers that of control may be meaning or a stress of which allegory, the Philosophers and Poets imply and teach thus much; that worldly pleasure doth me had person bratish, sow only the wise, who associated enjoy goods; homeurs, and delights, with a sayed might and spirit seled, and which never misses, or cometh short or wide of the mark that is shootest as: He bringeshist therefore Unises, conferring by the seave and permission of Chece, with a Greek named Gryllus, transmission and the children of the conference of the mark that is the state of the conference of the same of the state of the same of the sa ted and turned into a swine: and the chiefe point of their disputation is this: Whether the lfeof manis better to be esteemed then that of beasts? Gryllus for to aphold and maintain his casse, treateth of four points principally: First, of the vertue in generals secondly of the valour and fortified in the third place of the temperance; and lest of all, the wischame of beasts: proving against Ulystes, and that by divers arguments see out and marked in order, that beasts have the start and vantage of men in all these points; and leaving the Reader to make the conclusion; he showeth sufficiently, that if men have no other approach to rest upon, then a ratural habitude of an earthly vertue, and can affure the repose of their consciences upon nothing. but upon humane valliance, temperance, and wifedom, they do but go in the company of beafts, or rather come behind them. Thus you fee why our Author maketh Ulysses to enter into a descourse as touching the knrwledge of God: but whether it were that his other affairs and occupations, or the iniquity of time hath deprived no of the rest, this Treatise or Dialogue hath been cut off in that very place, where it deserved and required to be more throughly and lively prosecuted: And this which remains the and is come unto our lands, may serve all men in good stead for their instruction and learning, not to glory and vannt themselves but in the mercy of him, who calleth them to a better life, wherein bruite heafts (created only for om ufe, and for the present life, with which they perish for ever) have no part nor portion at all.

That brute beasts have use of Reason.

The Personages that discourse in this Dialogue, uniffer, Circe, Gryllus.

Ulyffes.

Methinks dame Circe that I have sufficiently conceived, and firmly imprinted these matters min my memory. Now would It gladly ask the question, and know of you, whether among those men which be transformed into Wolves and Lyons, you have any Greeks or no?

Yes marry have I, and those very many, dear heart Wiffer; but wherefore demand you this question? ulyff

Because I am perswaded, it will be greatly for mine honour among the Greeks, if by your gracious favour I may obtain thus much, as at your hands to receive them men again, and save them, strangers though they be, as well as my companions; nor so neglect their stare, as to suffer them against nature to age, and wax old in the bodies of wild beatts, leading a life so miserable, ignominous, and infamous.

See the simplicity of this man; he would through his folly, that his ambitious mind should procure dammage and calamity, not to himselfe onely and his friends, but also to those who are meere aliens, and nothing belonging unto him?

I perceive very well (O Circe) that you are about the tempering and brewing of another cup and portion of words, to be witch mesfor certainly you should make a very beast of me indeed, if I would instead to be perswaded, that it were a detriment or loss to become a man again of abrute!

Why? have you not already done worse for your self then so, and committed greater absurdities? considering that letting go a life immortal, and not subject to old age, which you might enjoy if you you would make your abode and dwell with me; you would needs go in all the haste to a woman mortal, and (as I dare well say) sery aged by this time, and that through ten thousand dangers, which yet you must endure, promising your selfe, that you shall thereby be better regarded, more honoured and renowned from hencestorth, then now you are; and in the mean while you consider not that you seek after a vain selicity, and the image or shadow only for the thing indeed.

Well Circe, I am content that it be so as you say; for why should we so often contest and debate thus about the same still? But I pray you of all loves, unbind and let loose these poor men for my sake, and give them me.

Nay, that I will not, I swear by Hecate: You shall not come so easily by them; for I tell you they be no mean persons, and of the common sort: But you were best to ask them first if they them selves be willing thereto or no? And if they answer nay? then, like a noble valiant gentlemans you are, deal with them effectually, and induce them thereto: But in case you cannot with all your reasons bring them to it, and that they be able to convince you by sorce of argument, let it suffice you that you have advised your selfe and your friends but badly.

Is it so indeed good Lady and are you about to mock and make a fool of me? For how can they either yield or receive reason in conserence, so long as they be Asses, Swine, and Lyons, as they are,

Goe to fir, most ambitious man that you are, let that never trouble you; for I will uphold them sufficient both to hear and understand whatsoever you shall alledge unto them, yea, and able to reafon and discourse with you: Or rather, I passe not much if one of them for all his sellows shall both demand and answer: Lo here is one, deal with him as it pleaseth you.

And by what name shall we call him, Girce; or who might he be, when he was a man?
Circe,

What matters that? and what maketh it to the disputation and question in hand? Howbeit, name him if you think good, Gryluu: And to the end that you should not think, that for to gratifie or do me a pleasure, he may seem to reason crosseand against your mind, I will for the time retire my selfe out of the place.

Gryllus.

God fave you Uly ffes.

And you also gentle Gryllus.

What is your will with me, and what would you demand of me?

I wot well that you and the rest were sometimes men, and therefore I have great ruth and piry to see you all in this estate, but as good reasons, it grieveth me most for the Greeks, that they are fallen into this calamity: But so it is, that even now I requested Circe, to loosen as many of you as be willing thereto, and after she hath restored them to their ancient shape, to give them leave to go with me.

Peace Unffes, and say not a word more I beseech you; for we all have you in contempt now, seeing iceing that you have been taken and named all this whiles for a fingular man, and feemed far to furpaffeall others in wilcdom, whereas there is little or no cause thereof; in that you have been afraid even of this, to change from the worse to the better; and never confidered, that as Children abhor the medicines and drugs that Physicians ordain, and refuse to learn those Sciences and Disciplines, which of fickly, disassed and foolish, might make them more healthy, found and wise; even fo you have rejected and cast behind you this opportunity to be transformed and changed from one to another; and even still you tremble and dare not venture to keep company and lie with Circs, for dread and sea; lest ere you be aware, she should make of you either a Swine, or a Wolfe; and you would perswade us, that whereas we live now in abundance, and enjoy the affuence of all good things, we should quit the same, and with a handon, and for sake her who hath procured us this happinesse, and all to goe away with you, when we are become men again; that is to say, the most wretched creatures in the world.

It feemeth Gryllus that the potion which yourdrask at Circes hands, hath not only marred the form and fathion of your body, but also spoiled your wit and understanding having intoxicate your brain, and filled your head with corrupt, strange, and monstrous opinions for every or else fome pleasure that you have taken by acquaintance of this body so long, hath clean bewitched you.

Nay I wis, good Sir, it is neither so nor so, it it please you O King of the Cephallenians; but if you be disposed to argue with reason, rather then to wrangle with opprobrious tearns, we will some bring you to another opinion, and prove by sound arguments, upon the experience which we have of the one life and the others that there is great reason why we should love and embrace this present state above the former.

For mine own part I am ready to give you the hearing.

And I as willing likewife to deliver my mind: But first and formost, begin I will to speak of vertues, upon which I see you stand so much, and in regard whereof, you wondrously please your selves, as who would be thought in justice, in wisedom, in magnanimity and other vertues, to excelled as a who would be thought in justice, in wisedom, in magnanimity and other vertues, to excelled as far surpassed all brute beaths: Answer me therefore I befeech you, the wisest man of all other; to this point: For I have heard sky, that upon a time you made relation unto Grice of the Cyclopes countrey, how the soile there is naturally so good and fortile, that without plowing, sowing, or planting at all, it bringeth forth of it selfe all forts of fruit: Tell met say, whether you esteem better of it (so fruitful as its) or of thace a rough and mountain regions, good onely for to breed Goats in, and which hardly and with great labour yeeldeth unto those that till it, small store (God wor,) of poor and lean fruits, which will not quitfor the cost and pains? But take heed it grieve you not to answer contrary to your mind, for the love that you bear unto your native countrey.

I love verily (for I must not lye) yea, and I embrace and hold most dear; mine own country and place of nativity: howbeit, I praise and admire that other region of theirs.

Why then belike, the case stands thus, and this we are to say, that the wises man is of opinion, that therebe somethings which are to praise and commend, and other things to chuse and lover and verily, I think that your judgement is the same of the soul is or the like reason there is of it and a land or plot of ground, namely, that the soul is better, which without any travel or labour, bringeth forth vertue, as a smit springing and growing of it selfe.

Well: be it so as you say.

Gralls

Yougrant then and confessed already, That the soul of brute beasts is by nature more kind, more perfect and better disposed to yeeld vertue, considering that without compulsion, without commanment, or any teaching, which is as much to say, as without tillage and towing it bringeth forth and nourisheth that vertue which is meet and convenient for every one.

And what vertue is that (my good friend Gryllus) whereof beafts be capable?

Gryllus.

Nay, what vertue are they not capable of? yea, and more then the wifelt man that is. But fift, confider we (if you pleafe) valour and fortitude, whereupon you beat your felfe and vaunt to highly, neither are you abafhed and hide your felfe for fear, but are very well pleafed when as men furname you Hardy, Bold, and a Winner of Ciries: whereas you have (moft wicked wretch that you are) circumvented and deceived men, who know no other way of making war, but that which is plain & generous, and who were altogether unskilfnl of fraud, guile and leafing, by your willy thifts and fiphile pranks, attributing the name of vertue unto cunning cafts, the which indeed knoweth nor what deceit and fraud mementh. But you fee the combats of beafts as well againft men as when they fight one againft another, how they are performed without any craftiness, or fleight, only by plain hardiness and cleane firength, and as it were upon a native magnanimity, they defend themselves, and be revenged of their enemies : and neither by enforcement of Laws, norfor fear to be judicially reproved and punished for cowardize, but only through inftinct of nature avoiding the shame and digrace to be conquered, they endure and hold out fight to the very extremity, and all to keep themselves invincible : for, say they be in body the weaker, yet they yeeld not for all that, nor are faint-hearted and give over, but chuse to die in fight: and many of them there be, whose courage and generofity, even when they are ready to die, being retired into tome one corner of their body, and there gathering it felfe, resisteth the killer, it leapeth and fretteth still, until such time as, like a flame of fire, it be quenched and put out once for all they cannot skill of praying and intreating their enemy, they crave no pardon and mercy; and it were strange in any of them, to confesse that they are overcome; neither was it ever feen that a Lyon became a flave unto a Lyon, or one horse unto another in regard of fortitude, like as one man to another, contenting himselfe and willingly embracing servitude as next confin and a firmme appropriate unto cowardize. And as for those beasis which men have surprized and caught by snares, traps, subtile sleights and devices of engins, such it they be come to their growth and perfect age, reject all food, refu'e nourishment, yea, and endure thirst, to such extremity, that they chuse to die and seek to procure their own death, rather then to live in servitude; but to their young ones and whelps, which for their renderage betractable, pliable, and easie to beled which way one will, they offer so many deceitful bairs to entice and allure them with their sweetnesse, that they have no sooner tasted thereof, but they become enchanted and bewitched therewith: for these pleasures, and this delicate life, contrary to their nature, in tract of time causeth them to be soft and weak, receiving that degeneration (as it were) and esseminate habit of their courage, which folk calltamenesse, and indeed but basenesse and defect of their natural generosity: whereby it appeareth, that beasts by nature are bred and passing well disposed to be audacious and hardy: whereas contrariwife, it is not kindly for men to be so much as bold of speech and resolute in speaking their minds. And thus you may (good Wysses) learn and know especially by this one argument: for in all brute beafts, nature swayeth indifferently and equally of their side, as touching courage and boldnesse, neither is the female in that point inferiour to the male, whether it be in full eining pain and travel for getting of their living, or in fight for defence of their little ones. And I am sure you heard of a certain Cromyonian swine, what foul work she made, being a beast of the female Sex, for Thefeus, and how she troubled him; as also of that monstrous Sphinx, which kept upon the rock Phicion, and held in awe all that tract underneath and about it: for furely all her craft and subtilety in devising riddles, and proposing dark questions, had booted her nothing, in case she had not been withal, of greater force and courage then all the Cadmeians. In the very sime quarter was (by report) the Fox of Telmesus, a wily and crafty beast. And it is given out, that neer unto the said place, was also the fell drag on which fought in single fight hand to hand with Apollo, for the Seignory of the Oracle at Delphi. And even your great King Agamemon, took that brave Mare

be press to the wars: wherein he did well and wifely in mine opinion, to preser a good and couragious beaft, before a coward and dastardly man: and you your own felf (Uly fer) have feen many times Lyonnesses, and she Leopards, how they give no place at all to their males in courage and hardinesse, as your Lady Penelope doth, who gives you leave to be abroad in warfare, whiles she fits at home close to the herth, and by the fire fide, and dares not do so much as the very swallows. in repelling those back who come to destroy her and her house, for all she is a Laconian woman born: What should I tell you of the Carian women? for by this that hath been said already, it is plain and evident, that men naturally are not endued with prowesse, for if they were, then should women likewise have their part with them in vertue and valour: And thereupon I inser and conclude that you and such as you are, exercise a kind of valiance (I must needs say) which is not voluntary nor natural, but constrained by force of Laws, subject and servile to (I wot not what) customes and reprehensions; and you meditate, I say, and practice for vain-glorious opinion, fortitude, gayly fet out with trim words; you sustain travels and perils, not for that you set light by them, nor for any hardinesse and confidence in your selves, but because you are afraid lest others should goe before you, and be esteemed greater then you. Andlike as here among your Mates at Sea, hee that first rifeth to his businesse of rowing, layeth hand and seizeth upon the lightest Care that hee can meet with, doth it not, for that he despiseth it, but because he avoideth and is afraid to handle one that is heavier: and he that endure the he knock of a bafton or cudgel, because he would not receive any wound by the sword: as also, he that resisteth an enemy, for to avoid some ignominous infamy of death, is not to be faid valiant in respect of the one, but coward in regard of the other: even o the valour in you, is nothing elle but a wife and wary cowardile, and your prow-effe and boldneffe, is no better then time to the first own to skill and knowledge how to decline one danger by another. To be briefe, if you think your selves to be more hardy and valiantthen beafts, how comethit, that your Poets tearm those who fight mansully against their enemies, λυκόρερτας, that is, Wolves for courage: θυμολέοντας, that is, Lyon-hearted: and συτ ίνδιλες مر دامه و معرف بالمعرف بالمعر Lyon, ar gent dougor, that is as valiant as a man: or a wild Boat, dr desenter draw, that is, comparable to a man incourage and strength. Yet I wot well, when they would speak excessively in comparison, their manner is, to call menthat are swift in running, and wifes, that is, light footed like the wind; and those who be fair and beautiful, southful, that is, angelical, or to see to, like unto angels:

and even so, they compare and resemble brave warriours in the highest degree, unto beasts, who in case are much more excellent then men: the reason is this, for that choict and heat of courage is (as it were) the steel, the sile, yea, the yery whetsone that giveth theedg unto foritude; and this do brute beasts bring with them pure and simple unto fight; whereas in you, it being alway mingled and tempered with some discourse of reason, as if wine were delayed with a little water, it is gone and to seek in the greatest dangers, and salten at the very point of opportunity, when it is most to be used. And some of you are of opinion, and stick not to lay, that in battel and sight there is no need at all of anger, but that layeth as de all choler, we are to employ sober and sayed reason; wherein they speak not amisse, and is hold well with them, when the question is of desence only, and the securing of amans own life but surely, if the case be so, that we are to offend, to annoy and desent our enemy, they talk most shameling. It is not a very absurd thing, that ye should reprove and blame nature, for that she hath not see unto your bodies any sings or pricks, nor given you tusks and teeth to revenge your selves with, nor yet armed you with hooked claws and tallons to offend your enemies; and in the mean while your own selves take, spoile, and becreave the soule of that natural weapon which is inbred with it, or a least wise cut the same short and disable it?

What Gryllum! you feem (as far as I guess) to have been heretofore some witty and great Orator; who now grunting out of your sie or frank, have so pithily argued the case, and disconside of the matter in hand; but why have you not in the same train disputed likewise of temperance?

Gryllum.

Because, forsooth, I thought that you would first have resuted that which hath already been spoken; but I see well you debre to hear me speak of temperance, because you are the husbandof a most chaste wife, and you think besides, that your selfehave shewed good proofe of your owne continency, in that you have rejected the love and wanton company of Circe; but even herein you are not more perfect, I mean in continence, then any one beaft, for even they alfolust not at all to company or engender with those that are of more excellent kinde then their owne, but take their pleasure with those, and make love to such as be of the same fort, and therefore no marvel, that as the Mendefian buck-goat in Egyp, when he was fint up with many fair and beautiful women, never for all that made to any of them, but abhorred to meddle with them; whereas he was raging wood in heat of lust after the Does or semale Goats; So you, taking delight in your ordinary love, have no defire at all, being a man, to sleep or deal carnally with an immortal goddesse: And as for the chassity and continence of your own Lady Penelope, I tell you there be ten thousand Crowes in the world, that after their manner, caing and crooking as they do, will make a meere mock of it, and they that it is no such matter to be accounted of; for there is not one of them, but if the male or cock chance to die, remaineth a widow without feeking after a mate, not for a little while, but even for the space of nine ages and lives of a man; so that inthis respect, your fair Penelope cometh behind the poorest Crow or Raven that is, and deserveth not the minth part of her honorfor chaftity: But feeing you are aware that I am so cloquent an Orator, I care not much if I observe a methodical order in this discourse of mine, and like a Clerk indeed, beginstrif with the definition of temperance, and then proceed to the division of appetites and lusts, according to their several distinct kindsright formally. Temperance therefore is a certain restraint, abridgement, or regularity of lufts, and defires, a reftraint I iay, and abating of inch as are forraign, fitrange, and superfluous, to wit, unnecessary, and a regularity which by election and choise of time and temperature of a meane, doth moderate those that be natural and necessary; for you see that in lusts and desires, there be infinite differences: As for example, the appetite to drink, besides that it is natural, is also necessary; But the lust of the flesh, or concupiscence, although nature hath given the beginning thereof; yet to it is, that we may live commodiously without itsio as well it may be called natural, but in no wife necessary. Now there is another fort of defires, that beneither natural nor necessary, but accidental, and infused from without by a vain opinion, and upon ignorance of of that which is good, and there be such a number of them, that they go very neer to chase away and thrust out all your natural appetites, much like as when the aliens and strangers that swarm in a City, drive out and expel the natural inhabitants: whereas brute beafts give no entrance nor any communication and fellowship to forraign affections for to settle in their souls, but in their whole life, and all their actions befar remote from vain-glory, self-conceit, and fond opinions, as if they abode within the mediterranean parts, distant from the sea: True it is that in their port and carriage, they be not so elegant, so fine and curious as men: howbeit otherwise, for temperance and good government of their affections, which be not many in number, either domestical, or strange and forraign, they are more precise and wonderful exact in the observing of them then they; for the proof & truth hereof, the time was once, when I my felf no less doated and was befotted upon gold then you are now, thinking verily that there was no good nor possession in the world comparable to it; I was in love also of silver and ivory, and he that had most store hereof, me thoughts was a right happy man, and most highly in grace and layour with the gods, whether he were Phrygian or Carian itskilled not, more base minded then Dolon, or infortunate otherwise then Priamus; insomuch as being linked fast and tied to these desires, I reaped and received no pleasure nor any contenument at all from all other bleffings; for notwithflanding I was sufficiently furnished with them, yet I took my self lest needy and destitute of those which I accounted the greatest; and therefore I well remember, when I faw you upon a time flately arrayed, with a rich robe in Candie, I wished not to have your wildome and vettue, but your beautiful caffock fo daintily and finely wrought, your mantel! fay of purple, so delicate and fost, the beauty whereof I beheld with such admiration, that I was even ravished and transported with the fight thereof, as for the button or clasp, all of pure gold, belonging thereto, it had in it a fingularity by it felfe, and an excellent workman he was no doubt, who took delight in the turning and graving thereof; and verily for mine own part, I followed afteryou for to fee it, as if I had been enchanted or bewitched: as women that be amorous of their Lovers: But now being delivered from these vain and foolish opinions, and having my brain purged from such fantaflical conceits, I passe over gold and silver, and make no more account of them, then I doe of other ordinary flones; your goodly habiliments, your fine embroidered garments of needle work and rapifry, I fee fo light by, that I make more reckoning I assureyou, of a good deep puddle of for mire and dirt to walter and wallow in at mine ease, and for to sleep when my belly is full, then of them: neither is there any of these appetites comming from without, that hath place in our toul, but our life for the most part we passe in desires and pleasures necessary; and even those which are meer natural only, and not altogether so necessary, we use them neither disorder y, nor yet unmeasurably: And of them let us first discourse: As for that familiar pleasure which proceedeth from fweet odours, and such things, as by their fent doe affect the smelling, over and besides the simple delight that it yeeldeth, which coffeth naught, it bringeth therewith a certaineprofit and commodity, for to differn nourishment, and make choice of food; for the tongue is named, as it is indeed, the judge of sweet, of sharp, eager and sowre sapours, namely, when as the juyces of those things which are tasted, come to be mingled and concorporate with the discretive faculty, and not before: But our tenle of fine ling, before we once talte those juyces or sapours, judgeth of the force and quality of every thing, yea, and lenteth them much more exquisitely then all the tasters that give essay before Kings and Princes: As for that which is samiliar and agreeable untous, it received inwardly, but whatfoever is strange and offensive, it rejecteth and sendeth forth, neither will it suffer the same once to touch us, or to offend our taste; but it bewrayeth, accuseth, and condemneth the evil and noisome quality thereof, before it doth us any harm, and otherwise it troubleth us not at all, as it doth you, whom it forceth to mix and compound together for perfumes, cinnamon, nard, spike, lavender, and camomill, malabathum, and the acomatical calamus, or cane of Arabia, medling and incorporating one within another, by the exquinte skill and cunning of the Apothecary and Periumer, forcing drugs and fpices of divers natures to be blended and confected together, and buying for great summes of money one pleasure, which is not beseeming men, but rather fit for fine wenches and dainty damosels, and nothing at all profitable: And yet being thus corrupt as it is, it marreth not only all women, but also the most part of you that are men, infomuch as you will not otherwhiles lie with your own espoused wives unlesse they be perfumed and befineared all over with sweet oyls and oyntments, or else befrewed with odoriferous powders, when they come to company with you: Whereas contrartwife among us, the Sow allureth the Boar, the Doe or the Goat draweth unto her the Buck, and other Females the Males of their kind, by their own fent and fmell, casting from them the pure and neat favour of the meddows, and the verdure of the fields, and to comming together as in marriage for generation, with a kind of mutual love and reciprocal pleasure; neither do the Females hold off and make it dainty, disquising and covering (as it were) their own lust as harlots do, with looking strange and coy at the matter, pretending colourable excuses, or making semblance of refusal, and all to en-chant, entile, and draw on the rather: nor the Males when they come unto them, being pricked with the furious inflinct of luft to generation, do buy either for money, or for great pain and trawel, of for long subjection and servitude, the act of generation; but they perform the same unseignedly, and without deceit in due time and leaton, without any cost, when as nature in the spring fliringth up and provoketh the generative concupiscence of all living Creatures; even as it putteth forth the buds and spronts of plants, and anon delayeth as it were and quencheth the same; for neither the female after the is once sped and hath conceived, seeketh after, the male, nor the male wooeth her any more, nor followeth after her; of so little regard, and small price is this pleasure among us; but nature is all in all, and nothing do we against it : Hereof also icis, that there hath not been known unto this day, any luft fo far to transport brute beafts, as that males should joyn in this act with males, or females with females ; whereas among you, there be many fuch examples, even of such as otherwise were accounted great and worthy personages, for I ler those passe who were of no worth or note to speak of: Even Agamemnon went through all Builtis, chasing and hunting after. Argymus, who fied fecretly from him; mean white he pretended colourable, yet or Argum. falle excuses of his abode there, to wir, the sea, and the winds, and afterwards this fair and goodly Knight, bathed himselfe gently in the pool of Copais, as it were there to quench the hear of his love, and to deliver himselfe from this furious luft. Semblably Hercules pursuing after a young beardlesse Ganymde whom he loved, was left behind the other Gallants and brave Knights that enterprised she voyage for the golden fleece, and so not embarking with them, betrayed the Fleet. Likewise upona fentchion of the lower or vaulted roofe of Apollos Temple, furnamed Proises there was one of you, who secretly wrote this Inscription; Achilles the sair; even after that Achilles himselfe had begotten a fon; and I hear fay, that these letters remain there to be seen even at this day: Now if it chance that a dunghil Cock tread another Cock, when there is no Hen at hand; hee is burnt quick, for that some Wizzard, Soothlayer, or Interpreter of such strange prodigies, will pronounce that it is ominous, and prefageth some evil luck: Thus you see, how men themselves areforced to confesse, that beasts are more continent then they, and that to latisfie and fulfil their lutts, they never violate nor abuse nature; whereas in you it is otherwise: for nature (albeit shee have the help and aid of the law) is not able to keep your intemperance within the limits and bounds of reason; but like unto a violent fream which runneth forcibly, oftentimes, and in many places it worketh outrage, cauling great diforder, feandaland confusion against nature, in this point of carnal love and fleshly lust: for therehave been men who attempted to meddle and deale with shee Goats, with Sows and Mares: as also women who have been as wood, and raging mad after certain beafts of the male kind: and verily, of fuch copulations as these, are come your Minotaures and Ægipanes; yea, and as I verily think, those Sphinxes and Centaures in time past, have been bred by the same means. True it is (I confesse) that otherwhiles, upon necessity and extream famine, a dog hath been known to have devoured a man or a woman, yea, and some fowle hath tasted of their flesh, and begun to eat it; but there was neversound yet any brute beast to have lusted after man or woman, to engender with them; whereas men both in this lust and in many other pleasures; have oftentimes perpetrated outrage upon beafts. Now if they be foundridled, fodifordinate and incontinent in these appetites, much more dissolute they are known to be then beasts in other defires and lusts that be necessary, to wit, in meats and drinks, whereof we never take pleasure, but it is with some profit, but you that seek after the tickling pleasure and delight in drinking and eating, rather then the needful nourishment to content and satisfie nature, are afterwards well punished for it by many grievous and long maladies, which proceed all from one fource, to wit, furfeir and repletion, namely, when you fluff and fill your bodies with all forts of flatulent humours and ventofities, which hardly are purged and excluded forth: for first and formost, each fort of beasts hatha several food and peculiar kind of nourishment; some feed upon grasse, others upon roots, and some there be again which live by fruits: as for those that devour flesh, they never touch any other kind of pasture, neither come they to take from the weaker and more feeble kind, their proper nourture, but suffer them to graze and feed quietly. Thus we see that the Lyon permitteen the Stag and Hind to graze; and the Wosse likewise the Sheep, according to natures ordinance and appoint ment: but man (being through hisdi ordinate appetite of pleatures, and by his gluttony, provoked to all things, talling and affaying what loever he can meet with or hear of, as knowing indeed no proper and natural food of his own) is of all creatures living, he alone that eateth and devourethall things; for first, he feedeth upon flesh, without any need or necessity enforcing him thereto, considering that he may always gather presse, cut and reapfrom plants, vines and seeds, all fort of fruits, one after another in due and convenient seasons, until he be weary again, for the great quantity thereof; and yet for to content his delicate tooth; and upon a loathfome fulneffe of necessary suffenance, he seeketh after other victuals, neither needful nor meet for him, nor yet pure and clean, in killing living creatures, much motecruelly then those savage beasts that live of ravin: for blood and carnage of murdered carcasses is the proper and familiar food for a Kite, a Wolfe, or a Dragon; but unto man it serveth in stead of his dainty dish: and more then fo, man in the use of all sorts of beafts, doth not like other creatures that live of prey, which abstain from the most part, and waste with some small number, even for very necessity of food; for there is neither sowle flying in the air, nor (in manner) any fish swimming in the sea, nor (to speak in one word) any beast feeding upon the face of the earth, that can escape those tables of yours, which you call gentle, kind and hospital. But you will fay, that all this standeth in stead of sance to season your food; be it so: why then doe you kill the fame for that purpole, and for to furnish those your mild and courceous tables?

But the wildom of beafts, far different; for it giveth place to no art what soever, that is vaine and needlesse; and as for those that be necessary, it entertaineth them not as coming from others, nor as taught by mercenary masters for hire and money; neither is it required, that it should have any exercise to glue (as it were, and join after slendermanner) each rule, principle and proposition, one to another; but all at once of it selfe, it yeeldeth them as native and inbred therewith. We hear say, that all the Egyptians be Physicians; but surely every beast hath in it selfe not only the art. and skill to cure and heale it felfe when it is fick, but also is sufficiently instructed how to feed and nourifh it felfe, how to tie her own ftrength, how to fight, how to hunt, how to ftand at defence, yea, and in very mufick they are skilful, each one in that measure as is requisite and besitting the own nature : for of whom have we learned, finding our selves ill at ease, to go into the rivers for to seek for Crabs and Crawfishes? who hath taught the Tortoises, when they have eaten a Viper, to seek cout the herb Organ for to feed upon? who hath shewed unto the Goats of Candie, when they bee That into the body with arrows, to find out the herb Dittamnus, for to feed on it, and thereby to cause the arrow head to come forth and fall from them? For if you say (as the truth is) that nature is the school-Mistresse, teaching them all this, you refer and reduce the wisedom and intelligence of dumb beafts unto the fageft and most perfect cause or principle that is; which if you think you may not call reason, nor prudence, ye ought then to seek out some other name for it, that is better and more honourable: and to say atruth, by effects shee sheweth her pussiance to be greater and more admirable, as being neither ignorant nor ill taught, but having learned rather of it felfe, not by imbecillity and feebleneffe of nature, but contrariwife, through the force and perfection of natural venue, letting go, and nothing at all effeeming that beggerly prudence which is gotten from gotten from other by way of apprentifiage. Neverthelefs, all those things which men either for delicacy or in mirth and pattime, do preient unto them for to learne and to exercise their concein delicacy of an analysis of the second of the bodies; yet fuch is their caand wit withall, how foever they be againft the naturall inclination of the bodies; yet fuch is their caand with withing how wheles follow and trace beautiful the reach thereto and compals the fame throughly. If an nothing how whelps follow and trace beafts by the foot, or how colts practice to fee their iy, 114) notice their pace by measures: but how crowes and ravens will talke and practle, how dogs will leap and dance upon wheeles as they turne round about: also hories and oxen we dogs will reap and dated about filed as any turne found about: also nones and osen we fee in the theaters, how they being taught to couch and to ly down, to dance, to fland upright on their hinder feet, fo wonderfully, that men themselves have enough to doe to performe the on their index consistency and yet this they doe after they have once learned it from others, yea, and remember the feat thereof, only for a proof, if there were nothing elle, that docible they be and aptro learne whatloever a man would have them, fince that all this ferveth for nothing elfe and april realist in the whole world. Now if you be hard of beliefe, and will not be perswaded that we learne the arts, I will say more than so; namely, that we can teach the same: for the odrowen partridges teach their young ones how to run away from before the fowler, and to escape by lying upon their backs, and holding up with their fore feet a clod of earth to hide themselves under it; and seewe not dayly upon the tops of our houses, how the old storks standing by their little ones, traine and teach them how to fly; semblably the nightingals instruct their young birds in tong, infomuch as those which be taken unfledge out of the nest, and are nourished by mans hand, neverafterwards fing so well, because they be had away before their time from schoole, and want their master of musick. For mine own part, after that I was entered into this body I marwalled much at those reasons and discourses of sophisters, who mainteined and pelwaded me beforetime, that all living creatures besides man were without reason and understanding.

You are indeed Gryllus much changed, and you can shew unto us by found demonstrations, that a sheep is reasonable, and an affe hath wit, can you not?

Yes iwis, good Winfer, for even by these very arguments, a man may principally collect and gather, that the nature of the beafts is not altogether void of the use of reason and intelligence: Like as therefore among trees, there is not one more cless destitute of soul, or I mean that which is sensitive) than another, but they be all indifferently and equally void thereof, and not one of them is one jot endued therewith; even so in sensitive) than another, and not one of slow and unaptro learne things of wit and understanding than another; if they were not all partakers of reason and intelligence, although some have the same in more or less measure than others; and sy there be some very blockish and exceeding dull of conceit, consider withall, how the willy compare the fox, and woolse, or the bees with the sheep and the affects it all ones if you should see Polyphemus to your selles or that Homer of Cornub to your grandiather Anospeus; Andyet I think verily, what there is not so great adifference and distance between beaft and beaft, as there be odd in the matter of wisdome, discourse of reason, and use of memory between man and man.

But take heed of one thing Gryllus, that it be not a strange and absurd position, sounding of no probability at all, to attribute any use of reason unto those who have no sence or knowledge at all of God.

What Usffer, shall we not say that you being excellent as you are, were descended from the race of Sifphus, Go?

Whether it be lawfull to eat flesh or no. The former Oration or Treatise. The Summary.

E Loquence was highly efecemed in times past among Greeks and Romans, and therefore, and proper phrasely, red, and a framed betimes in the schooles to discourse well, in good tearmen, and proper phrasely, red, and with pregnant and sound reasons of divers matters; to the end shat when they were come to more years, they mich make proof of their sufficiency in counts and publike assembles of cities, in private consultations and familiar conferences, as it appears to very plainly by the bildren had learned of their schoole-massers therules and precepts nameed Progymnalmata, or the first exercises, they were brought into the auditory of some great profession in Rhetorick; where there were proposed unit them certains themses, gathered out of poets, historians, or the sufficient past of the profession of the content of the country of the phrasely in Rhetorick; where there were proposed unit them certains themses, gathered out of poets, historians, or phiphilosophers, upon which they exercised their stile to write pro and contra, in the defence or confutation of this or that, opinion, according to the measure of their spirit and capacitie, more or less: Those who were more forward, and farther proceeded than the reft, coun'd by heart that which they had poun'd, and pronounced the same afterward in the presence of those that came to hear them: Some of them who were grown to a great measure of knowledge, and as it were in the highest forme of such exercises, were wont to fland forth and answer all questions propounded, disputing and disconfing in praise or dispraise of one and the same thing, as Gorgias, Carneades, and an infinite number of others, are able to make good and verifie. This manner of exercise, named declar ations was practised in Plutar h's time, as may be collected out of divers places of his works: and as these two treatises immediatly following, do sufficiently declare, the which are maimed and imperfect at the very beginning, in the mids two ard the end effecially the fecond: for it may be easily seen that they are fragments of certaine declamations which he wrot for his own exercise when he was a young man. Now albeit they be so corrupt and defettive in manner all thorowout, yet the remnant which is left unto me, doth sufficiently discover the honest occupation and imployment of learned men in those dayes, and the carefull industrie that they had to examine and discuss all things thorowly, to the end that by a diligent conference thereof, the truth might the better appear and be known. And if othermbiles they mainteined certain paradoxes and firange opinions, it was no upon any croff and litigious firm to defend obstinatly all that came into their funtallical brain, but for to augment and increase in themselves an earnest desire to apprehend and understand things better. And homsoever our auther feemeth to be of mind for to defend the opinion of Pythagoras as touching the transmigration of Souls, and the prohibition to eat flesh; yet by other treatifes written with more deliberate, mature and staid judgement, he giveth us to understand, that he is of a contrary opinion; but his principall scopethathe hooteth at seemeth to be a cutting off and abridging of the great excelle and superfluit in purveying the sug, and spending of viands, which in histime began to grow out of all measure; a desorder and enormity which afterwards incressed much more. For to gain and comps is this point, he would feem to possible ment or the opinion of Pythagoras, which mightily cutteth the wings of all riot and wasffull disjounion. Moreover, this onght not to be taken so, as if it favoured and seconded the errour of certain familassicall persons who have condemned the use of Gods good creatures: for in the school of Christ we are taught good lesions, which refute sufficiently the dreames of the Pythagoreans, and resolve assuredly the good conscience of all those that make use of all creatures (meet for the sustentation of this life) oberly & with thanks giving, as knowing them to be good, and their use clean and pure unto those whom the spirit of regeneration hath fantlified, for to make them partakers of that realme which is not shut up and inclosed in meats and drinks. As touching this present tract for the maintenance of Pythagotas his paradox, he alledgeth five reasons: to wit, That the eating of selfs, is a restimonic and signs of inhumanities. That we ought to so-beare it, considering we are not driven upon necessities to feed thereupon; That it is an unnaturall thing; That it burseth foul and body: and for a conclusion; That men will never carry themselves and converse modestiftogether, if they learn not first to be pitifull and kinde evento the very dumb beasts.

Of eating Flesh.

Whether it be lawfull to eat flesh or no. I be former Oration or Treatise.

But you demand of me, for what cause Pythágoras absteined from eating flesh? And I again do marvell, what affection, what manner of courage, or what motive or reason had that man, who first approached with his mouth unto a flaine creature, who durst with his lips once touch the flesh of abeast either killed or dead; or how he could finde in his heart to be served at his table with the dead bodies, and as a man may fay, very idols, to make his food and nourishment of those parts and members which a little beforedid bleat, low, bellow, walke and see. How could his eyes endure to behold fuch murder and flaughter, whiles the poore beafts were either flicked or had the throats cut, were flayed and different bow could his note abide the fmell and fent that came from them? how came it that his tast was not cleane marred and overthrowenwith horrour, when he came to handle those uncouth fores and ulcers, or receive the bloud and humours, issuing out of the deadly wounds.

The skins now flaied, upon the ground did spraule, The flesh on spits did bellow still and low: Roaft, fod and raw, did cry afwell as craule, And yield a voice of living oxe or com.

But this, you will fay, is a loud lie, and a meer poeticall fiction; howbeit, this was certeinlya-frange and monstrous supper, that any man should hunger after those beasts, and defire to act them whiles they still keepe a owing; to prescribe also, and teach men how they should feed of those creatures which live and criefill; to ordeine likewise, how they ought to be dressed, boiled, or roafted, and ferved upon the board.

But he who first invested their monstrosities, ought to be inquired after, and not he who last gave over & rejected the same. Or a man may well say, that those who at the first began to eat flesh, had all just causes so to do, in regard of their want and necessitie: for surely, it was not by reason of disordinate and enormous appetite which they used a long time, nor upon plenty and abundance of necessary things, that they grew to this infolency, to seeke after strange pleasures, and those contrary to nature. But verily, if they could recover their fenses and speech again, they might well fay now, O how happy and well beloved of the gods are you, who live in these dayes !in what a world and age are you born! what affluence of all forrs of good things do you enjoy! what harvefts, what flore of fruits yeeldeth the earth unto you!how commodious are the vintages!and what riches do the fields bring unto you! what a number of trees and plants do furnish you with delights and pleasures, which you may gather and receive, when you think good! you may live (if you list) in all manner of delicacy, without once fouling your hands for the matter; whereas our hap was to be born in the hardest time and most terrible age of the world, when as we could not choose but incur by reason of the new creation of all things) a great want and threight indigence of many necessaries: the face of the heaven and skie was still covered with the aire; the stars were dusked with troubled and initable humors, together with fire and temperations winds: the Sun was not yet ferled and established, having a constant and certainerace to hold his course in,

From East to West, to make both even and morne Distinct, nor ly reurne from Tropiques twaine; The feafons chang'd from those that were beforne, Bedight with leaves, with flowers, with fruits and graine.

The earth suffered wrong by the inordinate streames and inundations of rivers, which had neither certain chanels nor banks: much of it lay wast and deformed, with loughs, marishes, and deepe boggs; much also remained savage, being over-spred with wild woods and fruit es forrests, it brought forth no fruits ripe and pleasant; neither were there any tools and instruments belonging to any art; nor so much as any invention of a witty head. Hunger never gave us ease or time of repole; neither was there any expectation or waiting for the yeerely leasons of leedness, for there was no fowing at all. No marvell therefore, if we did eat the flesh of beasts and tiving creatures even contrary to nature, confidering that then the very mossand bark of trees served for food; and well * exernor was he who could finde any green grass or quick coich, or so much as the root of the herb , Phleos: @Aosis, but when foever men could meet with acorns and mast to tast and feed upon they would dance and which hop for 100 y about an oak or beech tree; & in their rusticall songs call the earth their bountiful mo- whe barks, a whom they have the week of the country of the barks. ther & their kind purferand fuch a day as that onely they accounted feftivallial their life before was find of vexation, forrow and heavinefs. But now, what rage, what fury and madnels inciteth you to ships the commit such murders and carnage, seeing you have fuch fore and plenty of all things necessary for Those the commit such murders and carnage, seeing you have fuch fore and plenty of all things necessary for Those theorem. committee mutures and carriage, seeing you have but note and pienty of altrings necessary for your life? Why belie you the earth, and most unthankfully diffenous res, is flee could not fuffein and nourifu you? why doe you violate the divine power of Ceres the inventrels of facted lawes, and the grow. shame sweet and gracious Barchus, as if these two deities gave you not sufficient whereupon you only in the might live? what lare you not abashed to mingle at your tables pleasant fruits with bloudy murder? lake Orcho You call lions and libards savage beasts; mean while your selves are steined with bloudshed, giving Becords, and no place to them in cruelty; for where as they do worry & kill other beafts, it is for very necessity and therefore need of food; but you do it for dainty fare; for when we have flaineither lions or wolves in defence and for the leaves to four telves we get them not but less them lied by them have to of our selves we ear them not but let them lie: But they be the innocent, the harmles, the gentle and like it to be tame creatures, which have neither teeth to bite, nor prick to fling with all, which we take and kill, Red. although nature feemeth to have created them, onely for beauty and delight: [Much like as if a man Can taile. feeing Nilus over-flowing his banks, and filling all the countrey about with running water, which is generative& fruitfull, would not praise with admirationthe property of that river, causing to spring . Itee no and grow fo many fair and goodlyfruits, and the same so necessary for mans life; but if he chance howthis that to ejpy a trocodil swimning, or an aspick creeping and gliding down, or some venemous slie, within the huttfull and noisome beasts all, blameth the said river upon that occasion, and saith that they marked to be causes sufficient, that of necessity he must complaine of the thing: Or verily, when one supplements and and changing country with good and beautifull suris changed and an anterior market in ma feeing this land and champian country overspred with good and beautifull fruits, charged also and re-marter in hand I supplenished with ears of corn, should perceive casting hiseie over those pleasant corn fields, hereand pole there. there are ar of darnel, choke-ervil or fome inch unhappy weed among, should thereupon forbeare forest is into respe and carry in the faid corn, and forgoe the benefit of a plentifull harveft, and finde fault therewith: Semblably frandeth the case when one seeth the plea of an orator in any cause or action, who with a full and forcible streame of eloquence, endeavoureth to save his client out of the danger, of of form death, or otherwite to prove and verifie the charges and imputations of certainecrimes; this o- ther books, ration (I fav) or eloquent speech of his running not simply and nakedly but carrying with it many and fundry affections of all forts, which he imprinteth in the minds and hearts of the hearers or judges, which being many also, and those divers and different, he is to turn, to bend and change or otherwise, to dulce appeale and stay; if he I say should anon pass over and not consider the principal iffue, and main point of the cause, and buse himselfe in gathering some by speeches besides the purpole, or haply ome phrases improper and impertment, which the oration of some advocate with the flowing course thereof hath carried down with it, lighting thereupon, and falling with the rest of his speech. But we are nothing moved either with the faire and beautifull colour, or the sweet and tunable voice or the quickness and subtilty of spirit, or the neat and clean life, or the vivacitie of wit and understanding of these poore tilly creatures; and for a little peece of flesh we take away their life, we bereave them of the fun and of light, cutting short that race of life which nature had limited and prefixed for them; and more than forthose lamentable and trembling voices which thy utter for feare, we suppose to be intriculate or unsignificant founds, and nothing less than pitifull prayers. supplications; pleaes and justifications of these poor innocent creatures, who in their language, every one of them cry in this manner: If thou be forced upon necessity, I beseech thee not to lave my life: but if disordinate lust moove thee thereto, spare me: in case thou hast a mind simply to eat on my flesh, kill me: but if it be for that thou wouldest feed more delicatly, hold thy hand and let me live. O monstrous cruelty! It is a horrible sight to see the table of rich men onely stand served and furnished with viands fet out by cooks and victuallers that dress the flesh of dead bodies; but most horrible it is to see the same taken up, for that the reliques and broken meats remaining, be far more than that which is eaten: To what purpose then were those filly beasts slaine? Now there be others, who making spare of the viand served to the table, will in no hand that they should be cut or fliced; sparing them when as they be nothing but bare flesh; whereas they spared them not whiles they were living beafts: But forasmuch as we have heard that the same men hold and say: That nature hath directed them to the eating flesh; it is plaine and evident, that this cannot accard with mans nature: And first and formost this appeareth by the fabrick and composition of his body; for it resembleth mone of those creatures whom nature hath made to feed on flesh, confidering they have neither hooked bil, no hauk-pointed tallants, they have no sharp and rough teeth, nor stomack so strong, or so hot breath and spirit, as to be able to concost and disgest the heavy maffe of raw flesh : And if there were naught else to be alledged, nature her-selse by the broadneffe and united equallity of our teeth, by our small mouth, our soft tongue, the imbecillity of naturall hear, and spirits serving for concoction, sheweth sufficiently that she approveth not of mans ulage to eat flesh, but dissavoreth and disclaimeth the same; And if you obstinately maintaine and defend, that nature hath made you for to eat fuch viands; then, that which you mind to eat first, kill your felfe, even your own felfe (I fay) without using any blade, knife, bat, club, axe, or hatchet: And even as beares, lions, and woolves, flay a beatt according as they mean to eat it; even so kill thou a beefe, by the bit of thy teeth; flay me a swine with the help of thy mouth and jawes; tearein peeces a lambe or anhare with thy nailes; and when thou halt fo don, eat it up while it is alive, like as beafts do ; but if thou statest untill they be dead ere thou eat them, and are abashed to chase with thy teeth the life that presently is in the flesh which thou eatest; why dost thou against nature eat that which had life? and yet, when it is deprived of life, and fully dead, there is no man hath the heart to eat the same as it is; but they cause it to be boiled, and to be rosted; they alter it with fire, and many drugges and spices, changing, disguising, and quenching (as it were) the horror of the murder, with a thousand devices of leasoning; to the end that the sence of tasting being beguiled and deceived by a number of sweet sauces and pleasant conditure, might admit and receive that which it abhorreth, and is contrary unto it. Certes it was a prety conceit which was reported by a Laconian, who having bought in his Inne or hoftelry, a little fifth, gave it, as it should seem, to the Inkeeper for to be dreffed; but when he called unto him for viniger, cheefe, and oyle to do it withall: If (quoth the Laconian) I had that which thou demandest of me, I would never have bought this fish. But we contrariwise, for to please our delicate tooth, are so delighted in slaughter and carnage the flesh we call our viands and yet then we have need of other viands for the very dressing of flesh itselfe, mixing and adding thereto, oyle, wine, hony, the prickle or sauce garum and vineger, embalming (as it were) and burying a dead corps with Syriack spices and Arabick sauces. And verily, when our flesh meats after this manner be mortified, made tender, and in some sort putrified, our natural heat hath much adoe to concoct the same, and being not able indeed to digest them perfectly, it ingendereth in us dangerous heaviness and crudities aprto breed diseases. Diogenes upon a time was fo rash, that he durst eat a polype or pourcuttle fish all raw, because he would have taken away the use and help of fire in dressing such meats: and there being certaine priests and many other men standing about him, when he covered his head with his cloak, and put the flesh of the faid poulpe into his mouth, he faid unto them all; For your take it is that I hazard my felfe thus as I doe, and adventure this jeopardy. Now by Jupiter, this was a proper perill in deed, and a douty danger, was it not? for this Philotopher here exposed not himselfe to any perilous hazard, as Pelopidas did, for recovery of the Thebans liberty:nor as Armodini and Arisfogiton, for the freedome of Athens: who thus wrestled with a raw poulpe fish in his stomack, and all to make the life of man more beafflike and favage. Well then plaine it is that the eating of flesh is not onely unnaturall in regard of the body, but also by repletion, full ness and satietie, it maketh the soulstat and grosses for the drinking of wine and seeding upon flesh meats to the full, how so ever it may seem to cause the body to be more able and strong, yet surely the mind it doth enseeble and weaken. And lest I should be thought a professed enemie to those who practise the exercise of the body named Athletica, I will use the domesticall examples of mine own country; for the inhabitants of Attica do tearme us of Baotia, fat-backs, groffe and fenfeleffe, yea, and blockish fors, principally for our ranke and large feeding; like as one faid:

Of truth these men, in judgement mine, Be nothing els but franked swine. And as Menander wrote in one place: With fas their cheeks be puft and swolne : See, fee, their chaps how they be blone.

As also Pindarus: They ply their jawes, they feed amaine,

That even their cheeks do some againe.

But according to Heraelinus, the dry toul scemeth to be wisest: for know thus much moreover; that empty tunnes, pipes, orbarrels, relound when they be knocked upon; whereas if they be full, they answer not again to the knocks or stroaks given them: braffe pannes or coppers which be thin and flender, render founds, and ring all about untill fuch time as one come and with his hand feem to flop and dull the stroak that otherwise went round about: The eye filled with superfluous humidity, becometh dim and dark, neither hath it the full strength and power to performe his office. When we behold the sun through a moist aire, and a number of thick mists, and grosse undigested vapors, we see him not in his own nature pure, cleer, and bright; but as it were in the bottom of a cloud, all duskish, and casting forth thick wandring and dispersed beames: And even fo through a body troubled with vapors, full fed, overcharged with nutriments, of unkind and to through a body strannot chute but all the light and shining brightness of the soul which is naturally should become dusked and troubled, having no radiant selled splendour, able to peirce throughly to the ends and externities of subrile and time objects, hardly to be discerned, but the same is wandering, unfleady, and dispersed.

But setting all these matters aside, is it not, think you, a right commendable thing to be acquainted and accultomed to humanity? for who would ever finde in his heart to abule and wrong a man, who is affectionate, gentle, and milde, to the very beatls which are of a strange kind from us, and have no communication of reason with us? Three dayes agoe, I alledged and cited in my disputation a testimony of Xenocra esto this purpose; and namely: How the Athenians condemned him to paya round fine, who had flayed a quick Ram: And in very truth, he that tormenteth and putteth to pain one that is living, is not in my conceit worse than he that taketh the life away and killeth him: Howbeit, as far as I can fee, more fense and feeling we have of fuch things as be unusuall and against custome, than unnaturall and contrary unto kind: But those reasons which I then delivered, smell haply of some grosinels, and were too triviali; for I fear and am loath to touch and fer abroch in these my discourses, that great and high principle, that deep and mystical cause of this our position: That we ought not to eat flesh; for that I say the hidden secret and original thereof is so incredible to base and timorous persons, as Platosaith, and to such as savour of nothing but of earthly & mortall matters; and herein I fare much like the Pilot and mafter of the ship, who in a tempest is afraid to put his ship to sea; or unto a Poet, who dareth not set up his sabrick or engin in the theater, all while the stage or page ant is turned and carried round about: And ver peradventure it were not amisse in this place to retound and pronounce aloud those verses of Empedocles,  *. For under covert tearmes he doth allegorize and give us to understand; that the peasetts, it is the state of th And yet this seemeth to be an opinion more ancient than Empedocles: for those sections of Poets as touching the dismembring of Bacchus, and the outragious attempts of the Tyrants against him. and how they tafte of flesh murdered, as also of their punishment, and how they were finiten with lightning, they be meere sables: the hidden methologie whereof, tendeth to that renovation of birth or refurrection : for furely that , brutish and reasonlesse part of our soul which is violent, disordered, and not divine, but divelish and damoniack, the auncient philosophers called Titans; and this is that which is tormented, and suffereth judicial punishment.

Of eating Flesh.

The second Declamation.

The Summary.

Ur author pursuing in this second Treatise his matter and proposition, which he broched and began in the former declamation; and acknowledging how gournandse, gluttony, and evill custome be dangerous counsellers; yet graunteth and agreeth in the end, that a man may cat slesh, upon certaine conditions which he doth specifies condemning withall, the cruellexcesse and riot of many in their fare. After this having showed by the example of Lycurgus, that we ought to cut off the first occasions of all super-shirter, he conferres h the opinions of Pythagoras and Empedocles, with those of other philosophers, and therewith setteth down his own conceit and advice. Afterwards when he haden one word touched, from whence, and whereupon men become so bold and hardy to eas sless he declareth a fresh and provets, that this minner of feeding doth wonderfully presindice both body and soul. And in conclusion, be confuteth the Stoicks, opposite enemies to the doltrine of Pythagoras; leaving this resutation unperfect, were it that himselfe never finished it, or that the malice and iniquitie of the time hath deprivedus thereof: Like as many other fragments missing in these words.

Of eating Flesh.

The second Declamation.

Eason would, that we should be fresh disposed, and ready in will, in mind, and thought, tended wound that we from the first appears and teach in this in the mought, to hear the difcourie against this multy and unfavor custome of earing sich For hard it is, as Cato was wont to say, to preach unto the belly that hath no ears; and besides we have all drunk of the cup of custome, resembling that of Circe, which

Compounded is of dalors, griefer and paines,
Of forrowes, weet, and of deceitfull traines.
Neither is it any easie matter for them to cast up againe the hooke of the appetite to eat flesh, who have swallowed it down into their entrals, and are transported and full of the love of pleasures. and delights: But well and happy it were for us, if, as the manner is of the Aegyptians, to foon as men are dead, to paunch them, and when their belly and bowells betaken forth, to mangle, cut and flice the same against the sun, and then to fling them away, as being the cause of all sinnes that they have committed: so we would first cut away from our selves all our gourmandise, gluttony, and murdering of innocent creatures, that we might alterwards lead the reft of our life pure and holy; considering that it is not the belly it selfethat by murder defileth us; but polluted it is by our intemperance. But say, it is not in our power to effect thus much, or be it, that upon an inveterate cultome, we are assamed in this point to be innocent and saukless; yet let us at least wise commit finnein measure, and transgress with reason: Let us I say eat flesh, but so, as we be driven thereto for very hunger, and not drawn to it by a licorous tooth, to fatisfie our necessitie, and not to feed our greedy and delicate humour kill we a beaft, howbeit with fome griefe of heart, with fome com-miferation and pitty and nor of a proud and infolent spirit, ne yet of a murderous mind: as mendo now adayes, after many and divers forts: For some in killing of swine or porkets, thrust them in with red-hot spits; to the end that the bloud being shed and quenched as it were by the tindure of the first income of the first iron, running through the body, might cause the slesh for soot to be more tender and delicate: ye shall have others leap upon the udders and paps of the poore sowes ready to farrow, and trample upon their bellies and teats with their feet, that the bloud, the milk, and the congealed bag of the young piggs, knit within the dammes womb, being all jumbled, confued and blended together, even amidde the painfull pangs of farrowing (O Jupiter Piacularis) they might make (I would not els) a most dainty dish of meat, and devour the most corrupt and putrified part of the Owner not easy more are who have a device to flitch and fow up the eyes of cranes and iwannes, and when they have io don, to mew them up in a darke place, and io feed them, cromming them with strange compositions and pattes made of dried figgs; but wot you why? because their flesh should be more dainty and pleasant: whereby it appeareth evidently, that it is not for need of nou-rishment, nor for want and necessity; but even for saciety; wantonness, sumptuous curiosity, and superstuous excess, that of horrible injustice and wickedness, they make their pleasure and delight: and like as the filthy lecherous person, who is unsatiable in the pleasure of women, after he hath affaied many, runneth on headlong still, roving and ranging every way, and yet his unbridled and untamed luft is not yet satisfied, but he salleth to perpetrate such horrible villanies as are not once to be named; even so intemperance in meats, when it hath passed once the bounds of nature, and limits of necessity, proceedeth to outrage and cruelty, searching all means how to vary and change the difordinate appetite; for the organs and infiruments of our fenies, by a fellow-feeling and contagion of maladies, are affected one by another, yea, and run into disorder and sinne together, through intemperance, when they rest not contented with the measure assigned them by nature: Thus the hearing being out of frame and fick, or not guided by reason, marreth mufick; the feeling when it is degenerate into an effeminate delicacy, feeketh filthilyafter wanton ticklings, touchings, frictions and handling of wom en: the same vice of intemperance hath taught the eyelight not to be contented with beholding morisks, pirrhick, or warlike dances, nor other laudable and decent gestures, ne yet to see and view faire pictures and goodly statues, but to esteem the death and murder of men, their mortall wounds, bloudy fights, and deadly combats, to bethe belt sights and spectacles that can be devised. And hereupon it is, that upon such excessive fareand fuperfluiry at the table, there enfue ordinarily wanton loves; upon lechety and filthy venery, there followeth beaftly talk; these baudy ballads and slinking tales, be accompanied commonly with hideous fights, and monstrous shewes: lastly, these horrible spectacles have attending upon them, cruelty, and humane impaffibility, even in the cases to very mankind. Hereupon it was that Lycureus the divine law-giver, in those three ordinances of his which he called Rhetre, commanded that the doors, roufes and finials of houses, should be made with the saw and the ax onely, and no other instrument besides there employed; which he did not, I assure you, for any hatred at all that he conceived against augers, wimbles, twibils, or other tools for joyners or carvers work; but he knew well enough, that a man would never bring among such simple frames a guilded beadstead, nor venture to carry into an house fo plainly built, filver tables, hangings, carpets and coverings of rich tapeffrie died with purple, or any precious stones; and he with full wellsthat with furth an hone, with such beadstids, tables and cups, a irugall supper and a simple dinner would agree and fortbest. For to say a truth, upon the beginning and foundation of a difordinate diet, and superfluous kind of life; all manner of delicacy and costly curiofity useth to follow;

Like as the sucking soales, alway

Runner with the damme, and doth not stay.

What supper then, is not to be counted sumptuous, for which there is evermore killed some living creature or other stor do we think little of the dispense of soult and suppose we, that the loss of life is not costly? I do not say, that it was peradventure the foul of a mother, a father, some friend, or a ionne, as Empidocles gave it out; but jurely a foulendued with fenfe, with feeing, hearing, apprehenfrom, understanding, wit and diferetion, such as nature hath given to each living creature, inflicient to feeke and get that which is good for it, and likewife to avoid and shun whatloever is hunfull and contrary to it. Confider now a little, whether those philosophers that teach and will us to eat our children, our friends, our fathers and wives when they are dead, do make us more gentle and fuller of humanity, than Pythagoras and Empedocles, who accultome and acquaint us to be kind and juff, even to other creatures. Well, you mock and laugh at him that maketh conficience to eat of a mutton; and shall not we (lay they) laugh a good and make sport when we see one cutting and chopping pieces of his father or mother being dead, and lending away some thereof to his friends who are absent, and inviting such as be present and neer at hand, to come & make merry with the rest, causing such joints and pieces of flesh to be served up to the table, without any spare at all? But it may be, that we offend now, and commit some fault in handlling these books, having not beforehand cleansed our hands, mundified our eyes, purified our feet, and purged our ears; unless perhaps this be their clenfing and expiation, to devise and discourse of such things with sweet and pleasant words, which as Plato faith, wash away all salt and brackish hearing: but if a man should fet these books and arguments in parallell opposition or comparision one with another; he would judge that some of them were the Philosophy of the Scythians, Tartarians, Sagidians, and Melanchlanians, of whom when Herodotus writeth, he is taken for a lier; and as for the sentences and opinions of Pythagoras and Empedocles, they were the very lawes, ordinances, statutes, and judgements of the auncient Greeks, according to which they framed their lives, to wit: That there were between us and brute beafts certaine common rights: who were they then, that afterwards otherwise ordeined?

Even they who first of row and feet,

mischievous swortd did forge:

And of poore labouring ox at plough, began to cut the gorge.

Eor even thus also began tyrants to commit, murders; like as at the first in old time, they killed at Athers one notorious and most wicked sycophant, named Epitedeius; so they did by a second, and likewisela third: now the Athenians being thus acquainted to see men put to death; saw afterwards Niceratus the tonne of Nicias murdered; Theramenes also the great commander and captaine generall; yea and Polemarchus the philosopher. Semblably men began at first to eat the flesh of some favage and hurtfull beaft, then some fouls and fish were snared and caught with nets, and confequently cruelty (being fleshed as it were exercised and innred in these and such like slaughters) proceeded even to the poor labouring ox, to the filly sheepe that doth clad and trim our bodies, yea, and to the house-cock and thus men by little and little augmenting their inlatiable greediness, never staied untill they came to man-slaughter, to murder, yea, and to bloudy battels. But if a man cannot prove nor make demonstration by found reasons, that souls in their resurrections and new nativities meet with common bodies; so as that which now is reasonable, becometh afterwards reasonless, and likewise that which at this present is wild and savage, commeth to be by another birth and regeneration, tame and gentle againe; and that nature transmuteth and translateth all bodies, dislodging and replacing the soul of one inanother,

Are not these reasons yet at least wise sufficient to reclaime and divert men from this unbridled intemperance of murdring dumb beafts? namely, that it breedeth maladies, crudities, heaviness and indigestion in the body, that it marreth and corrupteth the foul, which naturally is given to the contemplation of high and heavenly things? to wit, when wee have taken up a wont and custome, not to least a friend or stranger who commeth to visit us, unless wee shed bloud; and cannot celebrate a marriage dinner or make merry with our neighbours and friends without committing murder? And albeit the (aid proof and argument of the transmigration of soules into fundry bodies, be not sufficiently declared, so as it may deserve to be credited and believed; yet surely the conceitand opinion thereof, ought to worke some scruple and feare in our hearts, and in some sort hold us in and stay our hands. For like as when two armies encounter one another in a night battle; if one chaunce to light upon a man fallen upon the ground, whose body is all covered and hidden with armour, and present his sword to cut his throat, or run him through, & therewith heare another crying unto him that he knoweth not certeinly but thinketh and supposeth that the party lying along is his brother his fon his father, or tent -fellow; whether were it better, that he giving eare & credit to this conjecture and suspicion (falle though it be) should spare and forbear an enemie for a friend, or rejecting that which had no sure and evident proofe, kill one of his friends in stead of an enemie? I suppose there is not one of you all but will say, that the latter of these were a most grosse and leud part. Behold moreover Merope in the tragedy when she litteth up her ax for to strike her own some, taking him to be the murderer of her some, and laying withall:

what a flir and trouble five maketh over all the theater? how the caufeth the haire to fland upright upon the heads of the spectators for feare leaft five floudd prevent the old man who was about to take hold other arme, and to would the guildels young man her some? But it preadventure in this case there should have stood another aged man sait by, crying unto her: Strike hardly, for it is your enemie, and a third contrariwise, saying: Strike not in any wise, it is your own some; whether had been the greater and more gievous sinne, to let go the revenge ent of her enemie for doubt that he was her some or to commit filicide and murder her some indeed, for the anger she bare unto her enemie? When as therefore there is neither hatted not anger that driveth us to do a murder; when neither revenge, nor feare of our own safety and life mooved hus, bureven for our pleasure we have a poore sheep lying under our hand with the throat turned upward, a philosopher of the one side should say: Cut the throat, for it is a brute beast, and another admonsh us on the other side, saying: stay your hand and take heed whay you do; for what know you to the contrary, whether in that sheepe be the soul lodged of some kinsman of yours, or peradventure of some God? Is the danger (before God) all one and the same, whether I result to eat of the sless, or believe not that I kill my child or some one of my kinstolk?

But furely the Stoicks are not equally matched in this fight for the defence of eating flesh: For what is the reason that they so band themselves, and be so open mouthed in the maintenance of the belly and the kitchin? what is the cause that condemning pleasure as they do, for an effeminate thing, and not to be held either good or indifferent, no nor fo much as familiar and agreeable to nature, they stand so much in the patronage of those things that make to the pleasure and delight of feeding? And yet by all confequence, reason would, that considering they chase and banish from the table, all sweet persumes and odoriserous ointments, yea, and all pastery worke, and banqueting junkets, they should be rather offended at the sight of bloud and fless. But now, as if by their precise philosophicall rules, they would controule our day-books and journals of our ordinary expences, they cut off all the cost bestowed upon our table in things needless and superfluous; mean while they find no fault with that which favoureth of bloudshed and cruelty in this superfluitie of table furniture: We do not indeed, (say they) because there is no communication of rights between beafts, and us; but a man might answer them again very well: No more is there between us and perfumes or other forraine and exoticall fauces, and yet you would have us to abstein from them, rejecting and blaming on all fides, that which in any pleasure is neither profitable nor needfull. But let us I pray you consider upon this point a little neerer, to wit, whether there be any community, in right and justice, between us and unreasonable creatures or no? and let us do it not fubtilly and artificially, as the captious manner is of these sophisters in their disputations? but rather after a gentle and familiar fort, having an eye unto our own passions and affections, let us reason and decide the matter with our selves.

That a Man cannot live pleasantly according to the Doctrine of Epicurus.

The Summary.

Reat disputations there have been holden among the Philosophers and Sages of the world, as touchmong us; and yet neither one mor other, as it may appear even at this day by the books that are extent among us; and yet neither one mor other, have hit the true mark whereat they shorts wit The right knowledge of God: Howbeit, some of them are agreat deale farther out of the way than others is and namely the Epicureaus, whome our author dath perspringe in many places, as holding a doctrine cleane contrary unto theirs, according as his writings docessing, and ford much as Epicurus and his descripte placed and established this sourceigne good, in pleasure of the body; the their opinion is here examined and confurted at large; for in some of a dialague Plutarch reherseth the communication or reference which he had with Aristodemus, Zeuxippus, and Theon, as they wasked together immediatly after one letture of his wont his mater, who howing showed in generall tearners the also assigned of this Epicurian doctrine, minimisting this not word. That it is no life at all to live according to the same. Then heexplaineth and showeth what the Epicureaus mean by this word. To live: and from thence proceeded horward to refuse their imagination, and what sover dependent the respondent that by source and proper similisides for the purpose: After he had proved that they were deceived themselves, and seduced their disciples i he holdesh moreover this point: That even they deprive themselves of the true good, which consistent he repose and contentment of the mind, resetting (as they do) all Histories, Mathematicall arrst and liberat sciences, and among the rest Poetry and Musick; shewing throughout all this discourses, that such profess the true of the most science. Possible of the most science is the holdest and maintained the true the true of the science of the scienc are deprived of common sence. Pessing forward, he holdeth and maintaineth that the foul taketh joy in a contentment proper to it selfe : and afterwards in discoursing to the pleasure that active life doth bring; he refuteth more and more his adversary, addressing to this purpose, a certain conference and comparison between the pleasures of body and foul; whereby a man may see the misery of the one, and the excellency of the other. This point he enricheth with divers examples; the endwhereof sheweth: That there is nothing at all to be counted great or profitable in the schoole of Epicutus, whose scholers never durst approve his opinion, especially in death: also: That vertuous men have without all comparison much more pleasure in this world, than the Epicureans, who in their afflictions know not how to receive any joy or comfor by remembrance of their pleafures pelf. And this is the very summe of the dialogue during the time that the above named persons did malke; who after they were set, began their disputations a fresh, and spake in the first place, of Gods providence, condemning by divers reasons the atheism of the Epicureans, who are altogether inexculable, even in comparison of the common sort given to superstition: communing and bot-ding on this discourse, he depainteth very lively the nature of the Epicureans, and commeth to represent and (et down the contentment that men of honour have in their religion; where also he holdeth this point That God is not the author of evilli & that the Epicureans are sufficiently punished for their impiety in depriving themselves of that pleasure which commeth unto us by meditation of the divine wisdome, in the conduct and management of all things. Consequently he sheweth that this their prophane philosophy overthroweth and confoundethall persons, as well in their death as during their life: Whereupon he proceedeth to treat of the immortality of the soul, and the life to come; describing at largethe misery of the Epicureans: and for a final conclusion, he comprises in fower or five lines the summary of all their error, and so shutter buy and conclude to the whole disputation.

Olotes one of the disciples, and familiar followers of Epicurus wrot and published a book wherein he endeavoured to prove and declare: That there was no life at all to speak of according to the opinions and sentences of other Philosophers. Now as touchingthat which readily came into my mind for the answer of his challenge and discourse against his reasons in the desence of other Philosophers, I have before-time put down in writing, but forasmuch as after the lecture and disputation of this matter ended, there passed many speeches in our walke against that sect: I thought it good to collect and gather the same, yea, and to reduce them into a written treatile; if for nothing els, yet for this cause, to give them at least wise to underfland who are foready to note, censure and correct others, that a man ought to have heard and read with greatheed and diligence (and not superficially) the works and writings of those whom he with greatheed and diligence (and not inperticulty) the works and writings of those whom he taketh upon him to reprove and refute, and not to pick one word out here and another there, or to take hold of his words delivered by way of talk and conference, and not couched and fet down precisely in writing, thereby to repell and drive away the ignorant and fuch as have no knowledge of those things. For when as we walked forth, after the lecture (as our manner was) out of the schoole into the common, place of exertife, Zeuxppu moving speech, began in this wise: Me thinks (quoth he) that this discourse hath been delivered much more middly and gently than becomest frankesse and like two these reasons. than becommeth franknesse and liberty of speech beseeming the schooles; which is the reason that Heraclides and his followers be departed from us, as discontented and displeased, yea, and much more bitterly nipping and checking us (without any cause given on our part) than either Epicarus or Metrodorus. Then Theon: Why said you not (quoth he) that Colores (in comparifon of them) is the most modest and fairest spoken man in the world? For the most foule and reprochfull tearms that can be devised for to raile and flander withall, to wit, of facrileges, scurrilities, vanities of speech, talkative babbling, glorious and vanting arrogancy, whoremonging, murders, counterfeit hypocrites, confiners, curfed creatures, heavy headed, brainfick, redious, and making their brains ake who read them : theie (I say) they have raked up together, and difcharged as it were haile-shot upon Arstotle, Socrates, Pythagoras, Protagoras, Theophrastes, Heraclides, Hipparchus, and whom not of all the most renowned and principall Philosophers? infuch fort, that how well and witely foever they have carried themselves otherwise, yet in regard of their foule mouthes, slanderous speeches, and beastly backbitings, they deserve to be sequestred farre off and pur out of the ranke and number of wite men and Philosophers: for envy, emulation and jealousie ought not to enter into this divine dance and heavenly quire: being so weake and imporent, that they cannot diffemble and hide their griefe and discontent. Hereat Arifindemus: Heraclides (quoth he) who by profession is a Gramarian, in the behalfe of all the poeticall rabble (for fo it pleaseth the Epicureans to blason them) and for all the foolish and fabulous vanities of Homer, hath well requited Epicurus; or because Metrodorus in so many places of his writings hath reviled and abused that prince of poets: but as for them (O Zenxippus) let them go as they are: and whereas it was objected in the beginning of the speech against those men: That there was no living at all after their precepts and rules, why do not we our felves, alone by our felves, taking unto us Theon for our affociate (because this man here is weary) go in hand to profecute the fame thorowly? Then Theon made him this answer :

This combate kath before us, been Perform'd by others, well I ween.

And therefore propouding to our felves (if it please you) another marke and scope to aime at, let us (for to be revenged of the injurie done unto other Philosophers) proceed after this forme of proceffe, and affay to prove and shew (if it be possible) that according to the doctrine even of these Epicureans, men cannot live in joy and pleasure. Say you so ? (quoth I then, and laughed heartily withall) now furely, me thinks you are leapt upon their bellies, and be ready to trample them with both your feet: certes, you shall enforcethese men to fight for their very own flesh if you bereave them of pleasure: who do nothing else but cry out and sing this note:

We are in deed no champions brave, In fight with fifts no grace we have, neither are we eloquent orators, wile magistrates or prudent governours and rulers of cities or States,

But for to feast and make good cheere, To eat and drink, we have no peere.

We love(I say) to banquet alwayes and make merry, to give our selves contentment and all the delightfull motions and pricks of the flesh, it haply any pleasure and joy hereby may be transmitted and tent into the soul: so as you seem to me not to deprive these men of joy and solace onely, but also of their very life, in case you do not leave them a pleasant and jocund life. How then? (quoth Theon) if you think so well of this subject matter, why do not you set in hand to it at this present? For mine own part (faid he again) content I will be to heare you, and answer again, if you requel so much; but begin you first to set us in the train thereof, for I will yeeld unto you the superiority and presidence of this disputation. Now when Theon seemed to pretend some small excuse; Aristodemus: O what a compendious, ready, faire and plaine way (quoth he) have you cut us off, for to come unto this point, in not permitting us first to make inquisition into this Epicurean sect, and to put them to their triall astouching vertue and honesty! for it is no easie matter, nay, it is unpossible to drive these men from a pleasant and voluptuous life, so long as they suppose and set down this:

That the supreame end of all humane selicity, lieth in pleasure; whereas, if we could once have brought this about: That they lived not honefuly; presently and withall, they had been put by their pleafant life; for they themselves consels; and say, That a man can not live in joy, unless been honest, for that the one may not stand without the other. As touching that point (quoth Theon) we will not stick in the progress of our discourse, to handle it, butfor the present, we will take that which they grant, and make our use of it; this therefore they hold: That the sovereigne good whereof we speak, consisteth in the belly and parts thereabour, as also in those other passages and conduits of the body, thorow which, pleasure entreth into it, and no pain at all: and they are of opinion, that all the fine devices, subtill and witty inventions in the world were put in triall and practifed, for to please and content the belly, or at least wife, for the good hope that the should enjoy contentment, according as the wife Philotoper Metrodorius hath faid and written. And verily, by this their first supposition, without going any surther it is easie to be known & seen (my good triend) what a slender, poore, rotten and unsteady foundation they have laid, to ground upon it their sovereigne good; considering that even those pores and conduits above said (by which they bring in their pleatures) lie as well open to admit grievous paines; or to say more truly, there be very few wayes in the body of man, by which pleasure entreth; whereas there is no part or member thereof, but receiveth dolor and pain. For be it granted, that all pleasures have their sea in the naturall parts, about joynts, sinewes, steet and hands; why, even in these very places are bedded and seated allo the most cruell passions that be; to wit, of gout y fluxes and rheumaticke ulcers, of gangrenes, tetters, wolves, cancerous fores, which corrode, eas, mortifie and putrishe the parts that they posfels. If you prefent unto the body the fiveetest odours and the most pleasant savours that be, you shall find but sew places therei (and seek thorowout) affected therewith mildly and gently to their contentment; whereas all the reft often times are grieved and offended thereby: nay, there is no part at all of the body, but subject it is to feele and suffer the smart dolors inflicted by sire, by fword, by fling, biting, scourging and whipping; the ardour of heat, the rigor of cold entreth and pierceth into all parts, like also as doth the feaver: but pleasures verily are much like unto prety puffs and gentle gales of winde, blowing after a fmiling manner, some upon one extremity that beareth out of the body, and some upon other, as if it were upon the rocks lying forth in the sea, they pass away, blow over and vanish incontinently, their time and continuance is so short: much like unto those meteors or fire-lights in the night, which represent the shooting of stars, as if they sell from heaven, or traversed the skie from one side to the other; soone are the pleasures on a light fire, and as soone again gone out and quenched at one instant in our sless; but contrariwise, how long pains and dolors do endure, we cannot alledge a better testimony then that of Philottetes in Aeschylus, who speaking of the pain of his ulcer, faith thus:

That dragonfell, doth never leave his hold, By day or night, fince first my foot he caught:

The flinging smart goesto my heart full cold,
By poisonal tooth which from his mouth it raught.
Neither dot the anguish of paine lightly run over and glide, after a tickling manner, upon other Nettner doubt the augmin of pane agricy the body; but contrariwife, like as the grain or feed of the Sea-fuperficiall parts and extremities of the body; but contrariwife, like as the grain or feed of the Sea-claver or Trefoile Medica, is writhen and full of points and angles, whereby it taketh hold of the earth and flicketh falt and there(by reason of those points so rough and rugged) continueth a long time; even to dolor and pain having many crotchets and hooked fourns of roots, which it purteth forth and fpreadeth here and there inletteth and interlaceth it felfe within the flesh, and there abideth, not only for a night and a day, but also for certain leasons of whole yeers, yea, and some revolutions of Olympiads, to that hardly and with much adoe at the last departeth, being thrust out by other paines, like as one nail is driven forth by another stronger than it. For what man was ever known to have drunk or eaten 60 long a time, as they endure thirst who are fick of an ague, or a bide hunger who are befieged? and where is that solace and pleasure in the company and conversation offriends, that lasteth io long as tyrants cause them to abide torture and punishment, who fall into their hands? and all this proceedeth from naught els but the inability and untowardnesse of thebody, tolead a voluptuous life; for that in truth, made it is more aptro abide paine and travell, than to joy in delights and pleasures; to endure laborious dolors, it hath strength and power fufficient; whereas to enjoy pleasures and delights, it sheweth presently how seeble and impotent icis, in that to foon it hath enough and is weary thereof; by occasion thereof, when they feethat we are minded to discourse much as touching a voluptions life, they interrupt and break incontinent-ly our purpose, conjesting themselves; that bodily and sleshing pleasure is very small and seeble, or (to (ay a truth) transitorie, and such as passeth away in a moment; unless haply they are disposed to lie and speak otherwise than they think; like as Meirodivis did, when he said: That often times weipit against the pleasures of the body; and Epeurus, when he writeth: That a wife man being fick and dileased, laugheth and resoyceth in the midft of the greatest and most excessive pains of his corporall malady. How is it possible then, that they who so lightly and easily beare the anguish of bodily pains, should make any account of pleasures? for admit that they give no place to paines, either in greatnesse or continuance of time, yet they have at least wise some reference and correspondence unto them, in that Epicurus hath given this generall limitation & common definition to them all; to wit, Indolence or a substraction of all that which might cause and move pain; as if nature extended joy to the easement only of dolor, and suffered it not to proceed further in augmentation of pleasure; but when it came once to this point, namely, to feele no more pain, it admitted onely certaine needless varieties. But the way to come with an appetite and defire to this estate, being indeed the full measure of joy and pleasure, is exceeding briefe and shorts whereupon these Epicines ans perceiving well, that his place is very leane and hard, do translate and remove their tovereighe good, which is the pleasure of the body, as it were out of asbarren foile, into a more fruitfull & fertill ground, a namely, to the foul, as if therein we should have alwayes or chards, gardens a meaddines covered over with pleasures and delights, whereas according to the laying of Telemachus in Homer.

Affording plaines at large to run a race: And even so in this poore fleshly body of ours, there is no fruition of pleasitre united, plaine and smooth, but altogether rugged and rough, intermingled and delayed for the most part, with many agitations that be feverous & contrary to nature, Hereat Zeuxippm taking occasion to fpeak: Think northen (quoth he) that these mendo very well in this, that they begin with the body; wherein it feemeth that pleature engendereth first, and afterwards ends in the toul, as in that which is more constant and firme, reposing therein all absolute periestion? Yes I wis (quothI) and me thinks I affure you that they doe paffing well, and according to the direction of nature, in cafe they thinks I alture you that they doe paning wen, and according to the direction of matther, in care they fill fearch after & find that which is more perfect, and accomplished, like as choice perfors do, who give themselves to contemplation and politickelife; but if afterwards you fight them protest and cry with open mouth, thas the foul joyeth in no worldly thing, nor finder the onition and repose, but onely incorporall pleasure, either prefent and actuall, or els in meer expectation thereof, and that there of the protest in the result of the protest of the statement of for the body, and in thus translating the pleasure of the body into it, they do as those who powr aid fill wine out of one vessell that leaketh and is naught, into another that is more compact and will hold better, for to preferve and keep it longer, as supposing thereby, to make the thing far better, and more honourable; and verily time doth keep well and mend the wine that is thus powred out of one vestell into another: But of pleasure, the foul receiving the remembrance onely, as the odour and meil thereof, reteineth nothing elle; for that so soon as pleasure hath wrongste or boiled as it were one walme in the slesh, it is soon quenched and extinguished, and that remembrance remaining thereof paffeth foon away as a shadow, simoak, or suming vapout; much like as if a man should gather and heap together a number of fancies and cogitations of what for ver be had ear or drunk before time, and so make his repast and food thereof, for default of other wines 80 viands fresh & present in place yet see how much more modestly the Cyrenaick philosophers are affected, although they have drunk out of the same bottle with Epicarmistor they are of opinion, wanton sports of Venus should not be exercised openly, and in the day light, but would have the wanton iports of rome mount not be extended openly, and artificial and possible from the hidden and covered with the darkness of the night; for fear left our cogitation receiving cleerly by the eye-fight the representations of this faid act, might efstoons inflame and fir up the lust and appetite thereto: whereas these men contrariwise do hold, that herein confished the perfection and appetite thereto: of a wife mans felicity, for that he remembreth certeinly, and reteineth furely all the evident figures, gestures, and motions of pleasures past. Now whether such precepts and rules as these, be unworthy the name of those who make profession of wisdome, namely, thus to suffer such scourings and filthy ordures of their pleasures to remaine in the foul, as it were in the fink and draught of the body, I purpole not to discourse at this time. But surely that unpossible it is for such matters to buy; purpose are to the a joyous life, may hereby appear most evidently: For the pleasure of remembring delights past, cannot be very great unto those, who had but a small fruition thereof when they were present; and unto those likewise, who find it expedient for them, to have the same prefented in a measure, and soon to retire and withdraw themselves from them, it cannot be profitable to think thereupon long after, confidering that even with those persons who of all others be most fenfuall and given to fleshly pleasures, the joy and contentment abideth not at all after they have onceperformed the action; only there remaineth with them a certaineshadow, and the illusion (as it were in a dreame) of the pleasure that is flown away, continueth a while in their mind, forto maintaine and kindle fill the fire of their concupilcence; much like unto those who in their fleep dream that they are drinking, or enjoying their loves; and verily such imperfect pleasures and imaginary joyes do nothing else but more eagerly whet and provoke lastivious life neither (Taffureyon) is the remembrance of those pleasures which these men have enjoyed in times past, delectable, but only out of the imall reliques remaining of their pleasure, which are but weake, slender and feeble. the same remembrance doth renew and sir up again a surious appetite, which pricketh and provo-keth them evidently, and giveth them no rest. Again, no likelihood there is, that even those who otherwise besober, honest, and continently given, do amuse themselves and busietheir heads in cailing to mind such matters, and to read and count them out of a journall register or day-book and Kalender, according as the ridiculous jest goes of one Carneades, who was wont to do so, namely:

How often have Illien with Hedia or with Leonium? In what and how many places have I drunk Thasian wine? At how many fet seasts at three weeks or twenty dayes end, have I been merry and made great and sumptuous cheer? For this passionate affection of the mind, and disordinate forwardness, thus to call to remembrance and represent delights past, doth argue and bewray most evidently an outragious appetite and beastly furious hear after pleasures either present, or expected and looked for: and therfore my conceit is this: That even these menthemselvs perceiving what abiurdities do follow herupon, have had recourse to indolency and the good state and disposition of the body; as if to live in joy and happiness, were to think and imagine upon such a complexion, that either shall be or hath been in some persons. For this sirme habit and compact constitution of the fiesh (raythey) and the assured hope that it will continue, bringeth an exceeding contentment, and a most found permanent joy unto as many as can discourse and think therupon in their minds:
For the better proofe thereof, consider first and formost their behaviour and what they do, namely, how they remove, tols and transport up and down this pleasure, indolency, or firme disposition of the stell, (call it what you will) transferring it out of the body into the foul, and again from the foul to the body, for that they cannot hold and flay it, being apt to flide and run from them; whereupon they are forced to tye and fallen it to some chiefe head and principle; and thus they do stay and fulleine the pleasure of the body with the joy of the mind, and reciprocally determine and accomplish the joy of the mind in the hope and expectation of bodily pleasure. But how is it possible, that the foundation being thus moveable and inconstant, the rest of the building upon it, should not likewise be unstedsast? or how can the hope be fast, and the joy bulling upon it, indust upon a ground-worke exposed softmuch unto wavering and to so many mutations as these be, which compasse and environ ordinarily the body, subject to a number of neceffary injuries, hurts and wounds from without, and having within the very bowels thereof, the fources and fprings of many evils and maladies, which the discourse of reason is not abe to avert and turne away? For otherwise ir could not be, that these men (prudent and wise as they are) should have been afflicted and commented with the distales of painfull strangury or pissing drop-meal, the suppression and difficulty of urine, bloody-flixes, dysenteries and dolorous wrings in the guts, phthifick, and confumptions of the lungs, or dropfies; of which maladies Epicurus himselfe was plagued with some, Polyenus with others; Nicocles also and Agathobulus had their himfelle was plagued with lome, rospense with others. Nicoccis and and requirements had then part and were much troubled therewith, which I speak not by way of reproach unto them is for I knew very well, that Pherecides and Heredius, two singular personages, were likewise incumbred with grievous maladies: but we would gladly require and request them (if they will acknowledge their own passions and accidents which they endure, and not, upon a way and are so the rocale. Incurre the circumstants. vaine bravery of words, to win a popular favour and applause of the people, incurre the crime of infolent arrogance, and be convict of leafing) either not to admit the firme and ftrong conof miotent arrogance, and oc constitution of the flesh, for the element and principall of all joy; or ellenot to beare us in hand and affirm, that those who be fallen into painfull anguish and dolorous disease, do laugh, disport and be wantonly merry for well it may be, that the body and slesh may be many times in good plight nd in a firme disposition; but that the hope should be assured and certaine that the same will so continue, never yet could enter into a man of stayed mind and sound judgement. Bur like as in the sea, according to the Poet Assemble.

For why? who knows what will enfue? and future time is ever uncertain. Impossible it is therefore, that a soul which placeth and reposeth her soveraign good in the sound disposition of the bpby, and in the hope of continuance therein, should hold long without sear and trouble; for that the body is not only subject to storms and tempetis without, as the sea is a but the greatest part of troubles me passions, and those which are most violent, she breedeth in her selle; and more reason there is for a man to hope for fair weather in Wincer, then to promise himselfe a constitution of body exempt from pain and harms to perfever and tremain (a) long; for what selle hath given Poets occasion and induced them to call the life of man a day-flower, unstable, unconstant and appetration; or to compare it unto the leaves of trees, which put out in the Spring sealon, sade and sall agains in Autumn; but the imbecility and feeblenesse of the slesh, subject to infinite instituties, seafialties, butts and dangers; the best plight whereof, and highest point of perfection, Physicians themselves are want to admonish us for to subject, sear, diminish; and take down. For according to the Aphorisme of Hippocrates: The good constitution of a body when it is at the height, sits dangerous and slippery: and as Euripidas the Poet said very well:

Whose vewhile a colour gay and fresh,
Soon gone he was, and extinit sodainty.
As sur that seems to shoot and fall from sky.

Nay, that which more is; a common received opinion it is, that those persons who are most saire and in the flower of their beauty, if they be cie-bitten, or looked willy upon by a witching or envious eye, fustain much hurt and dammage thereby; because the perfection and highest degree of vigour in the body, is most subject to a sudden alteration, by reason of very weaknesse and frailty; and that there is smal or no assurance at all that a man should lead his life without pain and for row, and that there is must of no annuance at an that a than in oncareag in sine without paparagliorrow, may evidently appear by that which they themselves do say into others; for they affirm: That who-foever commit wickednessed and transgresse the Laws, live all their days in milery and sea; for how-foever they may perhaps live undetected, yet impossible it is that they should promise themselves affired security, nevertobe discovered; informed as the doubt and sear of future punishment, will not give them leave to take joy, or affuredly to use the benefit of present impunity; in delivering these speechesto others, they perceive not how they speak against themselves: For semblably well it may be, that oftentimes they may have their health, and carry able bodies about them ; but to be affured that they shal continue so always, or a long time is a thing that cannot be performed for needs they must evermore stand in doubt and distruct of their body for the time to come; like as women great with Child, are ever gruntling and groaning against the time of their travel: otherwife, let them fay, why they attend fill a fure and confident hope of that which hitherto they never could attain unto. Moreover, it is not sufficient to workassured confidence, for a man to sorbeare fin and wrong doing, or not at all to offend the Laws, confidering that to be afflicted justly, and for defert, is not the thing to be feared, but simply to endure pain, is learful and terrible. For if it be a griefe and troubleto be touched and vexed with a mans own fins and trespalles; he cannot chuse but be molefted and disquiered also with the enormities and transgressions of others: And verily if the outragious violence and cruelty of Lachares was not more offensive and troublesome to the Athenians; and likewise the tyranny of Dionysius to the Syracusanes; yet I am sure at leastwise it was full as much as to their own felves; for whiles they vexed them, tormented they were and molefted themselves, and they looked to suffer punishment one time or other for their wrongs and outrages, for that they offered the same before unto their Citizens and subjects who fel into their hands. What should a man alledge to this purpose, the furious rage of the multitude, the horrible and bloudy cruelty of theeves and rovers, the mischievous pranks of proud and presumptuous inherritors, plague and pestilence by contagion and corruption of the aire, as also the fell outrage of the angry sea, in a ghost whereof Epicurus himselfe writeth, he had like to have been swallowed up as he failed to the City Lampfacur? It may fuffice to relate in this place the nature only of our body and fraile flesh, which hath within it felle the matter of all maladies, cutting (as we lay metrily in the common proverb) out of the very Ox, leather thongs; that is to fay, taking pains and corments, from it selfe, thereby to make lifefull of anguish, fearful and dangerous, as well to good perions as to bad; in case they have learned to rejoice, and to found the confidence and surety of their joy upon nothing elfe but the flesh and the hope thereof, according as Epicurus himselschach lest written, as in many other of his books, so in those especially which he entimiled, Of the soveraign end of all goodthings. We may therefore directly conclude, that these men do hold for the foundarion of a joyful and pleasant life, not a principle that is not only uniteady, tottering, and not to bee trusted upon, but also base, vile, and every way contemptible; if so bee that to avoid evils, be their only joy and the soveraign felicity that they seek for; and in case they say: That they respect and regard naught elie, and in one word: That nature her selfe knoweth not where elie to lodge and bestow the said happinesse, but onely there, from whence is chased and driven away, that which might annoy and offend her; and thus hath Metrodorus written in his treatife against Sophisters: to that according to their dostrine, we are to make this definition of foveraign good, even theavoidance of evil for how can one lodge any joy, or place the faid good, but only there, from whence pain and evil hath been diflodged and removed: To the same effect writeth Epicawas also, to wit: That the nature of a good thing is ingendered and arifeth from the eschewing and shunning of evili-as also that it proceedeth from the remembrance, cogitation, and joy which one conceiveth, in that such a thing hapned unto him. For surely it is an inestimable and incomparable pleasure (by his faying) to wit, the knowledge alone that one hath escaped some notable hurt or great danger: And this (quoth he) is certainly the nature and essence of the soveraign good, if thou wilt directly apply thy selfe thereto, as it is meet, and then anon rest and stay therein, without wandering to and fro, here and there, prating and babling I wot not what concerning the definition of the faid soveraign good. Othe great felicity and goodly pleasure which these men enjoy, rejoycing as they do in this, that they endure none evil, feele no pain, nor inffer forrow! Have they not (think you) great cause to glorifie, and to say as they do, calling themselves immortal, and gods sellows? Have they not reason for these their grandeurs, and exceeding sublimites of their blessings, to cry our with open mouth, and as if they were possessed with the frantick sury of Bacchus Priests, to break forth into loud exclamation for joy, that furpassing all other men in wildom and quicknesse of wit, they only have found out the foveraign, celettial, and divine good, and that which hath no mixture at all of evil? So that now their beatitude and felicity is nothing inferior to that of swine and sheep, in that they repose true happinesse in the good and sufficient estate of the sless principally, and of the foul likewise in regard of the fiesh; of hogs I say and sheep; for to speak of other beasts which are of a more civil, gentle, and gallant nature; the height and perfection of their good, standeth not upon the avoiding of evil, combdering that when they are full, and have stored their crawes, some fall to finging and crowing, others to swimming; some give themselves to flie, others to counterfeit all kinds of notes and founds, disporting for joy of heart and the pleasure that they take; they use to play together, they make pattime, they hop, leap, skip, and dance one with another, shewing thereby, that after they have escaped some evil, nature inciteth and firreth them to seek forward, and look after that which is good, or rather indeed that they reject and cast from them, all that which is do orous and contrary to their nature, as if it shood in their way, and hindered them in the purfute of that which is better, more proper and natural unto them: for that which is necessary is not streight ways imply good; but surely the thing that in truth is desirable and worthy to be chosenabove the rest, is studies farther, and reachests beyond the avoidance of evil: I meane that which is indeed pleasant, and familiar to nature, as Plato said: who sorbade expresly to call or once to effeem the deliverance of pain and forrow, either pleasure or joy, but to take them as it wereforthe rude Sciography or first draught of a Painter, or a mixture of that which is proper and strange, familiar and unnaturall, like as of black and white. But some there be, who mounting from the bottom to the midst for want of knowledge what is the lowest and the middest, takethe middle forthe top and the highest pitch, as Epicurus and Metrodorus have done, who defined the essential nature and substance of the soveraign good, to be the deliverance and riddance from evil, contenting themselves with the joy of flaves and captives, who are enlarged and delivered out of prison, or eased of their irons, who take it to be a great pleasure done unto them in case they be gently washed, bathed, and annointed after their whipping-theer, and when their flesh hath been tome with scourges; mean while they have no taste at all or knowledge of pure, true, and liberal joyes indeed, such as befincere, clean and not blemished with any scars, or cicatrices, for those they never faw, nor came where they grew : for fay that the scurf, scab, and manginess of the flesh, say that the bleeredness or gummy watering of rheumatick eyes, be troublesome infirmities, and such as nature cannot away withall, it followeth not hereupon that the scratching and scraping of theskin; or the rubbing and cleaning of the eyes should be such wonderfull matters, as to be counted felicities: neither if we admit that the superstitious fear of the gods, and the grievous anguish and trouble ariting from that which is reported of the Divelsin hell be evil: we are not to infer by and by that to be exempt and delivered there iro, is happineffe, felicity, and that which is to be so greatly wished and defired: certes, they affign a very firaight room and narrow place for their joy, wherein to turn, to walk, to rome and tumble at eale, so far forth only, as not to be terrified or dismayed with the apprehension of the pains and torments described in hell, the only thing that they desire, Lo, how their opinion which so far passeth the common fort of people, setteth down for the final end of their fingular wisedom, a thing, which it seemth the very bruit beasts hate even of themselves: for as touching that firm constitution and indolence of the body, it makes no matter, whether of it self or by nature, it be void of pain and sicknesse; no more in the tranquillity and repose of the foul, skillethit much, whether by the own industry or benefit of nature, it be delivered from fear and terror: and yet verily a man may well fay, and with great reason, that the disposition is more firm and firong, which naturally admitteth nothing to trouble and torment it; then that which with judgement and by the light and guidance of learning doth avoid it: But fer the case, that the one were as effectual and powerful as the other; then verily it will appear at leastwise, that in this behalf, they have no advantage and pre-eminence above bruit beafts; to wit, in that they feel no anguish nor trouble of spirit: for those things which are reported either of the Divels in Hell, or the Gods in Heaven; nor feare at all paines and torments, expecting when they shall have an end. That this is true, Epicurus verily himselse hath put down in writing : Is quoth the) the sufficients and imaginations of the mateors and impressions which both are and doth apne) the imperious which both are and doth appear intuit and and and at all to have recourse unto the natural causes of all those things, no more should have no need at all to have recourse unto the natural causes of all those things, no more than those dumb beafts who entertaine no evill inspicions or summises of the gods; nor any opinions to tomenthem, as couching that which shall befall them after death: for they neither believe and know, nor to much as once think of any harme at all in such things. Furthermore, if in the and know, and they hold of the gods, they had referred and left a place for divine providence, beopinion that therby the world was governed, they might have been thought when me as they are, to have gone beyond brute beafts for the atteining of a plealant and joyfull life, in regard of their the strength of the streng good hopes; but feeing all their doctrine as touching the gods tendeth to this end, namely, to feare no god, and otherwife to be fearless and careless altogether, I am perswaded verily that this is more firmly fettled in those, having no sence and knowledge at all of God, than in these who say they many God, but have not learnd to acknowledge him for a punishing God, and one that can punknow. God, out have not reached to achieve from superlittion; and why? they never sell in-ish and cando harme: for those are not delivered from superlittion; and why? they never sell in-toit, neither have they laid away that searfull conceit and opinion of the gods; and no marvell, for they never had any fuch: the same may be said as touching hell and the internal spirits ; for neither the one nor the other have any hope to receive good from thence; marie, suspect, seare and doubt what shall betide them after death, those must needs, lesse, who have no fore-conceir at all of death; than they in whom this perswasion is imprinted beforehand, that death concerneth us not: and yet thus far forth it toucheth them, and that they discourse, dispute, and consider thereupon; whereas brute beafts are altogether freed from the thought and care of such things as do nothing perceine unto them : true it is, that they shun stroaks, wounds and slaughter; and thus much (I say) of death they feare, which also even to these men is dreadfull and terrible. Thus you see what good things wisdome (by their own saying) hath furnished them withall: but let us now take a fight and survey of those which they exclude themselves fro and are deprived of. As touching those diffusions of the foul, when it dilateth and ipreadeth it selle over the flesh, and for the pleasure that the flesh feeleth, if the same be small or mean, there is no great matter therein, nor that which is of any consequence to speak of; but if they pass mediocritie, then (besides that they be vain, deceitfull and uncerteine) they are found to be combersome and odious, such as a man ought rather to rather, to tearme not spirituall joyes and delights of the soul, but rather sensual and grosse pleasures of the body fawning, flattering and smiling upon the soul, to draw and entice her to the participation of such vanities: as for such contentments of the mind which deserve indeed and are worthy to be called joyes and delights, they be purified clean from the comrary, they have no mixture at all of troublesome motions, no sting that pricketh them, nor repentance that followeth them, but their pleasureis spirituall, proper and naturall to the soul; neither is the good therein borrowed abroad, and brought in from without, nor abfurd and void of reason, but most agreeable and sorting thereto, proceeding from that part of the mind which is given unto contemplation of the truth, and desirous of knowledge, or at leastwife from that, which applieth it selfe to do and execute great and honourable things: now the delights and joyes as well of the one as the other, he that went about to number, and would strain and sorte himselfe to discourse how great and excellent they be, he were never able to make an end: but in breefand few words, to help our memory a little as touching this point: Histories minister an infinit number of goodly and notable examples, which yeeld unto us a fingular delight and recreation to pass the time away, never breeding in us a tedious fatietie, but leaving alwayes the appetite that our foul hath to the truth, infatiable and defirons still of more pleasure and contentment; in regard thereof, untruths and very lies therein delivered are not without their grace; for even in fables and fictions poeticall, although we give no credit unto them, there is some effectuall force to delight and perswade: for think (I pray you) with your felfe, with what heat of delight and affection we read the book of Plato intituled Atlanticus, or the last books of Homers Ilias? Consider also with what grief of heart we misse and want the refidue of the tale behind, as if we were kept out of some beautifull temples, or faire theaters, shut fast against us ? for furely the knowledge of truth in all things, is so lovely and amiable, that it seemeth, our life and very being, dependent most upon knowledge and learning; whereas the most upon knowledge and learning; whereas the most upon knowledge. fant, odious and horrible things in death, be oblivion, ignorance and darknesse; which is the reafon (I affureyou) that all men in a manner fight and war against those who would bereave the dead of all sence, giving us thereby to understand, that they do measure the whole life, the being also, and joy ofman, by the sence onely and knowledge of his mind; in such fort, that even those very things that are odious and offensive otherwise, we heare otherwhiles with pleasure; and often times it falleth out, that though men be troubled with the thing they, hear, fo as the water standeth in their eyes, and they be ready to weep and cry out for grief, yet they desire those that relate the same to say on and speak all: as for example, Oedipus in Sophocles. The Messenger.

Alas, my Lord, I fee that now I shall

But peradventure this may be a current and stream of intemperate pleasure and delight, proceeding from a curiofity of the mind and will, too forward to hear and know all things, yea, and to offery olence unto the judgement and discourse of reason: howbeit, when as a narration or history containing in it no hurtiul and offensive matter, besides the subject argument, which consisteth of brave adventures and worthy exploits, is penned and couched in a fweet file, with a grace and powerful force of eloquence; such as is the history of Herodoius as touching the Greek affaires, or of Ken nophon concerning the Persian acts, as also that which Homer with an heavenly spirit hath endited and delivered in his veries, or Eudosem in his peregrinations and description of the world, and and delivered in his Treatise of the founding of Cities and Governments of State, or Arisfoxenus who hash leit in writing, the lives of famous and renowned persons; in such (I say) there is not only much delight and contentment, but also there ensueth thereupon no displeasure nor repentance; And what man is he, who being hungry, would more willingly eat the good and delicate meats? or a third, defire and chuse to drink the dainty and pleasant wines of the Phesacians, rather then read that filling on and discourse of the voyage and pilgrimage of Wysfer? and who would take more pleasant wines of the world take wines of th lie with a most fair and beautiful woman, then to fit up all night, reading either that which Arma phon hath written of Lady Panthea, or Arishabalus, of dame Temoclea, or Theopompus of fair Thubba These be the pleasures and joyes indeed of the mind: but our Epicureans reject likewise, all those delights which proceed from the fine inventions of the Mathematical Sciences: and to fay a prices a History runneth plain, even simple and uniform; whereas the delectation that we have in Geometry, Astronomy and Musick, have besides (I wot not what) forcible bait of variety so attractives. thety hold men with their delineations and descriptions, as if they were so many sorceries, spells, and incantations: fo that wholoever hath once tafted thereof, fo he be practifed and exercised thereon in, he may go all about well enough, chanting these verses of Sophocles.

The furious love of Mufes nine
Hath beart and mind poffed mine:
Thus ravifled, fuff I me bie
To creft and cape of mountain bie:
Melodious fongts, and found with all
Of pleasust hoops me forth doth call.

Certes, Thampras exercised his poetical head about nothing elle; no more verily did Endoxus; Arifarchus and Archimdas. For teeing that fludions, and industrious Painters took so great pleasure in the excellency of their works, that Nicias when he was painting. Homers Nocjia (that is to say, the calling forth and raising the ghosts of solk departed) being so affectionate to it, sorgat hindele and asked his servitors estoones about him, whether hehad dined or no: and when Protomess King of Egypt sent unto him threescore Talents for the said picture after it was finished, he resulted the same, and would never sell. or part with his handy work, What pleasure respect (think you) and how great delight took Enclides in Geometry and Astrology, when he wrote the propositions of Perspective 3 and Philip when he composed the demonstrations of the divers forms and shapes appearing in the Moon? Archimedas also, when by the Angle called Gonia, he found out, that the Diameter of the Sun is just so big a part of the greatest Circle, as the Angle is of son right lines; Apollonius likewise and Arifarchus, who were the inventors of the like propositions; the concemplation and knowledge whereof, even at this day, bringeth exceeding pleasure and wonderful generosity and magnanimity unto those who can intend to study upon them. And verily those base and abject pleasures of the kitchin and brothel house, we ought not so much as to compare with these, and therebyto contaminate and disgrace the facted Mules and their mountain Helicon,

Where he pherd none durfthe tend his flock, On hill above or vale below: Nor edged tool was known to flock Or cut onetree that there d d grow.

But these pleasures are indeed the intemperate and undefiled pastures of the genice Bees; whereas those other resemble properly the iteching lusts of swine and goats, which over and besides the body, fill with their fishty ordure the sensual part of the soul, subject to all passions and perturbations. True it is that lust and desire to enjoy pleasures, is a passion adventurous and hardy enough to enterprize many and sundry matters; yet was there never man found so amorous, who for joy that he had embraced his paramour, sacrificed a beef; nor ever was there known so notorious a glutton, who wished in his heart and desired, so he might first fill his belly with delicate viands and princely banqueting dishes, to die presently: and yet Endoxus made this prayer, that he might stand neer unto the Sun, fort of learn the form: the magnitude and the beauty of that Planet, upon condition to be burnt presently, as Phesicon was, with the beams thereof. Pihagorus for the proof one proposition or figure which he had invented, satrificed an Ox. as Apollodorus hath recorded in this Dysticon:

No sooner had Pythagoras this noble figure found, But solemnly he sacrific d an Ox, even in that stound,

Whether it were that flope line in Geometry, called Hipptimal 2, which answering directly to the right Angle of a Triangle, is as much in effect as the other two that comprehend and make the faiding e; or rather that lineary demonstration or proposition, whereby he measured the plot in a parabolick fection of a Cone or round pyramidal figure. As for Archimedes, he was so intentive and busic in drawing his Geometrical figures, that his servants were faine by sorce to pull him away to be washed and anointed; and even then he would with the strigil or bathcombe (which served to curry and rub his skin) draw figures even upon his verybelly: and oneday above the reft, having curry and ruo his samplatary inguises extra upon his very control and one only above the reft; having found our whiles he was a bathing, the way to know how much gold the gold-mith had robbed in the fashion of that crown which King Hero had put forth to making, he ran forth suddenly out of the baine, as if he had been frantick, or inspired with some fanatical ipitit, crying our Heurea, H reca, that is to fay, I have found it, I have found it, iterating the same many times all the way, as he went. But we never heard of any Glutton fo given to gourmandife and belly-cheer, who went up and down crying Bebroca, that is to fay, I have eaten, I have eaten; nor of a wanton and amorous perion, who having enjoyed his love, would let up this note, Ephilesa, that is to say, I have kist, I have kist. Notwithstanding there have been and are at this day, a thousand millions, even an infinite number of lascivious and loose perions: But contrariwile, we detelt and abhor those, who tipon an affection, bravery and pride, make rehearial what feafts they have been at, as persons who highly account of to base and unworthy pleasures, which men ought indeed to have in contempt, Meteras in reading the works of Endoxus, Archimedes, and Hopparchus, we are ravified and transported as it were with tome heavenly and divine delight; beleeving that laying of Plato to be true, who writeth: That the Mathematical Arts, how/oever they be contemned, by those that be ignorant, and for default of knowledge and undderstanding neglected; yet for the grace and delight that they yeeld, be more and more in request, even in delight of those blind and blockish persons: All which pleasures to great and so many in number, running alwayes as a river; these men here do turn and drive another way, for to empeath and hinder thole who approach unto them, and give eare unto their doctrine, that they should not once taste thereos, but command them to set up and spread all their main fayles, and flie away as faft as they can. Yea, and that which more is, all those of this feet, both men and women, pray and request Pythocles (for Epicurus sake) not to make any account of those arts which we name liberal And in praising our Apelles, among other singular qualities, that they attribute unto him, they set down this for one: That from his first beginning he had sorborne the study of the Mathematicks, and by that means kept himselfe unsported and undefiled: As for Hiflories (to lay nothing, how of all other Sciences they have neither heard nor feen any) I will cite only the words of Metrodorus writing of Poets: Tush (quoth he) be not abashed nor think it ashame to consesse that thou knowest not of whether side Hetter was, of the Greeks part or of the Trojans? neither thinkit a great matter if thou be ignorant what were the first veries of Homers Poem, and regard thou as little those in the midst.

Poem, and regard thou as little those in the midit.

Now forafmuch as Epicaria with well enough, that the pleafures of the body/ like unto the afiniNow forafmuch as Epicaria with well enough, that the pleafures of the body/ like unto the afiniveriary Etefaan minds) do blow over and paffe away, yea, and after the flower of mahs age is once gone, decay fenfibly, and ceafe altogether: therefore hemoveth a queftion: Whether a wife man, heing now far flept in years, and not able any more to keep company with a woman, taketh pleafure fill in wanton touching, feeling or handling of fair and beautiful persons: Wherein verily he is far ffrom the mind and opinion of Sophocles; who rejoyced and thanked God, that he had elcaped from this voluptuous and fleshly love, as from the yoak, chain, or clog of fome violent and furious master, Yet rather ought these fensival and voluptuous persons, seeing that many delights and pleasures corporal, do fade and decay in old ages.

And that with agedfolk in this. Dame Venus much offended is:

(as faith Eurip'des) to make provision then most all, of other spiritual pleasures, and to be stored before hand, as it were against some long siege, with such draw victuals as are not subject to putrashed on and corruption: Then Isay should they hold their solemn feasts of Venus, and goodly morrow-minds, to passe the away by reading some pleasant Histories, delectable Poems, or priety speculations of Mussick or Geometry: And verily they would not so much as think any more of those blind seelings and bootsess hand provocations of dead wantonnesse, if they had learned no more but as Aristale, Herakides, and Dicearchus did, to write of Homer and Euripides: But they being never careful and provident to purvey such victuals, and seeing all the rest of their life otherwise to be unpleasant, and as dry as a kex (as themselves are wont to say of vertue) yet willing to enjoy still their pleasures continually, but sinding their bodies to say nay, and not able to perform the same to their contentment, they be wray their corruption in committing foul and dishonest acts out of season, enforcing themselves (every wheir covery own consections) to awaken, stir up, and renew the memory of their former pleasures in times pass, and for want of sirch and new delights, making a shift to lerve their turn with the old and stale, as is streep some; destrous they are to stir, kindle, and quicken others that lie extinct in their sells, as it were gone; destrous they are to stir, kindle, and quicken others that lie extinct in their sells, as it were gone; destrous they are to stir, kindle, and quicken others that lie extinct in their sells, as it were gone; destrous they are to stir, kindle, and quicken others that lie extinct in their sells, as it were gone; destrous they are to stir, kindle, and quicken others that lie extinct in their sells, as it were gone; destrous they are to stir, kindle, and quicken others that lie extinct in their sells, as it were some; as they came into our mind: but as touching Mussick which beinging with it out : for in his questions he maintaineth: That a wife man is a great lover of shews and spectacles. delighting above all others to hear and see the passimes, sports and sights, exhibited in Theaters during the feast of Bacchus; yet will be not admit any musical problemes, any disputations or witty discourses of Criticks in points of humanity and learning, so much as at the very table, in dinner and supportime; but giveth counsel unto Kings and Princes that be lovers and favourers of literature, to abide rather the reading and hearing of military narrations, and firatagems at their feafis and banquets, yea, and scurril talk of buffons, pleasants and gesters, then any questions propounded or discuffed, as touching Musick or Poetry: for thus much hath he delivered in his book entituled: Of Royalty: as if he had written the same to Sardanapalus or Naratus, who was in times past a great Potentate and Lord of Babylon. Certes, neither Hiero nor Attalus, nor yet Archelaus would ever have been perswaded to remove and displace from their tables such as Euripides, Simonides, Melanippides, Crates, or Diodorus, for to fet in their rooms Cardax, Ariantes, and Callias, known gefters and notorious ribauds; or tome parafitical Thrasonides and Thraspleons, who could skill of nothing and notofious ribauds; of tome parameter to response and the replacement and to nothing elfe but how to makefolk laugh, in counterfeiting lamentable yellings, groans, howlings, and all to move applause and clapping of hands. If King Prolomenthe first of that name, who also first teched a liberty, and founded a colledge of learned men, had light upon these goodly sules and royal precepts of his putting down, would not he have exclamed and faid unto the Samians:

O Messes fair, O Ladies dear.
What energy and what spight is here!

For, beseeming it is not any Athenian thus malicionsly to be bent unto the Muses, and be at warre with them : but according to Pindarus :

Whom Jupiter doth not vouch fafe His love and favour for to have. Amaz'd they stand and quake for fear, When they the voice of Mules hear

What say you, Epicarus' you go early in the morning by break of day unto the Theater, to heate musicians playing upon the Harp and Lute, or founding shawmes and hauthoies: if then it fortune at the table, in time of a banquet, that Theophrastus discourseth of Symphonies and musical accords? or Arifloxenes, of changes and alteration of tunes? or Ariflophanes of Homers works, will youlflop your ears with both hands, because you would not hear, for that you so abhor and detest them? Sureyour ears with both nanos, became you would not nearly in that barbarous and detert memoure-ly, there was more civility yet and honefly (by report) in that barbarous King of Sosthia, Ateas, who when that excellent minited I finenias, being his Captive, taken prifoner in the wars, played upon the flute before him as he fat at dinner, sware a great oath, that he took more pleasure to hear his horse neigh. Do not these men (think you) consessed agrant (when they be well charged) that they have given defiance to vertue and honefty proclaming mortal and irreconcilable war, without al hope of Truce, Parley, Composition and Peace? for surely, setting pleasure only asset, what other thing is there in the world (be it never so pure, holy and venerable) that they embrace and love? Had it not been more reason, for the leading of a joyful life, to be offended with sweet persumes, and to reject odoriferous oyls and oyntments, as bettles, jeires and vultures do, then to abhor, deteft and shun the talk and discourses of Humanitians, Criticks, Grammarians, and Musicians? for, what manner of flute, or hauthoies, what harp or lute how well foever fet, tuned, and fitted for

What quire resounding loud and shrill
From pleasant mouth and breast so speece,
A song in parts, see with great skill,
When curning men in masses, meet?

To greatly delighted Epicarus and Metrodorus as the discourses, the rules and precepts of Quires and Carols, the questions and propositions concerning flutes and hauthoies, touching proportions, confonances and harmonical accords would affect Ariftoile, Theophrastus, Hieronymus and Dicaarchus? As for example, what is the reason, that of two pipes or flutes (otherwise even and equal) that which hath the straighter and narrrower mouth, yielden the bigger and more base sounds also, what might be the cause, that the same pipe when it is listed and set upward, becometh loud in all the tones that it maketh, but hold it downward once, it foundeth as low? so doth one pipe also when it is set close unto another, give a base sound; but contrariwise, if it be disjoined and put asunder, it soundeth higher and more shril. As also how it commeth to passe, that if a man sow chaff, or cast dust thick upon the stage or scaffold in a Theater, the people there assembled be deaf and cannot hear the Players or Minstrels'Semblably, when King Alexander the Great was minded to have made in the city of Pel-la the forepart of the stage in the Theater all of brasse what moved his workman or Architect not to permit him fo to do, for fear it would drown and dull the voice of the Players? Finally, whyamong fundry kinds of musick, that which is called Chromatical, delighteth, enlargeth and joyeth the heart, wheras the Harmonical contrasterh and draweth it in making it sad and dumpish? Moreover, the manners and natures of men which Poets represent in their writings, their witty fictions, the difference and variety of their file, the folution of dark doubts and quaint questions, which (befides a delightfome grace and beautiful elegance) carry with them a familiar and perswafive power, whereout each one may reap profit; infomuch as they are able (as Xemphon faith) to make a man forget even love it selfe, so effectual is this pleasure and delight, Howbeit, the Epicureans here have no feeling and experience; nay, which is worfe, they defire to have none, as they fay themselves; but imploying the whole contemplative part of the foul, in thinking upon nothing elie but the body and plucking it downward together with fentual and carnal lufts, as fifthers nets with little rolls and plummets of lead; they differ nothing at all from horlekeepers, or shepherds and other herdmen, who lay before their beafts, hay, ftraw, or fome kind of graffe and herbs, as the proper fodder and forrage for the cattell which they have in charge: for do they not even to intend to feed the foule fat (as men frank up swine) with bodily pleasures; in that they would have her to be glad for the hope the hath that the body thall thorty enjoy tome pleasure, or else in the remembrance of those which it hath enjoyed in times past? as for any proper delight or particular pleasure of her owne, they suffer her to receive none from her selle, nor so much as to seek thereafter.

And verily can there be any thing more about and beside all apparence and shew of reason, then (whereas there be two parts whereof man is compounded, to wit, foul and body, of which the foul is more worth, and placed in the higher degree) to fay and affirm, that there is in the body fome good thing, proper, peculiar, familiar, and natural unto it, and none in the foule; but that the fits fill tending the body, and looking only to it? that the smileth upon the pathons and affections thereof, joying and taking contentment with it only; having of her felfe originally no motion, no election, no choice, no defire nor pleasure at all? Now surely they should either by putting off their mask and dicovering themselves, have gone roundly to work, making man flesh, and nothing else but flesh; assome there be who flatly deny, that there is any spiritual substance in him; or else leaving in us two different natures, they ought to have let either of them alone by it selfe, with their feveral good and evil: that I lay which is familiar or contrary unto it: like as among the five fenies, every one is defined and appropriate to one object fenible, although all of them by a certain wonderful sympathy be affected one to the other. Now the proper seniative organ or instrument of the foule is, the understanding; and to fay that the same hath no peculiar subject to work upon, no proper spectacle to behold, no familiar motion, no natural and inbred passion or affection. in the fruition whereof it fhould take pleasure and delight, is the greatest absurdity of all others.

And verily this is the saying of the semen; unlesse haply some there be, who ere they be aware; charge upon them fome flanderous and falle imputations. Hereat began I to fpeak and fay unto him not io Sir, it we may be Judges; but I pray you let be, all action of inquiry, and proceed hardly to not 10 str, it we may be Judges; out I piray you ter be, anaction of inquiry, and proceed hardly to finish and make anend of your discourse. And why (quoth he) should not Aristademu succeed after me, if you haply reluse shall, or be loath to speak? You say true indeed (quoth Aristademu) but that shall not be until you be weary of speech, as this manis; and for the present, since you are yet fresh and in heart, I be seech you may good friend, spare not your selfs, but use your faculty, lest you be thought for very sloath and idlenssiet of saw back and goe out of the lists, Certes (quoth Theorethen) it is but a small matter, and the same very easie which is behind; for there remaineth no more but to shew and recount how many joyes and pleasures there be in active life, and that part of the foule which is given to action? First and formost, even they themselves in some place grant and confesse; that it is a greater pleasure to do good, and to benefit others, then to receive a benefit from another; as for good turns, a man I confesse may do them in bare words and sayings: but furely the most and greatest are performed by acts and deeds, and thus much doth the very word of of benefit or weldoing import; and even they themselves tellifie no lesse: For but a while since. we heard this man report, what words and speeches Epicurus delivered; what letters he wrote and fent unto his friends, in extolling, praising, and magnifying Metrodorus; how bravely and valiantly he went down from the City of Athens to the Port Pyreaum, for to aid and luccour Mythris the Syrian, albeit Metrodorus did no service at allin that fally: What manner of pleasures then, and how great ought we to esteem those which Plato enjoyed, when Dion a Scholar of his, and one of his bringing up, role up to put down the tyrant Dionyfius, and to deliver the flate of Sicily from fervitude? what contentment might Ariffole find, when he caused the City of his Nativity, which was ruinare and razed to the ground to be re-edified, and his country-men and fellow-Citizens to bee called home who were banished? what delights and joyes were those of Theophrass and Phidias, who deposed and overthrew those tyrants who usurped the Lordly dominion of their country and for private persons in particular, how many they relieved, not in sending unto them a strike or a bushel of corn and meale, as Epicarus sent unto some; but in working and effecting, that those who were exiled out of their native country, driven from their own houses, and turned out of all their goods, might return home again and re-enter upon all; that such as had been prisoners and lien in irons, might be delivered and fet at large; as many also as were put from their wives and children, might recover and enjoy them again: What need I make rehearfal unto you, who know all this well enough; But surely the impudence and absurdiry of this man, I cannot (though I would) passe over with silence, who debasing and casting under foot the acts of Themissocles and Militades as he did, wrote of himselfe to certain of his friends in this fort: Right nobly, valiantly, and magnificently, have you shewed your endeavour and care of us, in provision of Corne to furnish us withal; and again, you have declared by notorious signes, which mount up into Heaven, the ingular love and good will which you bear unto me. And if a man observe the manner of this file and writing, he shall find, that if he take out of the mysteries of this great Philosopher, that which concerneth a little Corne, all the words besides are so curiously couched and penned, as if the Epistle had been written purposely, as a thanksgiving for the safety of all Greece, or at leastwife, for delivering, fetting free, and preferving the whole City and People of Athens,

No pleasant life according to Epicurus.

What should I busie my head to shew unto you, that for the delights of the body, nature had need to be at great cost and expenses; neither doth the chiefe pleasure which they seek after, confift in course bisket-bread, in peale-portage, or lentile broth; but the appetites of these voluptuous persons, call for evquinte and dainty viands, for sweet and delicate wines, such as those be of Thases, for sweet odours, pleasant persumes, and precious ointments, for curious junkets and banqueting dishes, for tarts, cake bread, marchpanes, and other pastry works, well wrought, beaten and tempered with the weet liquor gathered by the yellow winged Bee: over and besides all this, their mind stands also to fair and beautiful young damosels, they must have some pretty Leontium, some fine Boidion, some sweet Hedia, or dainty Nicedion, whom they keep and nourish of purpose within their gardens of pleasure, to be ready at hand. As for the delights and joyes of the mind, there is no man but will confesse and say: That tounded they ought to be upon the greatnesse of some noble actions, and the beauty of worthy and memorable works, it we would have them to bee not vaine, base and childish; but contrariwise, reputed grave, generous, magnificent and man-like; whereas to vaunt and glory of being let loose to a dissolute course of life and the fruition of pleafures and delights, after the manner of Saylers and Mariners when they celebrate the feast of Venus; to boat also and please himselse in this: I hat being desperately sick of that kind of dropse which the Physicians call Assets, he forbare not to feast his friends still, and keep good company, neither spared to adde and gathermore moisture and waterish humours fill unto his dropse: and remembring the last words that his brother Needer spake upon his death-bed, melted and consumed with speci-al joy and pleasure of his own, tempered with tears is there is no man (Itrow) of sound judgement and in his right wits, who would tearm these sottish follies, either sound joyes, or perfect delights; but furely, if there be any Sardonian laughter (as they call it) belonging also to the foul, it is feated (inmy conceit) even in such joyes and mirths mingled with tears as these, which do violence unto nature: but if any man shall say, that these be solaces, let him compare them with others, and see how far these excel and go beyond them which are expressed by these verses:

By sage advice I have effected this, That Spartaes martial fame eclipsed is, Allo: This man, Ofriend and stranger both, was while helived here, The great and glorious Star of Rome, his native City deare. I wot not what I [hould you call, . An heavenly Godund man mortall.

And when I fet before mine eyes the noble and worthy acts of Thrafybulus and Pelopidus; or behold the victories either of Ariftedes in that journey of Platea, or of Militades at the battel of Marathon, I am even ravished and transported besides my selfe, and forced to say with Herodotus, and deliver this fentence: That in this active life, there is more sweetnesse and delectation, then glory and honor: and that this is so, Epaminondas will bear me witnesse, who (by report) gave out this speech, that the greatest contentment which ever he had during his life, was this: That his father and mother were both alive to fee that noble Trophee of his, for the victory that he wan at Leutires, being general of the Thebans against the Lacedemonians: Compare we now with this mother of Epaminondas, Epicarus his mother, who took fo great joy to see ther ion keeping close in a dainty garden and orchard of pleasure, where he and his familiar friend Polyenus gat children in common, upon a trull and courtifan of Cyzicum : for, that both mother and fifter of Metrodorus were exceeding glad of his marriage, may appear by his letters missive written unto his brother, which are extant in his books: and yet they go up and down every where crying with open mouth: That they have lived in joy, doing naught elie but extoll and magnifie their delicate life, faring much like unto flaves when they folemnizethe feast of Saturn, supping and making of good cheer together, or celebrate the Bacchanales, running about the fields; so as a man may hardly abide to hear the utas and yelling noise they make, when upon the infolent joy of their hearts, they break out into many fooleries, and utter they care not unto whom, as vain and fond speeches, in this manner:

Why fitt'ft thou ftill, thou wretched lout, Come let us drink and quaff about : The meats upon the board set are, Be merry man and make no spare : No feoner are thefe words let flie, But all at once they hout and crie; The potsthen walk, one fills out wine, Another brings a garland fine Of flowers full fresh, his head to crown And decks the cup, whiles wine goes down: And then the minstrel, Phoebus knight, With fair green branch of Laureldight, Sets out his rude and rusty throat. And sings a filthy tunelesse note: With that one thrusts the pipe him fro , And founds his wench and bedfello.

Do not (think you) the letters of Metrodorus resemble these vanities, which he wrote unto his brother in these tearms? "There is no need at all, Timocrates, neither ought a man to expose himself, Sinto danger for the falety of Greece, or to strain and buse his head to win a Coronet among them, "in testimony of his wisedom; but he isto eat, and drink wine merrily, so as the body may enjoy "all pleasure, & sustain no harm. And again, in another place of the same letters he hath these words: "Oh how joyful was I, and glad at heart! Oh what contentment of spirit found I, when I had ce learned once of Epicunus to make much of my belly, & to gratifie it as I ought! For to fay a truth "to you, O Timocrates, that Art a Naturalist: The soveraign good of a man lieth about the belly. In summe, these men do limit, set out and circumscribe the greatnesse of humane pleasure within the compasse of the belly, as it were within center and circumference; but surely impossible it is, that they should ever have their part of any great, royal and magnifical joy, such as indeed causeth magnanimity and hautinesse of courage, bringeth glorious honour abroad, or tranquillity of spirit at home, who have made choice of a close and private life within doors, never shewing themselves in the world, nor medling with the publick affairs of Common-weale; a life (I fay) sequestred from all offices of humanity, far removed from any inflinct of honour, or defire to gravifie others, thereby to deferve thanks, or win favour : for the foul (I may tell you) is no base and small thing, it is not vile and illiberal, extending her defires onely to that which is good to be eaten, as do these poulps or pour cuttle fishes which stretch their cleies as far as to their meat and no farther; for such appetites as thefe, are most quickly cut off with fatiety, and filled in a moment; but when the motions and defires of the mind tending to vertue and honefty, to honour also and contentment of conscience, upon vertuous deeds and well doing, are once grown to their vigour and perfection, they have not for their limit, the length and tearm only of mans life: but firely, the defire of honour, and the affection to profit the fociety of men, comprehending all eternity, flriveth fill to go forward in fuch astions and beneficial deeds as yeeld infinite pleasures that cannot be expressed; which joies, great personages and men of worth cannot shake off and avoid though they would: for flie they from them what they can; yet they environ them about on every fide, they are ready to meet them wher-foever they go, when as by their beneficence and good deeds they have once refreshed and cheered many other: for of fuch persons may well this verse be verified:

To town when that he comes, or there doth walk : Men him behold as God, and so do talk.

For when a man hath so affected and disposed others, that they are glad and leap for joy to see him, that they have a longing defire to touch, falute, and speak unto him; who seeth not (though otherwise he were blind) that he findeth great joies in himself, and enjoyeth most sweet contentment this is the cause that such men are never weary of well doing, nor think it a trouble to be employed to the good of others; for we shall evermore hear from their mouths these and such like speeches:

Thy father thee begat and brought to light. That thou one day might ft profit many awight. Let us not cease, but shew a mind,

Of doing good to all mankind. What need I to speak here of those that be excellent men, and good in the highest degree? for if to any one of those who are not extreamly wicked, at the very point and instant of death; he in whose hands lieth his life, be he a god, or some King, should grant one hours respir, and permit him to employ himselse at his own choice, either to execute some memorable act, or else to take his pleafure for the while, so that immediately after that hour past, he should go to his death: How many thinkyou would chuse rather during this small time, to lie with that courtisan and famous Strumpet Lais, ordrink liberally of good Ariunan wine, then to kill the tyrant Archias, for to deliver the City of Thebes, from tyrannical fervitude i for mine own part verily, I suppose, that there is not one: for this I observe in those sword-seners, who fight at sharp a combat to the uttrance, such I mean as are not altogether brutish and savage, but of the Greekish nation, when they are to enter in place for to perform their devoir, not withstanding there be presented unto them many dainty dishes and costly cates, chuse rather at this very time to recommend unto their friends, their wives and children, to manumife and enfranchife their slaves, then to serve their bellies and content their sen-fual appetites: But admit that these bodily pleasures be great matters, and highly to be accounted of, the same are common also evento those that lead an active live, and mannage affairs of State; For as the Poet faith:

Wine muscadel they drink, and likewise eat Fine manchet bread, made of the whitest wheat.

They banquet also, and feast with their friends, yea, and much more merrily (in my conceit, after they be returned from bloody battels, or other great exploits and important services; like as Alexander and Agessian; Phocion also and Epaminondas were wont to do) then these who are announted against the fire, or carried easily in their litters : and yet such as they mock and scorn those, who indeed have the fruition of other greater and more dainty pleasures: for what should a man speak of Epaminondas, who being invited to a supper unto his friends house, when he saw that the provision Expansionans, who can more fumptions then his flare might well bear, would not flay and sup with him, but laid thus unto his friend: I thought you would have facificed unto the gods, and not have been a wasteful and prodigal spender; and no marvel; for King Alexander the Great refused to entertain the exquisite Cooks of Ada Queen of Caria, saying: That he had better about him of his ownto dreffe his meat, to wit, for his dinner or breakfait, early rising and travelling before day light; and for his supper, a light and hungry dinner. As for Philoxenus who wrote unto him concerning two most faire and beautiful boies, to this effect, whether he should buy them for to fend unto him or no? he had like to have lost the place of government under him, for his labour: and yet to say a truth, who might have better done it then Alexander? But like as of two pains and griefs (as Hippocrates faith) the lesse is dulled and dimmed (as it were) by the greater; even so, the pleasures proceeding from vertuous and honourable actions, do darken and extinguish (by reason of the minds joyes, and in regard of their exceeding greatnesse) those delights which arise from the body. And if it be so as these Epicureans say, that the remembrance of former pleasures and good things, bee material and make much for a joyful life, which of us all will beleeve Epicurus himfelfe, that dying (as he did) in most grievous pains and dolorous maladies, he eased his torments, or asswayed his anguish by calling to mind those delights which before-time he had enjoyed? for surely, it were an easier matter to behold the resemblance of ones face in the bottom of a troubled water, or amid the waves during a tempest, then to conceive and apprehend the smiling and laughing remembrance of a pleasurepast, inso great a disquietnesse and bitter vexation of the body; whereas the memory of vertuous and praite-worthy actions, a man cannot (would he never fo faine) chase and drive out of his mind. For how is it possible, that Alexander the Great, should ever forget the battel at Arbela? or Pelopidas, the defeature of the tyrant Leontiades? or Themsftocles, the noble field fought before Salamis? for as touching the victory at Marathon, the memorial thereof the Athenians doe solemnize with feasts even to this day; like as the Thebans celebrate the remembrance of the famous fight at Leuttres: and we verily (as you know well enough) make feasts for the victory of Daiphantus before the City Hyampolis : and not only we' keep yearly holiday then, but also the whole country of Phocis (upon that anniversary day) is full of sacrifices and due honours : neither is there one of us that taketh fo great contentment of all that he eateth or drinketh at such a festival time, as he doth in regard of the remembrance of those noble acts which those brave men performed we may well guesse and consider therefore, what joy, what mirth, what gladnesse and solace of heart accompanied them all their life time after, who executed these noble seats of arms, considering that after five hundred years and above, the memory of them is fresh, and the same attended with so great cheer and rejoycing. And yet Epicurus himselse doth acknowledge, that of glory there do arise certain joyes and pleasures; for how could he do lesse, seeing that himselfe is so desirous thereof, that he is even mad withal, and fareth after a furious manner to attain thereto; infomuch, as not only he disavoweth his own masters and teachers, contesteth against * Democrates (whose opinions *Or rather and doctrines he stealeth word for word) upon certain syllables and nice points, maintaining that there never was any wife man nor learned Clerk, fetting himfelfe and his disciples ande: but also, which moreis, he hath been so impudent, as to say and write; that Colores adored him as a god, touching his knees full devoutly, when he heard him discourse of natural causes; and that his brother Neocles affirmed and gave out even from his infancy; that Epicurus had never his like or fellow for wisedome and knowledge; as also, that his mother was happie and blessed for bearing in her womb such a number of Atomes, that is to say, indivisible small bodies, who concurring all together framed and formed so skilful a personage. Is not this all one with that which Callicratides sometime faid of Conon: That he committed adultery with the fea; even so a man may say that Epicurus fecretly by flealth and fhamefully) made love unto Glory, and went about to follicit, yea, force her by violence, not being able to win and enjoy her openly; whereupon he became paffionate and love-fick: for like as a mans body in time of famine, for that it hath no food and nourishment otherwise, is constrained even against nature, to feed upon the own substance; even so ambition and thirst afterglory, doth the like hurt unto the soules of ambitious persons; for being ready to distor thirst of glory, and seeing they cannot have it otherwise, enforced they are to praise themselves. But they that be thus passionately affected with desire of pratie and honour, confesse not they manifelly, that they reject, lorgo and neglect great pleasures and delights: when through their seeble, lazy and base minds, they flie from publick offices of State, forbear the management of affairs, and regard not the favours of Kings and following of great persons; from whence Democrites saith; there accrue unto man many ornaments to grace & commend this life? For Epicurus shall never be able to make the world beleeve, that (esteeming so much as he did and making so great account of Neocles his brothers testimony or the adoration of Colores) he would not have been ready to have leapt out of his skin, and gone besides himselse for joy, if he had been received by the Greeks at the solemnity of the Olympiack Games, with joyous acclamations and clapping of hands: nay, he would no doubt have shewed that gladnesse and contentment of heart with open mouth; he would have been alost and flowen abroad, as the Poet Sophocles faith:

Like to the Down, which being light and soft From thiftle old, the wind doth mount aloft

And if it be a gracious and acceptable thing, for a man to brute that he hath a good name; it followeth confequently, that grievous it is to be in an ill name: and what is more infamous and odious, then to be friendlesse, to want employment, to be infected with Atheim and impiery, to live loosely and abandoned to lufts and pleatures : finally, to be neglected and condemned? and verily (fertingthemselves aside) there is no man living, but he thinketh all these qualities and attributes to a gree firly unto this feet of theirs. True (will some man fay) but they have the greater wrong. Well, the question now, is not, what is theiruth, but what is the common opinion that the world hath of them and to this purpole I mean not to cite the publick decrees and acts of Cities, nor to alledge the defamatory books written against them : for that were too odious : but if the Oracles, if divisnation, if the practience and providence of the gods, if the natural love and affectionate kindnesse of parents to their children, it the managing of politick affairs, if the conduct of armies, if magiftracy and rule in Common-wearth, be matters honourable and glorious, then it must needs be, that they who affirm: That notravel ought to be made for the falety of Greece, but that we are to eat and drink, so as the belly may be pleased, and receive no harm and disconcentment, should be infamous, and reputed for wicked persons: and such as are so taken, must needs be odious and in great difgrace, if so be they hold honour, good name and reputation, to be things pleasant and delectable.

When Theon had made an end of this speech, thought good it was to give over walking: and when (as our custome and manner was) we were set down upon the seats, we rested a prety while in filence, ruminating (as it were) and pondering that which had been delivered, but long this was not:for Zenx:ppu: thinking upon that which had been faid. And who (quoth he) shal go through with that which remaineth behind, confidering that me thinks we are not as yet come to a full point and final conclusion? for feeing that crewhile he hath made mention by the way of Divination, and likewise put us in mind of Divine providence, two main points, I may tell you whereupon these men do greatly frand, and which by their faying yeeld them not the least pleasure, contenument, repole do greany trang, and which by their ayang property of pirit, and affurance in this life: "therefore I hold it necessary that somewhat were said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and assure that the same said as touchof spirit, and t ing the same. Then Arishedemartaking the matter in hand: As for the pleasure (quoth he) whith in denying they pretend in this case, me thinks (by all in manner that hath been spoken) that if their reasons bothere should go for currant, and bring that about which they purpose and intend, well may they free and one and the deliver their spirit of (I wot not what) fear of the gods, and a certain superfitition: but surely other they imprint no joy, nor minister any comfort and contentment to their minds at all, in any regard of the gods: for to be troubled with no dread of the gods, not comforted by any hope from them, worketh this effect, and maketh them so affected towards the gods, as we are to the fishes of the Hyrcan Sea, expecting neither goodnetie nor harm from them. But if we must adde somewhat more to that which hath been faid already: thus much I take it we may be bold to fet down, as received and granted by them : First and foremost, that they impugne them mightily, who condemn and take away all heavinesse, forrow, weeping, fighs, and lamentations for the death of friends:
and they affirm, that this indolence tending to a kind of impossibility, proceedeth from another evil, greater and worfethen it, to wit, cruel inhumanity, or elfean outragious and furious defire of vain-glory and oftentation: and therefore they hold it better to fuffer a little fortow, and to grieve moderately, so a man runnot all to tears and marre his eyes with weeping, nor shew all manner of paffions as some do by their deeds and writings, because they would be thought affectionate and hearty lovers of their friends, and withal of a gentle and tender nature: For thus much hath Epicirrus delivered in many of his books, and namely in his letters where he maketh mention of the death of Hegefianax, writing unto Dofitheusthe Father, and Pyrfos the Brother of the man departed For long it is not fince by fortune those letters of his came to my hands, which I perused, and in imitating their manner of arguing, I (ay: That Athelim and implery is no lefte fin, then the cruelty or vain and arrogant oftentation above faid; unto which impiety they would induce us with their perswassons, who take from God both savour and also anger: For better it were, that to the opinion and beliefe which we have of the gods, there were adjoined and ingraffed an affection mixed and composed of reverence and fear, then in flying therefro, to leave unto our selves neither hope nor pleasure, no assurance inprosperity, ne yet recourse unto the goodnesse of the gods in same of adverfity: True it is, that we ought to rid away from the opinion that we have of the gods, all superfittion, if it be possible, as well as from our eyes all gummy and glutinous matter, offending the fight; bur if this may not be, we are not therefore to cut away quite, or to put out the eyes clean of that faith and beliefe, which men for the most part have of the gods; and this is not a severe, fearful and austere conceit as these imagine, who traduce and slander divine providence, to were, fearful and austere conceit as these imagine, who traduce and slander divine providence, to were, searful and austered to state with the farmake it odious and terrible, as folk do by little children, whom they use to scare with the farmake it odious and terrible, as folk do by little children, whom they use to scare with the farmake it odious and terrible, as folk do by little children, whom they use to scare with the farmake it odious and terrible, as folk do by little children. tastical illusion, Emps as if it were some infernal fury, or tragical vengeance seizing upon them but some sew men there be, who in that sort do sear God, as that it is better and more expedient for them to to do, then otherwise not to fland in awe of him: for in dreading him as a gracious and propitious Lord unto the good, and an enemy unto the wicked, by this one kinde of feare which maketh them that they have no need at all of many others, they are delivered from thole baits which many times allure and entice mento evil; and thus keeping vice short, and not giving it head, but holding it neer unto them, and within their reach, that it cannot escape and get from them, they be leffe tormented then those who be so hardy as to employ the same, and dare put it in practife, but soon after, sall into fearful fits, and repent themselves: But as conching the disposition toward God in the common fort of men, who are ignorant, unlettered, and of agroffe conceit for the moif part; howbeit hof very wicked, not thank shaights true kas, that as rogether with the reverence and honour that they beat unito the gods; there is intermingled accertain tremibling fear, which properly is called preferation! (8) like wise their is an infinite deal more of good hope and true joy, which caufeth them to pray unito the gods continually for their own good citate, and for happy luccele in their affairs, and they receive all properity as lent unto them from heaven, above, which appeareth evidently by most notable and figuritaria arguments: for furtly no exercises refrage us more, then those of religion and devotion in the temples of the gods: no times and searches are more joyous, their soldem seals in their hoñour: no actions, no highes, more delight and joy our hearts, then those which we do and see our felves, either finging and darning solemnly in the prefence of the gods so being affictant at their factifices, of the tetermonious mysteries of dwime service, for a fuch times our fold is nothing lad, call down, or melaineholisk, as if he had to deale, with some terrible tyrants, or bloudy butchers! where good realion were, that she should be heavy and decicled; burlook where the thinketh and is persivaded most that God is present. In that alare concentior the molf part; howbert not very wicked, not flark hanging true true, that as rogerher and dejected: burlook where the thinkerh and is perfwaded most that God is prefent, in that place especially, the casteth behind her all anguishes, agonies, forrows, fears, and anxieties there I lay she giveth her selfeto all manner of joy, even to drink wine most liberally, to play, disport, laugh, and be merry: As the Poersaid in love and wanton matters.

Both gray-beard, old and aged trot when they the sportsremember, Of lovely Venus, leap for joy, no cares their heart encomber.

So verily in these solemn pomps, processions and facilities, not only the aged husband and the old wife, the poor man that liveth in low and private estate, but also the housholdhines and servants, and the mercenary day labourers, who get their living by the freat of their brows, do altogether leip for mirth and joy of lieart: Kings and Princeskeep great cheer in their royal Courts, and make certain royal and publick leafts for all Commers: but those which they hold in the facted Temples; at factifices and follominities of the gods, performed with fla-grant perfumes and odoriforous incense: where it feement that men approach neerest unit of the majety of the gods, and think they even touch them, and be convertant with them in all homour and reverence: luch feaths (11ay) yeeld a more rare joy and fingular delectation, then any other: whereof he hath no part at all who denyeth the providence of God: for it is not the abundance and plenty of wine there drunk, northe store of roast and sodden meat there eaten, which yeeldeth joy and contentment at such solemn feasts: but the assured hope and full perswasion that God is there present, propitions, favourable and gracious; and that he accepted in good part the honour and fervice done unto him. For some featts and facrifices, there be, where there is no mufic at all of flutes and haut-boies, ne yet any chaplets and garlands of flowers used at all s but a facrifice, where no god is present, like as a temple without a facred seast or holy banquet, is * profare, unsestival, impious, irreligious, and without divine inspiration and devotion; and to speak better, wholly displeasant and odious to himself that offereth it; for that he counterseiteth by hypocrifie, prayers and adorations, only in a shew and otherwise then he meaneth, for fear of the multitude, and pronounceth words clean contrary unto the opinions which he holderh in Philosophy: when he facilficeth, he flandeth by the Priest as he would by a Cook or Butcher, who cutteth the throat of a theep; and after he hath facrificed, he goes his way home, faying thus to himfelfe: I have facrificed a sheep as men ordinarily do unto the gods, who have no care and regard of me. For so it is that Epicarus teacheth his scholars, to set a good countenance of the matter, and neither to envy nor incur the hatred of the common fort, when they are disposed to be merry, but seeming others in pra-Ctife, and themselves inwardly in being displeased with things done: for according as Euenus saith!

What shings are done perforce by us,

Displeasant be and od ons.

Hereupun it is, that they themselves do say and hold: That superstitious persons are present at sacrifices and religious ceremonies, not for any joy or pleasure they take there, but upon a fear that they have; and verily, herein no difference is between them and superstitious folk, in case it be so, that they do the same things for sear of the world, which the other do for fear of the gods; nay rather they be in a worle condition then those; in that they have not so much lope of good as they, but only stand always in dread and be troubled in mind, lest they should be detected and discovered, for abusing and deceiving the world by their counterfeit hypocrisie; in regard of which fear, they have themselves written books and treatiles of the gods and of deity, so composed, that they befull of ambiguities: and nothing is therein foundly or clearly delivered, they do so mask, disguise and cover themselves; and all to cloak and hide the opinions which indeed they hold, doubting the fury of the people. Thus much concerning two forts of men, to wit, the wicked and the simple or common multitude: now therefore let us confider of a third kind, fuch as be of the best mark, men of worth and honour, most devout and religious indeed; namely, what sincere and pure pleasures they have, by reason of the perswasion that they hold of God; beleeving firmly, that he is the ruthey have, by reason of the permanent charactery notes to Good a decerning firming, that neistine ru-ler and director of all good perfons, the author and father from whom proceed all things good and let and director or an good periods, the additional factor in the most proceed an inings good and honest; and that it is not lawful to say or beleeve, that he doth evil, no more then to be perswaded that he sufferesh evil; for good he is by nature; and look what sever is good, conceiveth no envy that he inherent is one, neither is it moved with anger or hatted of ought; for like as heat canto any is real into choose a thing, but always naturally maketh it hor; fo that which is good cannot hurt or do ill, not coole a many our befar remote one from the other; fo is choler and bitter gall much different Now, anger and favour be far remote one from the other; fo is choler and bitter gall much different from mildnesse and benevolence; as also malice and frowardnesse are opposite unto bounty; meekfrom minutes and printing for that the one fort at leth from vertue and puillance; the other from weak-nelle, and humanity; for that the one fort at leth from vertue and puillance; the other from weak-nelle, and humanity; nette, and managery to that the ot think that the divine power is given to be wrathful and gracinefic and vice. Now are we not to think that the divine power is given to be wrathful and gracinefic and vice. ons alike; but to believe rather, that the proper nature of God is always to be helpful and benefious aince, out to be angry and to cial; whereas to be angry and to dee harm, is not fo natural; but that mighty Jupice in Heaven, he descended from thence first down to the earth, to dispose and ordain all things: after him; other gods, of whom the one is furn med, The Giver; another, Mild and Bounteous; a third, Protector, or Defender: as for Apollo, as Pindarus faith:

Who doth in winged chariot flie, Amid the ftars in azure skie, To every man in his affaire, Reputedis most debonaire.

Now as Dogenes was wont to fay, all things are Gods, and likewife among friends, all things are common, and good men are Gods friends: even so, impossible it is, that either he who is devout and a lover of God, should not be withal happy; or that a vertuous, temperate, and just man should not likewise be devout and religious. Think ye then, that these who deny the government of Gods providence, need other punishment, or be not punished sufficienly for their impiety, in that they cut themselves from fo great joy and pleasure as we find in our selves, we (I say) who are thus well given, and religionly affected toward God? The greatest joy that Epicarus stood upon and bare himselse to boildy were Metrodorus, Polyanus, Aristobulus and such; and those he was always employed about, either in curing and tending them when they were fick, or in bewailing them after they were dead : whereas Licurgus was honoured even by the Propheteffe Pythis in thefe reasons:

As for Socrates, who had a familiar spirit about him, whom he imagined to speak and reason friendly with him, even of kindnesse and good will: and Pindarus likewise, who heard god Pan chant one of those Canticles which himselfe had composed, think we that they took small pleasure and contentment of heart thereby? Or what may we judge of Phormio, when he lodged in his house, Catentment of heart thereby? for and Pollux; or of Sophocles, for entertaining of Afeul.pins, as both himselfe was perfiwaded, and as others believed, for the manifest apparations presented unto them? It were not amisse and befide the purpole, to rehearse in this place what a faith and beleefe in the gods, Heromogenes had, and that in those very words and tearms which he setteth down himselfe: The gods (quoth he) who know all things, and likewise cau do all, are so friendly unto me, that for the care they have of my person and affairs, are never ignorant day or night, either of that action which I purpose to do, or of that way which I intend to goe: and for that they for elee the iffue and event of what foever I enterprize and undertake; they advertise me thereof beforehand by prelage of offes, voices, dreams, auguries and bird-flights, which they fend as messengers to me of purpose. Moreover, meet it is, that we should have this opinion of the gods, that what soever proceedesh from them is good: but when we are perivaded that the goods which we receive from them, be fent unto us, upon special favour and grace, this is a wonderful contentment to the mind, this worketh much confidence, breedeth a marvellous courage and inward joy which feemeth as it were to fmile upon good men wheras they who are otherwise minded and disposed, hinder themselves of that which is most sweet in prosperity, and leave no refuge or retiring place in time of adversity; for when any missfortune prosperity, and leave no refuge or retiring place in time of adversity; for when any missfortune prosperity, and leave no refuge or retrait have they then the dissolution or separation of bolighteth upon them, no other haven or retrait have they then the dissolution or separation of bolighteth upon them, no other haven or retrait have they then the dissolution or separation of bolighteth upon them. dy and foul mothing I fay but the depriving of all tense as if in a storm or tempest at sea, a man should come and lay for the better comfort and assurance of the passengers, that neither the Ship had a Pilor, nor the lucky fire-lights (Caftor and Pallux) appeared to allay the jurging waves, or ftill the boilterous and violent winds, and yet for all that, there was no harm toward, because for footh the thip should soonlink and be swallowed up of the sea, or that she would quickly turn aside, or run upon some rock for to be if lit and broken in pieces : for these be the proper reasons which Epicurus useth in grievous maladies and extream perils: hopest thou for any good at Gods hand with all thyreision? thou art much deceived: for the essence and nature of God being happy and immorthyreision? tal, is neither given to anger, nor yet inclined to pity: Dost thou imagine a better state or condition on after thy death, then thou hast in thy life? iurely thou dotest, and art mightly beguiled, for that which is once distolved, loseth presently all manner of sense: and if it be senselesse, what is that to us? ittoucheth notus, whether it be good or ill, But hear you (my good friend:) How is it that you exhort me to eat. to drink, and make good cheer? Marry because the tempest is so big, that of ne efficy thispwack must foon criue, and the extream peril at hand will quickly bring thee to thy death: and yet the poor passenger (after that the ship is broken all to pieces, or or that he is flung or fallen out of it) beareth himselfe upon some little hope, that he shall (by one good fortune or other) reach unto the shore and swim to land; whereas by these mens Philosophy there is no evalion for the foule:

To any place without the sea

With freshing fome all boar and gray.

For that immediately she is distolved perisheth and dieth before the body; insomuch as she seeleth excessive joy, by having learned and received this most wife and divine doctrine: That the end of all her adversities and miseries, is to perish for ever, to corrupt and come to nothing. But it were (quoth he, calling his eye upon me) a great folly to speak any more of this matter, (considering that long fince we have heard you discourse in ample manner) against those who hold, that the reasons and arguments of Epicurus make us better disposed and ready to die, then all that Plate hath written in his treatife concerning the foul, What of that? (quoth Zeuxippus) shall this present discourse be left upperfect and unfinished because of it? and fear we to alledge the oracle of the gods, when we dispute against the Epicureans? No (quoth I again) in any wise, for according to the sentence of Em-A good tale twice a man may tell, And hear it told as oft full well.

And therefore we must entreat Theonagaine; for I suppose he was present at the said disputation. and being (as he is) a young man, he need not fear that young men will charge him for Oblivion, or detailt of memory. Then Theor feeming as ithe had been for ed and overcome by confirming Well (quoth he) fince there is no other remedy, I will not do as you Arifodemus did? you were afraid to repeat that which this man had delivered; but I will not tlick to make use of that which you have faid: for in mine opinion you have done very well, individing men into three forts; the first, of those, who are lewd and wicked; the second of them that be simple, ignorant, and the common people; the third, of such as be wile, honest, and of good worth. As for those who be wicked and naughty persons (in searing the pains and punishments proposed in general unto all) they will be afraid to commit any morein, and by this means not breaking out, but restraining themselves, they shall live in more joy, and with lesse trouble and disquietnesse. For Epicurus thinketh, that there is no other means to divert men from evildoing, then fear of punishment: and therefore he thinketh it good policy, to imprint in them the frights occasioned by superstition to masker them with the terrors of heaven and earth, together with fearful earthquakes, deep chinks, and openings of the ground, and generally all forts of fears and fulpitions; that being terrified thereby, they might live in better order, and carry themselves more modestly; for more expedient it is for them, not to commit any heinous fact for fear of torments which they were to fuffer after their death, then to transgresse and break the laws, and thereby, live all their life time in danger, andexdeath, mentod in the control of the mean people and ignorant multitude (to fay no-thing of the fear of that which fuch men beleeve to be inhell) the hope of eternity, whereof the Poets make so great promises, and the defire to live always (which of all other defires is the most ancient and greatett) jurpasseth in pleasure and sweet contenument, all childish sear of hell insomuch as forgoing and losing their children, their wives and friends, yet they wish rather they should still be somewhere, and continue (though they endured otherwise all manner of pains and calamities) then wholly to be taken out of the universal wor'd and brought to nothing: yea, and willing they are, and take pleasure to hear this spoken of one that is dead : How he is departed out of this world into another, or gone to God: with other fuch like manner of ipeeches, importing, that death is no morebut only a change or alteration, but not a total and entire abolition of the foul. And thus they

Then shall I call even there to mind, The sweet acquaintance of my friend.

What shall I say from you to Hector bold? Or husbandyours, right deer, who liv'd foold?

And hereof proceeded and prevailed this error, that men supposed they are well eased of their forrow, and better appayed when they have interred with the dead, the arms, weapons, infirmments and garments which they were wont touse ordinarily in their life time : like as Minos buried together with Glancus:

His Candiot pipes, made of the long-shank bones of dipple Door Hind, that lived once.

And if they be perswaded, that the dead either desire or demand any thing, glad they are and willing to fend or bestow the same upon them. And thus did Persander, who burnt in the funeral fire together with his wife, her apparel, habiliments, and jewels, for that thought she called for them, and complained that she lay a cold. And such as these are not greatly asraid of any judge Aacus, of Affeataphus. or of the tirest Acheon: considering that they attribute unto them dances, theatri-cal plaies, and all kinde of musick, as if they tooke delight and pleasure therein: and yet there is not one of them all, but is ready to quake for sear, to see that face of death, so terrible, so unpleasant, fo glum and grizly, deprived of all sense, and grown to Oblivion and ignorance of all things: they tremble for very horrour, when they hear any of these words: He is dead, he is perished, he is gone, and no more to be seen : grievously displeased and offended they be, when these and such like speeches aregiven out:

Within the earth as deep at trees do stand, His hap skall be to rot and turn to fand: No fealts he shall frequent ner hear the lute And harp, ne yet the found of pleasant flute.

When once the ghaft of man from corps is fled And pass'd the ranks of teeth set thick in head; All means to catch and fetch her are but vain, No hope there is of her return again.

But they kill them stone dead, who lay thus unto them, We mortal men have been once born for all, No second birth me are for to expect, WVe must not look for life that is eternal,

Such thoughts, as dreams, me ough for to reject. For, casting and considering with themselves, that this present life is a small matter, 'or rather indeed a thing of nought, in comparison of ciernity; they regard it not, nor make any account to enjoy the benefit thereof; whereupon they neglect all vertue and the honourable exploits of action, as being utterly discouraged and discontented in themselves, for the shortnesse of their life souncertain and without assurance; and in one word, because they take themselves unfit and unworthy to perform any great thing. For, to fay that a dead man is deprived or all lense, because (having been before compounded) that composition is now broken and dissolved: to give out also, that a thing once dissolved, hath no Being at all; and in that regard touchethus not: howsoever they seem to be goodly reasons, yet they rid us not from the sear of death, but contrariwise, they do more confirm and enforce the same : for this is it indeed which nature abhorreth, when it shall be said, according to the Poet Homers words :

But as f ryou both, all and some, Scon may you earth and water become.

meaning thereby, the resolution of the soul into a thing that hath neither intelligence nor any sense atall, which Epeurus holding to be a diffipation thereof into (I wot not what) emptirelle, or voidente and small indivisible bodies, which he termeth stemp, by that means cutteth off so much the rather) all hope of immortality; for which (I dare well fay) that all folk living, men and women both, would willinglybe bittenquite thorow and gnawen by the Hell-Dog Cerberns, or carry water away in vessels inll of holes in the bottom, like as the Danaides did, so they might only have a Being, and not perish utterly for ever, and be reduced to nothing. And yet verily there be not many men who fear their matters, taking them to be Poetical fictions and tales devited for pleasure, or rather bug-bears that mothers and nuries use to fright their children with; and even they also who stand in sear of them, are provided of certain ceremonies and expiatory purgations, to help themfelves withal: by which (if they be once cleaned and purified) they are of opinion, that they shall .go into another world to places of pleasure, where there is nothing but playing and dancing continually among those who have the air clear, the wind mild and pure, the light gracious, and their voice intelligible: whereas the privation of life troubleth both young and old; for we all (even every one of us) are fick for love, and exceeding defirous

To see the beauty of sunslight, VV hich on the earth doth shine so bright, as Euripides faith: neither willing are we, but much displeased to hear this; And as he spake, that great immortal eye Which giveth light throughout the fabrick wide Of this round world, made hefte and fift did hie With chariot swift, clean out of fight to ride.

Thus together with the periwation and opinion of immortality, they bereave the common people of the greatest and sweetest hopes they have. What think we then of those men who are of the betterfort, and such as have lived justly and devoutly in this life? Surely, they look for no evil at all in another world but hope and expect there the greatest and most heavenly blessings that be: for first and foremost, champions or runners in a race, are never crowned to long as they be in combat or in their course but after the combat ended and the victory at hieved; even so when these persons are perswaded that the prize of the victory in this world is due unto them after the course of this life, wonderful it is, and it cannot be spoken how great contentment they find in their hearts for the privity and conscience of their vertue, and for those hopes which assure them, that they one day shall see those (who now abuse their good gifts intolently, who commit outrage by the meanes of their might, riches, and authority, and who from and foolishly mock such as are better then themselves) pay for their deserts, and suffer worthily for their pride and insolency. And foralmuch as never any of them who are enamoured of learning, could fatisfie (to the full) his defire, as touching the knowledge of the truth, and the contemplation of the universal nature of this world; for that indeed they seess it were through a dirk cloud and a thickmist; to wir, by the Organs and Infruments of this body, and have no other use of reason, but as it is charged with the humours of the flesh weake also and troubled, yea, and wonderfully hindered; rherefore having an eye and regard always upward, and endeavouring to flie forth of the body (as a bird that taketh her flight and mounteth up aloft, that the may get into another lightfome place of greater capacity) they labour to make their foul light, and to discharge her of all grosse passions and earthly affections, fuch as be base and transitory, and that by the means of their Audy in Philosophy, which they use for an exercise and meditation of death. And verily for my part, I esteem death a good thing, so perfeet and confirmate in regard of the foul which then shall live a life indeed found and certain, that I suppose the life here is not a subsistent and affured thing of it selfe, but resembleth rather the vain illusions of fome dreams. And if it be to (as Epicurus faith:) That the remembrance and renewing acquaintance of a friend departed out of this life is every way a pleasant thing; a man may even now confider and know sufficiently, of what joy these Epicureans deprive themselves, who imagine otherwhiles in their dreams; that they receive and entertain, yea, and follow after to embrace, the very shadows, visions, apparitions, & ghosts of their friends who are dead, and yet they have neither under-Randing nor lenie at all; & mean while they disappoint themselvs of the expectation to converse one day indeed with their deer father and tender mother, and to fee their beloved, and honest wives; and are destitute of all such hope of to amiable company and sweet society, as they have, who are of the fame opinion, that Pythagoras, Plato, and Homer were, as touching the nature of the foul. Certes. I am verily perswaded, that Homer (covertly and as it were by the way) shewed, what manner of affestion theirs is in this point, when he casteth and projecteth amid the press of those that were fighting, the image of Aneas, as if he were dead indeed; but prejently after, he exhibiteth him marching alive, fare and found:

And when his friends faw him fo vigorous And whole of limbs, and with heart generous, To battelpreft, whom earft they took for dead, They leap: for joy, and ban shed all dread.

leaving therefore the forelaid image and thew of him, they ranged all about him. Let us likewife (feeing that reason proveth and theweth unto us, that a man may in very truth converse with those that are departed; that lovers and friends may touch, handle, and keep company one with another, having their perfect fentes) be of good cheer and shun those, who cannot believe so much, nor reject and cast behind, all such fantastical images, and outward barks and rinds only, in which they do all their life time nothing else but grieve and lament in vain. Moreover, they that think the end of this life to be the beginning of another that is better; if they lived pleafantly in this world, better contented they are to die, forth it they look for to enjoy a better estate in another; and if things went not to their mind here, yet are they not much discontented, in regard of the hopes which they have of the future delights and pleatures behind: and these work in them such incredible joyes and expectances, that they put out and abolish all defects and offences what soever; these drown (I ay) and overcome all discontentments otherwise of the mind, which by that meanes beareth gently, and endureth with patience what accidents loever befal in the way, or rather in a short diverticle orturning of the way: whereas contrari wife (to thole who believe, that our life here is ended and dissolved in a certaine deprivation of alisense) death (because it bringeth no alteration of miferies) is dolorous as well to them of the one fortune as the other; but much more unto those who are happy in this present life. then unto such as are miserable; for that as it cutteth these short of all hope of better estate , so from those it taketh awaya certainty of good, which was their prefent joyful life: And like as many medicinable and purgative drugs (which are neither good nor pleasant to the stomach, howbeit in some respect necessary, howsoever they ease and cure the fick) doe great hurt, and offend the bodies of fuch as be in health; even to the doctrine of Enice-THE UNIO those who are infortunate and live miserably in this world, promiseth an issue out of their miferies, and the same nothing happy, to wit, a final end, and total diffolution of their foul: And as for those who are prudent, wise, and live in abundance of all good things, it impeacheth and hindereth altogether their alacrity and contentment of spirit, in bringing and turning them from an happy life to no life at all, from a bleffed effate to no effate or being whatloever. For first and foremost this is certaine: That the very apprehension of the losse of goods, afflicteth and vexetha manas much, a seither an affured expectance, or a prefent enjoying and fruition thereof rejoy-ceth his heart: yet would they bear us in hand, that the cogitation of this final diffolution and perdition into nothing, eaveth unto men a most assured and pleasant good, to wit, the resutation or putting by of a certain fearful doubt and inspition of infinite and endlesse miteries : and this, say they, doth the doctrine of Epicurus effect, in abolishing the fear of death, and teaching that the toule is utterly diffolved. Now if this be a fingular and most sweet content (as they say it is) to be delivered from the fear and expectation of calamities and miseries without end, how can it otherwise bee but is klome and grievous, to be deprived of the hope of joyes sempiternal, and to lose that supream and loveraign felicity? Thus you fee it is good neither for the one northe other, but this, Not-being, is naturally an enemy, and quite contrary unroall that have Being! And as for those whom the mifery of death feemeth to deliver from the miferies of life, a poore and cold comfort they have (God wor) of that intentibility, as if they had an evalion and escaped thereby; and on the other side, those who lived in all prosperity, and afterwards came of a sudden to change that state into nothing: me thinks I see very plainly, that their tarry sor a fearful and terrible end of their race, which thus shall cause their felicity to cease; for nature abhorrethnot privation of fense, as the beginning of another estate and being, but is afraid of it because it is the privation of those good things which are present. For to say: That the thing which costeth us the losse of all that we have, toucheth us not, is a very abfurd speech, considering, that this very cogitation and apprehension thereof concerneth us much already: for this insensibility doth not afflict and trouble those who have no more Being, but such as yet are, namely, when they come to cast their account, what detriment and losse they receive by being no more, and that by death they shall be reduced to nothing : for it is not the three-headed hellhound Cerberns, nor the river of tears and weeping, Cocytus, which canfethe fear of death to be infinite and interminable: but it is that menacing intimation of Nullity or Not-being, and of the impossibility to return again into a state of Being, after men once are gone and departed out of this life; for there is no lecond nativity not regeneration, but that Not-being must of necessity remain for ever, according to the doctrine of Epicarus: for if there be no end at all of Non-essence, but the same continue infinite and immutable, there will be found likewise an eternal and endlesse misery in that privation of all good things, by a certain insensibility; which never shal have end. In which point Herodotus seemeth yet to have dealt more wisely, when he faith: That God having given a tafte of sweet eternity, seemeth envious in that behalfe, especially to those who are reputed happy in this world; unto whom that pleasure was nothing else but a bait to procure dolor, namely, when they have a taste of those things which they must foregoe for what joy, what contentment and fruition of pleasure is there to great, but this conceit and imagination of the foul (falling continually as it were into a valt fea of this infinition) is not able to quell and chase away, especially in those who repose all goodness and beatitude in pleasure? And if it bee true as Epicurus faith: That to die in pain, is a thing incident to most men: then surely there is no mean at all tomitigate or allay the fear of death, seeing it haleth us even by griefe and anguish to the losse of a soveraign good; and yet his sectaries would seem to urge and enforce this point mainly, to wit, in making men believe that it is a good thing to escape and avoid evil and yet for footh, that they should not think it evil, to be deprived of good, They consesse plainly, that in death there is no joy nor hope at all, but what pleasure and sweetnesse soever we had, is thereby and then cur off : whereas contrariwife, even in that time, those who believe their fouls to be immortal and incorruptible, look to have and enjoy the greatest and most divine blessings: and for certain great revolutions of yeers, to converie in all happiness and selicity, sometime upon the earth, otherwhiles inheaven, until in that general resolution of the universal world they come to burn together with Sun and Moon, in a spiritual and intellectual fire.

Sunand Moon, in a spertual and intersectual rice.

This spacious place of so many and so great joyes, Epicuras cutteth off and abolishesh clean, in that he anulleth all hopes that we ought to have in the aid and favour of the gods: whereby both in contemplative life he extinguishesh the love of knowledge and learning: and also in the active, the define of valourous acts of winning honour and glory: restraining, driving and thruss thruss into a marrow room, of a joy which is very strait, short and unpure, to wit, from the louis delight to a stelly pleasure: as if she were not capable of a greater good, then the avoiding of exist.

Whether this common Mot, he well said: Live hidden, or so live, as no man may know thou livest.

The Summary.

His precept was sie she given by Necoles the brether of Epi urus, a saith Suidas: and at sir in hadbein some golden senence) it went currant ordinarily in the mouths of all the Epicureaus, who advised a mantha would live happily, not to intermeddle in any publick, is sir of State: but Plutache considering mell how its its Empessionanded, being taken in that see she and outstand how to specify a mother of preceding the also should advage out consequences ensuing upon such an opinion, duth now con sate the same by seven arguments or sound reasons, to with. That therein such foods by Philosphers als sources in the second was the second of th that they take heed withal, they be not over curious, pragmatical, buffe and firring, nor too ready and forward to medalle in those matters which ought to be let alone as they be; for fear lest whiles they weene to raise and advance themselves, they fall back, and become lower then they would.

Whether this common Mot, be well said: Live bidden: or, So live, as no man may know thou livest.

O how even himselfe, who was the Author of this sentence, would not be unknown, but that all the world should understand, that he it was who said its for expressly he uttered this very speech, to the end that it might not remain; unknown that he had some more understanding then others destrous to win a glory undeferved and not due unto him, by diversing others from glory, and exhorting them to obscurity of life. I like the man well verily, for this is full according to the old verse:

I have him who of wisedom bearstne name, And to himselfe cannot perform the same.

We read that Philozenus the son of Errxis, and Gnatho the Sicilian, (two notorious gluttons given to belly-cheer, and to love their tooth) when they were at a feath, used to fnite their noses into the very dishes and platters with meat before them; thereby to drive those in their messe, and who were fet at the table, from eating with them, and by that means to engorge themselves, and fill their bellies alone with the best viands served up: Semblably, they who are excessively and our of all measure ambitious before others as their concurrents and corrivals, blame and dispraise glo-Ty and honour, to the end that they alone without any competitors might enjoy the same: And herein they do like unto Mariners atting at the Oare in a Boat or Gally; for howloever their eye is Toward the Poup, yet they labour to let the Prowforward, in that the flowing of the water byreciprocation, caused by the itroak of the Oares, coming for tibly back upon the Poup, might help to drive forward the vessel; even so, they that deliver such rules and precepts, whiles they make Semblant to flye from glory, pur ue it as fast as they can: for otherwise if it were not so; what need had he (who foever he was) to give out such a speech? what meant he else to write it, and when he had written it, to publish the same unto posterity? If I say he meant to be unknown to men living in his time, who defired to be known unto those that came after him? But let us cometo the thing it felfe! How can it . huse but be simply naught? Live so hidden (quoth he) that no man may perceive that everyou lived; a. if he had faid: Take heed you be not known for a digger up of Sepulchres, and a defacer of the Tombs and Monuments of the dead: But contrariwile, a foul and dishones thing it is to live in such fort, as that you should be willing that we all, know not the manner thereof: Yer would I for my part fay clean contrary: Hide not thy felfe, however thou do, and af thou hast lived bodly, make thy selfe known; be wifer, repent and amend; if thou be endued with vertue, hide it not neither be thou an unprofitable member; if vicious, continue not obstinate there, but yeeld to correction, and admit the cure of thy vice; or rather at (leastwise Sir) make a distinction, and define who it is to whom you give this precept? If he be ignorant, unlearned, wicked, or foo-lish, then it is as much as if you laid thus: Hide thy Feaver, cloak and cover thy Phrense; let not the Phylician take notice of thee; go and put thy felle into some dark corner, where no perion may have a fight of thee or of thy maladies and patitions, go thy way afide with all thy maughtiness, fick as thou art of an incurable and mortal disease 5 cover thy fpight and envy, hide thy superstition, suppresse and concease (as it were) the disorderly beatings of thine Atteries: take heed and be airaid how you let your Pulle be feit, or bewray your felfe to those who have the means, and are able to admonish. correct, and heal you. But long ago, and in the old world, our Ancestors were wont to take in hand and cure openly in publick place, those that were diseased in body: in those dayes, every one (who had met with any good medicine, or known a remedy whereof he had the proof, either In himselfe being fick. or in another cured thereby) would reveale & communicate the same unto another that flood in need therof: and thus they fay, The skil of Phylick arising first, and growing by experience, became in time, a nobe and excellent Science. And even fo requifite it is & necessary, to difcover and lay open to all men lives that he diseased, and the infirmities of the soul to touch & handle them, and by confidering the inclinations of every man, to fay thus unto one; Subject thou art to anger, take heed thereof, unto another: Thou are given to jealouse and emulation, beware of it, do thus and thus; to a third: Art thou amorous and full of love? I have been fo my felf otherwhiles, but I repent me thereof. But now adayes it is clesh contrary: in denying in cloaking, covering, and hiding men thrust and drive their vices inwardly, and more deeply still into their secret bowels. Now if they be men of worth and vertuous, whom thou conneiled to hide themselve, that the world may take no knowledge of them, it is all one as to fay unto Epiminondas. Take no charge of the conduct of an Army: or to Licurgus, Amuse not your head about making laws: and to "brasybulus: Kill no Tyrans; to Pythagoras, Keep no School, nor teach in any wife to Socrates, fee you difpure nor nor hold any discourses of Philosophy and to your selle Epicarus first of all: Write not to your riends in Afia; enrol and gather no Souldiers out of Egypt have no commerce nor negotiate with them do not protect and defend as it were with a guard from villany and violence, the young gentlemen of Lampfacum; fend not your books abroad to all men and women alike, thereby to shew your learning ; finally, ordain nothing about your Sepulture. To what tended your publick Tables ? what meant those Assemblies that you made of your familiar friends and fair young Boys; to what purpole were there so many thoulands of verses written and composed so painfully by you in the purpose were energe many strongers and Charedennis, to the end that after death they should not be forgotten? Was all this because you would ratifie and establish vertue by oblivion; arts by doing nothing, Philosophy by filence; and Felicity by forgetfulnesse? Will you needs bereave mans life of knowledge, as if you would take away light from a feast, to the end that men might not know that you and your followers do ali for pleasure, and upon pleasure? then good reason you have to give couniel, and tay unto your selfe: Live unknown, Certes, if I had a mind to lead my life with Hadia the Harlot, or to keep ordinarily about me the Strumpet Leontium; to detell a lhonefly; to repote all my delight and poy inthe tickling preatures of the fielth, and in wanton lufts: thete ends verify would require to be hidden in darknetie, and covered with the shadow of the night; thete be the things that would be forgotten, and not on e known; But if a man in the Science of natural Philosophy, delight in Hymns and Canticles to praise God, his justiceand providence; or inmoral knowledge, to fet out and commend the law humane fociety, and the politick government of Common-weale; and therein regard honour and honelty, nor profit and commodity; what reason have you to advile him for to live objeurely; Is it because he should teach none by good precept? is it for that no man should have a zealous love to vertue, or affect honesty by his example? if Themisso les had never been known to the Athenians, Greec had not given Xerxes the foil and repulse; likewite if Camillus had been unknown to the Romans: perad, enture by this time Rome had beene no City at all; had not Dion known Plato Siely should not have been delivered from tyranny. But this is my onceit, that like as light effecteth thus much, that we not only know one another, but also are profitable one unto another; even so in my judgement, to be known abroad, bringeth not only honour and glo: y, but also means of employment in vertue; Thus Epamirondas unknown unto the Ihebans, until he was forry years old, stood them in no stead at all; but after that they took knowledge of him once, and had committed unto him the leading of their army, he laved the City of Thebes, whi hand like to have been loft, and delivered Greece, being in danger of servitade i flewing in renown and glory (no leffethen in tome clear light) vertue producing her effects in due time: For according to the Poet Sophocles; By me it fhincth

Like Iron or Br. fi, that is both f.ir and bright So long as men ao handleit aright. In time alfo, anhouse goes to decay, And falleth down. if dweller be away.

whereas the very manners and natural conditions of a man be marted and corrupted gathering as it were a mosse, and growing to age in doing nothing through ignorance and obscurity. And verily a must silence, a sedentary life, retired a part in idlehesse, causeth not only the body, but the minde also of man to languish and grow seble; and like as dormant, or close and standing waters, for that they be covered, overshadowed, and not running, grow to putritie even so, they that never sitt, not be employed, what good parts soever they have in them, it they put them not forth, nor exercise their natural and inbred faculties, corrupt quickly, and become old. See you not how when the night commeth on and approach neer, our bodies become more heavy, lumpish, and unst for any work, our spirits more dull and layto all actions; and the discourse of our reason and understanding more drowine and contracted within it cell? like unto fre that is ready to go out; and how the same by reason of an idlensstea and unwillingnesse comming upon it, is somewhat troubled and disquered with divers standalical imaginations? which observation advertiseth daily after a secret and silent manner, how short the life of man is:

But when the fun with light sime beams Dispaiched hath these cloudy dreams, after he is once riten (and by mingling together the actions and coagitations of men with his light;) awakeneth and raifeth them up (as Democritus laith) in the morning, they make halfe jointly one with another upon a fervent deirie, as if they were compounded and knit with a certain mutual bond, fome once way, and fome another, riling to their feveral works and businesse. Certes, I am of advice, that even our life, our very nativity, yea and the participation of minkind is given us of God to this end: That we should know him: for unknown he is and hidden in this great fabrick and universal frame of the world, all the while that he goeth to and fro therein by small parcels and piece-meal: but when he is gathered in himselfe, and grown to his greatnesse; then shineth he and appeareth abroad, where before he lay covered ithen is he munifest and apparent, where before he was obture and unknown: for knowledge is not the way to his effence, as some would have it: but contrastive it his effence is the way, to knowledge: for that knowledge in keth not each thing, but only sheweth it when it is done; like as the corruption of any thing that is, may not be hought a transporting to that which is not, but rather a bringing of that which is dissolved to this passe, that is appeareth no more; Which is the reason that according to the ancient laws and traditions of our that is the Lord of the other world beneath. whether he be a god or a divel, they call Adar: for that whether eare dead and dissolved, we go to a certain * obscurry, where nothing is to be feen.

Even to the Prince of darknesse and of night

The Lordof idle dreams deceiving fight.

And I suppose that our ancestors in old time called man Phos, of light, for that there is in every one of us, a vehement defire and love to know and be known one of another, by reason of the confan-guinity between us. And some Philosophers there be, who think verily, that even the soul in her substance is a very light, whereunto they are led as well by other figns and arguments, as by this, that there is nothing in the world that the foul hateth fo much as ignorance, rejecting all that is obscure and unlightsome; troubled also when she is entred into dark places, for that they fill her full of fear and suspicion: but contrariwise, the light is so sweet and delectable unto her, that she taketh no joy and delight in any thing; otherwise lovely and desirable by nature, without light or in darkneffe : for that is it which causeth all pleasures, sports, pastimes, and recreations to be more jocund. amiable, and to mans nature agreeable: like as a common fauce that seasoneth and commendeth all viands wherewith it is mingled: whereas he that hath cast himselse into ignorance, and is envrapped within the clouds of misty blindnesse, making his life a representation of death, and burying it as it were in darknesse, seemeth that he is weary even of being, and thinketh life a very trouble unto him: and yet they are of opinion, that the nature of glory and effence, is the place affigned for the fouls of godly, religious, and vertuous folk:

To whom the fun shines always bright When here with us it is dark night? The medows there, both fair and wide, Withrofesred are beautified: The fields all round about them dight With verdure, yeeld a pleasant fight: All tapissed with flowers full gay, Of fruitfull trees, that blossom ay: Amidthis place the rivers clear Run foft and ftill fome there, fome here.

Wherein they passe the time away, in calling to remembrance and recounting that which is past, in discoursing also of things present, accompanying one another, and conversing together. Now there is a third way, of those who have lived ill, and be wicked persons, the which sendeth their sonles headlong into a dark gulfe and bottomlesse pit :

Where, from the dormant rivers bleak Of shady night, thick mifts do reak, As black as pitch continually, \ And those all round about do flie.

enfolding, whelming, and covering those inignorance and forgetfulness, who are commented there and punished for they be not greedy Geiers or Vultures, that evermore eat and gnaw the liver of wicked persons laid in the earth; and why? the same already is either burned or rotted : neither be there certain heavy fardels, or weighty burdens that presse down and overcharge the bodies of such

> For such thin shofts and fibres small. Have neither flesh nor bone at all.

Ne yet are the reliques of their bodies who be departed, such as be capable of punishment, for that belongeth properly to a body that is folid and able to refift; but the only way and true manner of chasting and punishing those, who have lived badly in this world, is infamy, ignorance, an entire abolition, and total reducement to nothing, which bringeth them from the river Lethe, that is to fay, Oblivion, into another mournful river, where there is no mirth, no joy, nor cheerfulnesse, and from thence plungeth them into a valt Sea, which hath neither shore nor bottom, even idlenesse and unaptnesse to all good, which can do naught else but draw after it a general forgetfulnesse and burial (as it were) in all ignorance and infamous obscurity.

Rules and Precepts of Health in manner of a Dialogue,

The Summary.

He conjunction of the soul with the body being so straight, as every manknows it is; I cannot see how it is possible that the one should commit any desorder or excesse; but the other must need be grieved therewish immediately: And if there he any thing that ought to be deployed and lamented, it is the losse of time, especially and above all, when the same is occasioned by our own intemperance; for that at such a time when as we hould attend upon our duty, we become and continue unprofitable, hurting many times both our Livet and many others. Now for that the study of good literature requireth a foul well composed and governidin a found, healthful, and vigorous body; it is not without good cause, that Plutarch intermingleth among Philosophical discourse, certain rules and precepts as touching health. For in truth a vain endeaver and enterprize this were, and hardly could a man have his mind disposed to good things, in came the body be ill affected and misgoverned: But fearing lest it would be thought, that he who made profession of Philosophy only, proceeded farther then in reason he ought, and brake the limits and bounds of sciences, in medling with Physick here: Before that he entreth into the Dialogue, when he had touched the occasion of this conwith Physics perse response to the finds of Physick it agreeable to Philosphy; which done, be repre-ference and talk; he showeth, that the sind of Physick it agreeable to Philosphy; which done, be repre-sented certain questions proposed by a third person, which serve in stead of a Preface to those Precepts and Lessons, by him set down afterwards in not following herein any exact or exquisite method, but making choice of that which he thought to be most meet for the time, and suiting best to those persons, for whose sake this Dialogue was written. He spe keth shrift therefore of the use of meats, especially such as are sweet and pleu-sing to the tooth: also what a man is to take head of in this behalfe: Then he treateth of the pleasures of the body, declaring what meessure therein we ought to keep, and discovering by a certain similande, the pernicious indiferetion of the sewho love to keep good chee and maint ain dainty fare, Consequently hereupon, he forbiddeth ust o use badily pleasures, unlesse we be in good and perfett health's condemnent stating and overmuch repletion, which is the cause of most diseases that are incident to mans body; and this he en-richeth and amplifieth by another proper similitude. He is descrous also that maladies were foreseen and prevented, setting down a special remedy therefore, and proving, that the body cannot enjoy any delight whatseour, either in eating or drinking, in case it le not healthy. From this he proceedeth to make mention of dys et, and of the Prognosticks of diseases breeding and toward. item, how, and where with the maladies of our friends ought to ferve and flead us; adding thus much moreover, that for the better maintenance and prefervation of he ith, a man is not to feed to satiety; that he ought to travel and nit spare himselfe; also that he is to fave his natural feed : upen this he discourseth of the exercise and nourishment of students and scholars, deciphering particularly wha: soever in this point is most worth the noting and observation, and so cleareth this question; namely, whether it be wholsome for the body to dispute either at the table, or present lyupon meat: After all this, he treateth of walking, of fleep, of vomiting, of purgations of the belly, of diets over exquisite and precise: condemning exp esty idlenesse, as athing contrary to the good disposition of the body. Furthermore, he sheweth when a ma ought to be at quiet and rest; as also the time that he may give himselfe to pleasure: but alove all, he requireth of every man, that he learn to know his own nature and inclination, as also the mass and drinks that be agreeable unto his stomach: exhorting in the end all students to Spire their bodies, to look unto them, and make much of them, that they may have the better meansto proceed and go forward in the knowledge of good letters, whereby they might another day be profe-table members of the common-wealth, and do more good to the society of men.

Rules and Precepts of Health in manner of a Dialogue.

The Personages speaking in this Dialogue, Mojchion and Zeuxippus.

Nd did you then indeed (my friend Zeuxeppus) turn away Glaucus the Physician yesterday, who was desirous to conser with us in Philotophy?

No I wis (good Meschion) neither did I put him away, nor desirous was he to do as you fay: Burthis was it that I avoided and feared namely: To givehim any advantage or occasion to fallen upon me, and take hold on me, knowing him as I do to be litigious and quarreliome: for in Phylick, if I may use the words of Homer:

He may well stand for many a one,

Although he be but one alone. As for Philosophy, he is not well affected thereto, but always provided of some shrewd and bitter teams againft her in all his difputations, and as then effectially i for I observed how he came directly againft us, crying out upon us afar off with a loud voice, and charging us, that we had to enterprife a great matter, and the same not very civil and honest, and in that we had broken the bounds, and pluckt up (as aman would say) the very limit marks of Sciences, laying all common, and making a confusion of them, in disputing as we did of whollome diet, and of the manner how to live in good health. For the confines and frontiers (quoth he) of Physicians and Philosophers, are (as we use to say in the vulgar Proverb, as touching Mysians and Phrygians) far different, and removed afunder: Moreover. he had readily in his mouth certain speeches and sentences of ours, which we delivered by way of pastime only, and yet for all that, were not impertinent or unprofitable, and those he would feem to controule, reprove, and fcorn, Moschion. But I for my part (O Zeuxippus) could be very well content yea, and most desirous to hear, even those speeches that he mocked and as others beside, which ye had concerning this matter, if so be it might stand with your pleasure to rehearse the same.

I think no leffe (O Moschion) for that you are enclined naturally to Philosophy, and think not wel of that Philosopher who is not well affected to Physick, but are displeased and offended with him; in case (1 say the suppose it more meet and beseeming for him to be seen studying Geometry, Logick, or Musick, then willing to enquire and learn

What rule at home in house, what work there is,

How things do fland, what goes well, what amis?

When I (ay, at home, I mean in his own body and yet a man shall see ordinarily, what a number more there be of spectators at Theaters, where there is some publick dole or free distribution of money to those that are assembled to see the games and passimes, as the manner is at Atheus, then otherwise. Now of all the liberal sciences, Physick is one, which as it giveth place to none what some content of the store in outward shew, and in pleasine or delight: to it alloweth a great reward and salary unto those that love is, even as much as their life and health comes to: and therefore were are not to accuse and charge Philosophers, who discourse and dispute of matters concerning the regiment of health, for passing beyond their bounds and confines: but rather we ought to biame them, if they think that they should pluck up all together, and take away those land-marks, to labour (as it were) in some common field between them and Physicians, in the study and contemplation of things good and honest, aiming and seeking in all their disputations and discourses, alter that which is both pleasant to know and necessary to understand.

But let us I pray you (O Zeuxippus) leave Glauceuto himselle, who for the gravity which he carrieth, would be accounted a man in all points accomplished without any need at all of Philofophies help: and recount unto me (if you please) all thois speechs which you had, especially at first, those I mean which you said were not spoken in earnest, and yet were scorned and reproved by Glauc-

Zeuxippus.

I will, and that right willingly. This friend of ours therefore delivered thus much; how hee heard one fay: That to have ones hands alwayes warm, and never fuffer them to be cold, was no smal meanes to the preservation of health: but contrariwife, to have ordinarily the extream parts of the body cold, drove heat inwardly into the Center of the body, and brought us to a certain familiarity and acquaintance with a feaver; as also, to turn and drive with out forth together with heat the matter thereof, and to distribute the same equally throughout the whole body, was an wholsome thing, as we see by experience, that it we occupy our hands, and do some work with them, thevery motion exciteth and flirreth up, yea, and maintaineth naturall heat: but if we have no fuch bufneffe or employment for them, but hold them fill and idle, yet for all that we are not to admit or entertain cold in those extream parts of the body: This (I say) was one of the points that Glaucus laughed at. The second (as I take it) was touching the meats that yeuse to give unto sick persons: For that he counselled men (in time of health) to taste the same by little and little; so as they might be acquainted therewith, to the end that they should not abhor and loath them (as little children use to do) nor hate such a kind of diet; but make the same in some fort after a gentle manner, familiar unto their appetite; that (whenfoever it happed that they were fick) fuch viands might not go against their stomachs, as if they were Physick drugs or medicines, out of the Apothecaries shop: also, that we should not be offended and discontent, otherwhiles to feed upon one single diffi and no more, and the same without any sauce to draw it on, or fine dreffing and handling by cooks craft, to commend it. For which cause he would not have men think it strange, to come now and then to the table, without being at the baine or hot house before; nor to drink sheer water, when wine is upon the board, nor to forbear to drink our drink hot in fummer time, although there be now fet before us to cool it. Provided alwayes, that this abilinence proceed not from any ambitious oftentation and vaine-glory or because wee would vaunt and make our boast thereof afterward; but that we do it apart by our felves, making no words thereof, and accustome by little and little our appetite to obey reason willingly, and to be ruled by that which is good and profitable, by weaning our minds (long before) from that scrupulous curiosity, dainty nicenesse, and wayward complaints, about these matters in time of sicknesse; when commonly we are ready to whine and lament, for that we misse those our former pleasures, and great delights, which we were wont to enjoy, and see our selves brought to a more base kind of diet, and a straighter rule of Tife. For a good taying it was: Chute the best life simply that is : use and cust ome will make it pleafing and agreeable unto thee: the which by good proofe and experience hath been found profitable in all things, but principally in the regard and care of our bodies (as touching diet) which in time of best health ought to be ordered so by use and custome, that the same may become kinde, samiliar, and agreeable to our nature; and namely by calling to mind that which others are worn to doe and fay in their ficknesse, how they sume and chase, how they fare and go to work when hot water is brought unto them for to drink or warm broths to be supped or drie bread to be eaten; how they call there, untoward, naughty, and unfavory victuals, yea, and name those curied and odious perfons, who would eem to force the same upon them for to eat or drink. Many there have been, who had their bane by baines, such as ailed not much at the first, and were not very sick at the beginning; onely they had brought themselves to this passe, that they could neither eat nor drink, unleffethey were first bathed, or had sweat in a stouph: among whom, Titus the Emperour of Rome was one, as they were able to testifie who had the cure of him when he lay fick. It was faid moreover . That always viands most simple, and such as cost least, were wholesome for the body; also that above allthings, men ought to beware of repletion, of drunkennesse and voluptuous life; especially, when there is some sessival day toward, wherein they use to make exceeding cheare; or when they purpose to invite their friends to a great dinner, or otherwise look to be bidden themfelvesto fome royal featt of a King, or Lord General, or elfeto a banquer, where they shall be put to quaff and carrouse in their turn, which they may not refute to do: against such times (I say) they ought to p epare their bodies beforehand, as it were whiles the weather is calm and fair, and make it more iresh and lightsome, yea, and better able to abide the storm and tempest toward: for a very hard matter it is in inch aftembiles and feafts of great Lords or deer friends for a manto flay himself in a mean, and maintain his accustomed sobriety; but he shall be thought uncivil, unmannerly, injociable, too autiere and odious to all the company. To the end therefore that we should not put fire to fire (as they lay) lay gorgeupon gorge, furfeit upon furfeit, and wine upon wine, good it were to imitate and follow in good earnest that which was sometime merrily doneby King Pully, and that was this: A certain man invited him upon a time to a supper, into the countrey, thinking that he would come with a small company about him: but seeing that he brought a great traine and retinue with him, and knowing well that he had prepared no more then would ferve for a few retinue with a many guests he was wonderfully troubled: Philip perceiving it, fent underhand to every one of his friends that came with him, this word: That they should keep a room in their stomachs for a dainty Tart, or Cate that was comming: they beleeving this message in good sadnesse; made spare of other viands that flood before them, looking evermore when this dainty should be served up, in such fort, as that the meat provided was sufficient for the whole company; even to we ought before-hand to be prepared against the time that we are to be at such great teasts and meetings a oresaid, where we shall be put to it perforce, to drink round in our turn and to answer every ones challenge, to referve (I lay) a place in our bodies, both for meats, and also for fine Cates, and junketting dilhes: yea, and believe me, it need be, for drunkennels, and thither to bring an appetite fresh and ready for such things. But if peradventure such constraints and compulsions surprize us upon a sudden, when wee are either full and heavy or ill at ease, for that we have a little before over-eaten and diunk our selves in case (I say) some great Lords be come to us, or in place unexpected, or haply a friend or ftranger take us at unawares, and unprovided, so that we be forced for shame to keep others company, who are well enough dispoted in body, and prepared for to drink and make merry; then mult webe especially well armed against foolish bashfulnesse, and to meet with such bad shamefastnesse is the cause of so many evils among men; and namely by alledging and saying these verses of King Creek in a Tragedy of Euripides:

Better it were for mes jouto displease
My friend, then at this time, for your content,
To give my selfe to pleasure and mine ease,
Rue of it, with area sorrow to repeat.

But after, with great for row to repent.
For to cast a mans self into a plurise or phrensie, for tear to be held and reputed rustical and uncivity. is the part of a rude clown indeed, and of one who hathneither wit nor judgement, ne yet any skill orspeech to entertain or keep company with men, unlesse they may be drunken and engorge themselves like gluttons: for the very refusal it selfe of eating and drinking, if it be handled with dexterity and a good grace, wil be no leffe acceptable to the company, then drinking square and carrousing round: And if the man who maketh a feast, abitain himselfe, though he fit at the table (as the manner is at a facrifice whereof he taffeth not) entertaining his guelts with a cheerful countenanceand friendly welcom, and whiles the cups and trenchers walk about him, be disposed to mirth and cast out some pretty jests of himself, he shall no lesse content and please his guests, then he that will seem to be drunken for company, and cram his belly with them, till it be ready to crack. To, this purpose he made mention of certain ancient examples; and namely, (among other) of Alexander the Great, who after he had drunk well and liberally, was abashed and ashamed to deny the challenge of Medius, one of his Captains, who had invited him to supper; and thereupon (falling againe to drink wine afresh) died thereof. And of those who lived in our days, he pake of one Riglis, a notable Pancratiast or Champion at all feats of activity, whom Titus Cafar the Emperor, fent for one day betimes in the morning to come and bath with him, who came indeed and after he had bathed and drunk a great draught, was (by report) surprized with an Apoplexy, whereupon he died immediately. All these matters our Physician Glaucus mocked and reproved, calling them discourses of School-masters to Children their Scholars: and as he was not very willing to hear more, to were not we greatly defirous to relate and discourse farther unto him; for that he had, no mind to confider each thing accordingly that was delivered. Socrates verily, who was the first that debarred us from eating those meats which drew us on to eat more still when we were not hungry norhad attomach thereto; and from drinking tuch drinks which caused us to drink, although we were not dry and thirfly ; forbade us not simply to use meats and drinks, but taught us rather to use them only when we had need of them, joining the pleasure of them with their necessity: like as they do who employ the publick money of Cities which before was wont to be spent at Theaters, in exhibiting Playes and shews) about the charges of maintaining souldiers for the wars: for that which is weet, so long as it is a part of our nourishment, we hold to be proper and familiar to nature and we ought all the whilesthat we be hungry, to nie and enjoy necessary nourishment, as fweet and pleasant; but otherwise not to flir and, provoke other new and extraordinary appetites apart, after that we are delivered from those that be common and ordinary: tor like as unto Socrates himselfe, dancing was no unpleasant exercise; even to he who maketh his wholesun per or meale of junkets and banquetting dishes, catcheth less harm thereby: but when a man hath taken already as much as is sufficient to content nature, and wherewith he is well satisfied, he ought to beware as much as in any thing elfe, how he puttern forth his hands to any such dainties. And we are to flie and avoid in these things, folly and ambition, no lesse then friandise or gluttony: for these two vices induce us likewise oftentimes to eat something when we are not hungry, and to drink also when we be not athirst; yea, and they suggest and minister unto us certain base and extravagant-imaginations, to wir, that it were great simplicity, and a very about thing, not to feed liberally of a rare, deer and gealon diffi, if it may be had; as for example: That which is made of a Sowes paps when the is newly farrowed, Italian Muthrooms, Samian Cakes, or Snow out of Egypt; for these toyes and imaginations (melling somewhat of vain-glory, as the sent of meat comming, out of a Kitchin, many times fet our teeth a watering and our fromack on edge to use them, forcing the body (which otherwise would not seek after them) to participate thereof, only because they be much spoken of and hard to come by 3 to the end that we make our report and recount unto others. what we have done, and be reputed by them right happy and fortunate; for that we have enjoyed things, so decre, so singular and so geaton. The like affection they carry to women also of great name and reputation : for it falleth out, that having their own wives in bed with them, and those fair and beautiful dames, such also as love them deerly, they lie fill and fir not but if they meet with any courtifan, such as Phryne or Lais was, unto whom they have payed good filver out of their purie, though otherwise their bodies be unable, dull and heavy in performing the work of Venus. yet doing they will be, what they can, and firain themselves upon a vain-glorious ambition, to provoke and strup their lascivious lust unto fleshly pleasure: whereupon Phryne her telle, being now old and decayed, was wont to fay: That the fold her lees and dregs the dearer, by reason of her re-

A great thing it is and wonderful, that if we receive into our bodies as many pleasures as nature doth require or can well bear; or rather, if upon divers occasions and businesses, we resist her appetites, and put her off unto another time, and that we be loth and hardly brought to yeeld unto her necefficies, or (according as Plato (aith) give place, after that the hath by fine force pricked and urged us thereto, we should not suffer for all that, any harmthereby, but go away freely without any loffe or detriment; but on the other fide, if we abandon our lewes to the defires that deficend from the foul to the body, to far forth as they force us to minister unto the passions thereof, and rife up together with them, impossible it is, but that they should leave behind them exceeding great lofes and dammages, in stead of a few pleasures, and those seeble and small in appearance, which they have given unto us: and this above all things would be confidered, that we take heed how we provoke the body to pleatures, by the luft of the mind for the beginning thereof is against nature, For like as the tickling under the armholes, procureth unto the foul a laughter, which is not proper, mild and gentle, but rather troublefome & resembling some spasme or convulsion; even so all the pleasures which the body receiveth when it is pricked and provoked by the foul, beviolent, forced, turbulent, forious and unnatural. When foever therefore any occasion shall present it selfe to enjoy such rare and notable delights, it were better for us to take a glory in the abilinence, rather then in the fruition thereof, calling to mind that which Simonides was wont to lay: That he never repented anyfilence of his, but oftentimes he bestrewed himselfe for his speech: and even so we never repent that wee have refused any viands, or drunk water in stead of good Falerne wine. And therefore we ought not only, not to forcenature, but if otherwhiles we be ferved with fuch Cates and meats as she craveth, we are to divert our appetite from the same, and to reduce it to the use of simple and ordinary things many times, even for custome and exercise:

If right andlaw may broken be, for any earthly thing, The best pretence is for to win a crown, and be a King.

So faid Executes the Thebane, though untruly: but we may better lay: If we must be ambitious and defirous of glory in such things as these, it were most honest and commendable to use continence and temperance for the preservation of health. Howbeit, some there be, who upon an illiberal pinching, and mechanical sparing, can restrain and keep down their appetites when they be at homein their own houles; but if it chance they be bidden forth to others, they gorge and fill their bellies with these exquisite and costly viands; much like to those, who in time of war and hostility, raise booties and prey upon the lands of their enemies, what they can; and when they have so done, they goe from thence ill at ease, carrying away with them for the morrow (upon this their fulnesseand unfatiable repletion) crudity of flomack and indigestion. Crates therefore, the Philosopher thinking; that civil wars and tirannies arise and grow up in Cities, as well by reason of superfluity and excelle in dainty fare, as upon any other cause whatsoever, was wont by way of mirth, to give admomition in these tearms: Take heed you bring us not into a civil sedition, by augmenting the platter always before the Lentil: that is to lay, by dispending more then your revenues will beare. But indeed, every man ought to have this command and rule of himselfe, as to say: Augment not evermore the platter before the Lentil, nor at any time pass beyond the Cresses & the Olive, even to fine rarts and delicate fishes, lest you bring your body into a domestical differtion afterwards with it self; namely, namely, to painfull colicks, laskes, and fluxes of the belly, by over-much fulneffe and exceffe of feeding: for simple viands and ordinary, containe the appetite within the bounds and compasse of nature; but the artificiall devices of cookes and cunning fellows in pastry, with their curious cates of all forts, with their exquisite sauces and pickles (as the comicall Poet saith) set out and extend alwaies the limits of pleasure, encroaching till beyond the bounds of utility and profit. And I wor not verily, how it comes about, that confidering we so much detest and abhor those women, who givelove-drinks, and can skill of charmes and forceries to be witch and enchant men with, we berake thus as we do, unto mercenary hirelings or flaves, our meats and viands to be medicined (as it were) and no better than poisened for to enchant and bewitch us. And admit, that the saying of Arcefilam the Philosopher, against adulterers and other lastivious persons, may feem somewhat with the bitterest; namely, that it made no great matter, which way one went about that beastly work, whether before or behind, for that the one was as bad as the other; yet impertinent it is not, not befide the subject matter which we have in hand. For to say a truth, what difference is there be-tween eating of Ragwort, Rogket, and such hotherbs, for to stir up the lust of the sless, and to provoke the talte and appetite to meat by imels and lances? like as mangy and itching places have alwaies need of rubbing and feratching. But peradventure it would be better to referve unto another place our discourse against dishonest fleshly pleasures, and to show how how honest and venerable aching in it felfe is continence: for our purpose at this present is to debarmany great pleasures, otherwise in their own nature honest: for I assure you, our diseases do not put us by so many actions, so many hopes, voyages or pattimes as they deprive us of our pleasures, yea, and marthem quite; and thereforethey who love their delights and pleasures most had lest need of any men in the world, to neglect their health. For many there be, who for all they be fick have meanes to fludy philosophy, and discourse thereof: neither doth their sicknesse greatly hinder them, but that they may be generals in. the field to lead armies, yea, and Kings (beleeve me) to governe whole Realmes.

But of bodily pleasures and fleshly delights, some there be which during a malady will never breed; and such as are bred already yeeld but a small joy, and short contentment, which is proper and naturall unto them, and the same not pure and sincere, but consused, deprayed and corrupted with much strange stuffe, yea, and disguised and blemished as it were with some storme and tempest: for the act of Venus is not to any purpose performed upon gurmandise and a full belly, but rather when the body is calme, and the flesh in great tranquillity; for that the end of Venus is pleasure, like as of eating also and of drinking; and health unto pleasures is as much as their faire weather and kind season, which giveth them secure and gentle breeding, much like as the calme time in winter affords the sea-fowles called Aleyones, a safe cooving, sitting and hatching of their eggs. Prodicus is commended for this pretty speech : That fire was the best sauce: and a man may most truly say, That health is of all fauces most divine heavenly, and pleasant: for our viands how delicate soever they be, boiled, rosted, baked, or seeved, do no pleasure at all unto us so long as we are diseased, drunken, full of furfer, or queafie stomacked, as they be who are lea-fick; whereas a pure and cleane appetite cauteth all things to be sweet, pleasant, and agreeable unto sound bodies, yea, and such as they will be ready to inatch at, as Homer faith. But like as Demades the Oratour, seeing the Athenians without all reason, desirous of armes and war, said unto them, That they never treated and agreed of peace, but in their black robes, after the losse of kinsfolke and friends; even so we never remembertokeep a spary and sober diet, but when we come to be cauterized, or to have cataplasmes and plasters about us: we are no sooner fallen to those extremities, but then we are ready to condemne our faults, calling to mind what errours we have committed in times past; for untill then we blame one while the aire as most mendo; another while the region or countrey, as unsound and unwholfome; we find fault that we are out of our native foile, and are wonderful loath to accuse our own intemperance and disordinate appetites. And as King Lisymachus being constrained and enforced within the Country of the Getes for very thirst to yeeld himselfe prisoner, and all his army captivate unto his enemies; after he had taken a draught of cold water, faid, Good God, what a great felicity have I for gone and lost for a momentary and transitory pleasure! even so we may make use thereos, and apply the same unto our selves when we are sick, saying thus, How many delights have we marred quite? How many good actions have we fore-let? What honest passimes have we loft? and all by our drinking of cold water, or bathing unfeafonably, or elfe for that we have over-dranke our felves for good fellowship: for the bite and sting of such thoughts as these toucheth our remembrance to the quick, in such fort as the scarre remaineth still behind after that we are recovered, and maketh us in time of our health morestaied, circumspect, and sober in our diet: for a body that is exceeding found and healthy never bringeth forth vehement defires, and difordinate appetites, hardly to be tamed or withflood; but we ought to make head against them when they begin to breake forth and fling out for to enjoy the pleasures which they are affected unto; for such lusts, some compleine, pule, and cry for a little, as wentonchildren do, and no sooner is the table taken away, but they be quiet and fill; neither find they fault and make complaint of any wrong or injury offered unto them: but contrariwite, they be pure, jocund, and lightfome, not continuing heavy, nor ready to heave and cast, the next day to an end: like as by report, Captaine Timotheus, (having upon a time been at a fober and frugall scholars supper, in the Academy with Place) faid, That they who supped with Place were merry and well appaied the next day after. It is reported also, that King Alexander the Great when he turned back thu those cooks which queene Ada sent anto him, said, That he had about him all the yeare long berter of his own, namely, for his breakfast or dinner, rifing betimes, and marching before day light; and for his supper, eating little at dinner. I am not ignorant that men otherwhiles are very apt to fall into an ague upon extreame travell, upon excefive heats also and colds: but like as the odours and ients of flowers be weake and feeble of themselves; whereas if they be mixed with some oyle, they takeforce and vigour; even so fulness and repletion is the ground, which giveth (as a man would fay body and substance unto the outward causes and occasions of maladies; and of a great quantity of superfluous humours there is no danger, because all such indispositions and crudities are soon discussed, diffipared, and dissolved, when some sine or subtill bloud, when some pure spirit (I say) receiveth their motion: but where there is a great repletion indeed, and abundance of superfluities, (as it were a deep and miry puddle all troubled and stirred) then there arise from thence many malign accidents, such as be dangerous and hard to cure : and therfore we are not to do like some good maflers of ships, who never thinke their vessels be fully fraught and charged throughly; and when they have taken in all that ever they can, do nothing elie but work at the pumpe, void the finke, and calt out the fea water which is gotten in; even fo when we have well filled and fluffed our bodies, fall to purge and cleanse them with medicines and clisters: but we ought rather to keep the bodie alwaies neat, nimble, and light, to the end, that if it chance otherwise ar any time to be pressed and held down, it might be feen above for lightnesse like unto a peece of corke floating aloit upon the water: but principally we are to beware of the very precedent indispositions, which are fore-runners of maladies: for all difeases walke not (as Hesiodus faith) in silence and say nothing when they

But the most part of them have their vant-curreurs as it were, their messengers, and trumpets; namely, crudities of stomack, wearinesse, and heavinesse over all the body. According to the Aphorisme of Hippocrates; lassitudes and laborious heavinesse of the body, comming of themselves without any evident cause, prognosticate and fore-figuifie dileases; for that as it should seeme, the spirits that should passe unto the nerves and sinews are obstructed, stopped, and excluded, by the greatrepletion of humours : and albeit the body it felfe tendeth as it were to the contrary, and pulleth us to our bed and repose, yet some there be, who for very gluttony and disordinate lust, put themfelves into baines and hot-houses, making haste from thence to drinking square with good fellows, as if they would make provision before-hand of victuals against some long siege of a City, or feare that the feaver should surprise them fasting, or before they had taken their full dinner: others somewhat more honest, yea, and civill than they, are not this way faulty, but being ashamed (tooles they are) to confesse that they have eaten or drunke over-much that they seele any heavinesse in head or crudity in stomack, loath also to be known for to keep their chamber all the day long in their nightgowns, whiles their companions go to tennis and other bodily exercises abroad in publike place, and call them forth to beare them company, rife up and makerhem ready to go with them, cast off their cloaths to their naked skin, with others, and put themselves to do all that menin period health are to performe. But the most part of these (induced and drawn on, by hope perswaded) are bold to arife, and to do hardly after their wonted manner, affifted by a certaine hope, grounded upon a proverb; as an advocate to defend gourmandife, and wanton life, which advite them that they should expell wine with wine; drive or digest one surfeit with another. Howbeit, against all such hope, we are to oppose the wary and considerate caution, that Cato speaketh of (which as that wise man faith) doth diminish and lessen great things; and assorsmall matters it reduceth them to nothing: also that it were better to endure want of meat, and to keep the body empty and in quiet, than so to hazzard it, by entring into a baine, or run to an high Ordinary to dine and tup: for if there be some disposition to sicknesse, hurtfull it will be that we have not taken heed, nor contained our selves, but been secure: if none, dangerous it will not be that we have held in and restrained our selves, and by that restraint made our body to much more pure and cleare. But that childish soole who loever he be, that is afraid to let hisfriends and those of his own house know that he is amisse or ill at ease, for that he hath eaten overmuch, or surfeited with strong drinke, as being ashamed to confeffethis day his indigeftion, shall be forced to morrow even against his will, to bewray either an inordinate catarrh and fluxe, or an ague, or elfe fome wrings and torments of the belly: thou takest it for agreat shame to be known that thou didst want or were hungry : butfar greater shame it is to avow crudity and rawnesse, to bewray heavinesse, proceeding from full diet, and upon repletion of the body to be drawn neverthelesse into a baine, as if some rotten vessell or leaking ship, that would not keep out water, should be shot into the sea. Certes such persons as these resemble some sailers or sea-faring men, who in the tempessuous time of winter be ashamed to be seene. upon, the shore doing nothing: but when they have once weighed anchor, spreadsaile, and lanched into the deepe, and open sea, they are very ill appaied, crying out pitiously, and ready to cast up their gorge: even so, they that doubt some licknesse, or find a disposition of the body ready to fall into it, thinke it a great shame and discredit to stand upon their guard one day, to keep their beds and forbeare their ordinary table and accustomed diet : but afterwards with more shame, they are faine to lie by it many daies together, whiles they be driven to take purgations, to apply many cataplasmes, to speake the physicians faire, and fawn upon them, when they would have leave of them to drinke wine or cold water; being so base minded, as to do absurdly, and to speake many words impertinently, seeling their hearts to faile, and be ready to faint, for the paine they endure already, and the feare they are to abide more. Howbeit, very good it were to teach and admonish such persons (as otherwise cannot rule & contain themselves, but either yeeld, or be tranfoorted and carried away by their lusts that their pleasures take the most and best part of the body for their share. And like as the Lacedamonians after that they had given vinegar and salt to the cook, willed him to feek for the rest in the beast facrificed even so in a body which one would nourish, the best fauces for the meat are these, which are presented unto it, when it is found in health and clean; For that a dish of meat is sweet or deare is a thing by it selfe, without the body of him who taketh it, and eateth thereof: but for the pleasantnesse or contentment thereof, we ought to have regard unto the body that receiveth it; also for to delight therein, it should be so disposed as nature doth require; for otherwise, it the body be troubled, ill-affected or over-charged with wine; the best devices and lauces in the world will lose their grace, and all their goodnesse what soever: and therefore it would not be so much looked unto, whether the fish be new taken, the bread made of pure and fine flower, the bath hot, or the harlot faire and beautifull; as confidered precisely, whether the man himselfe have not a loathing stomack, apt to heave and vomit, be not full of crudities, errour, vanity, and trouble: else it will come to passe, that it shall incur the same sault and absurdity that they do, who after they are drunken, will needs go in a maske, to play and dance in an house, where they all mourne for the death of the master thereof lately deceased: sorinsead of making sport and mirth this were enough to set all the house upon weeping and pitious wailing. For even fo, the sports of love or V nis, exquisite viands, pleasant baines, and good wines, in a body ill dispofed and not according to nature, do no other good, but itir, trouble fleame and choler in them, who have no fetled and compact conflictation, and yet be not altogether corrupt; as also they troubie the body, and put it out of tune more than any thing elfe yeelding no joy that we may make any reckoning of, nor that contentment which we hoped and expected. True it is, that an exquisite diet observed streightly and precisely according to rule, and missing not one jot, causeth not only the body to be thin, hollow, and in danger to fall into many diseases; but also dulleth all the vigour, and daunteth the chearefulnesse of the very mind, in such fort, as that she suspecteth all things, and feareth continually to stay long as well in delights and pleasures, as in travelsand paines; yea, and generally in every action enterprizing nothing afforedly and with confidence: whereas we ought to deale by our body, as with the faile of a fhip; that is to fay) neither to draw it in and keep it down too straight in time of calme and saire weather, nor to spread and let it out over slack and negligently, when there is presented some suspicion of a tempest; but as occasion shall require, to ipare it, and give iome case and remission, that afterwards it may be fresh and lightiome, as hath been said already, and not to sak the time, and stay until we sensibly seele crudities, laskes, inflammations; or contrariwite, flupidities and mortifications of members, by which figns (being as it were meffengers; and uthers going before a feaver, which is hard at the doore) hardly will some be so much moved, as to keep in, and restraine themselves, (no not when the very acceffe and fit is ready to surprise them) but rather long before to be provident, and to prevent a tem-

For abfurd it is, and to no purpose, to give such carefull heed unto the crying wide throats of crows, or to the craing and cackling of hens, or to swine, when in a rage they tosse and sling straw about them (as Democritus faith) thereby togather prelages, and prognoffications of wind, raine, and stormes; and in the meane time not to observe the motions, troubles, and fiering indispositions of our bodie, nor prevent the same, ne yet to gather undoubted signes of a tempest ready to rise and grow even out thereof. And therefore we ought not only to have an eye unto the body, for meat and drinke, and for bodily exercises, in observing whether we fall unto them more lazily and unwillingly than our manner was before time; or contrariwife whether our hunger and thirst be more than ordinary; but also we are to suspect and feare, if our sleeps be not mild, and continued, but broken and interrupted: we must besides regard our very dreames; namely, whether they be strange and unufuall: for if there be represented extraordinary fancies and imaginations, they testifie and shew a repletion of grosse, viscuous, or slimy humours, and a great perturbation of the spirits within Otherwhiles also it hapneth that the motions of the soule it self do fore-signific unto us that the body is in some near danger of diseases for many times men are surprised with timorous fits of melancholly, and heartlesse distrusts without any reason or evident cause, the which suddenly extinguish all theirhopes: you shall have some upon every small occasion apt to fall into cholerick passions of anger; they become eager and hafty, troubled, penfive, and offenced with a little thing, infomuch as they will be ready to weep and run all to teares, yea, and languish for griefe and sorrow: And all this commeth when evill vapours, sowre and bitter sumes ingendred within, do arise and steame up, and and to (as Plato faith) be intermingled in the waies and passages of the toule. Those persons therefore who are subject to such things ought to thinke and consider with themselves, that if there be no spiritual cause thereof, it cannot chuse but some corporal matter had need either of evacuation, alteration, or suppression.

Expedient also it is and very profitable for us, when we visit our friends that be sick, to enquire diligently the causes of their maladies, not upon a cavelling curiofity or vaine offentation, (to difpute sophistically, and discourse thereof only, or to make a shew of our eloquence, in talking of the inflances, the intercidences, communities of dileales, and all to shew what books we have read, and that we know the words and tearmes of physick; but to make fearch and enquiry in good reau, and that the lightly or by the way, as touching these slight common and vulgar points, namely, whether the fick party be full or empty? Whether he over-travelled himselfe before, or no? and whether he slept well or ill? but principally, what diet he kept? and what order of life he followed, when he fell (tor examples fake) into the ague? then (according as Pluo was wont to fay unto himselfe, whensoever he returned from hearing and seeing the faults that other men committed:) Am not I also such an one ? So you must compose and frame your selse to learne by the harmes and errours of neighbours about yon, for to looke well unto your own health, and by calling them to mind, to be fowary and provident, that you fall not into the fame inconveniences, and forced to keep your bed, and there extoll and commend health, wishing and desiring (when it is too late) for to enjoy so precious a treature; but rather (seeing another to have caught a disease) to marke and consider well, yea, and to entertaine this deep impression in your heart; how deare the said health ought to be unto us, how carefull we should be to preserve, and chary to spare the same Moreover, it would not be amisse for a man afterwards to compare his own life with that of the soresaid patient: for if it fall out io, that (notwithstanding we have used over-liberall diet both indtinks and meats, or laboured extreamely, or otherwise committed errour in any excesse and disorder)our bodies minister unto nature no suspicion, nor threaten any signe of sicknesse toward; yet ought we neverthelesse, to take heed and prevent the harmethat may ensue; namely, if we have committed any disorder in the pleasures of Venus, and love-delights; or otherwise been over-travelled, to repole our telves and take our quiet reft; after drunkennesse or carrowing wine round for good lellowship, to make amends and recompence with drinking as much cold waterfor a time; but especially, upon a furfeit taken with eating heavy and groffe meats, and namely, of flesh, or elie feeding upon fundry and divers dishes, to fast or use a spary diet, so as there be left no superfluity in the body: for even these things, as of themselves alone (if there were no more) be enough to breed diseases; so unto other causes they adde matter and minister more thrength. Full wisely therefore was it said by our ancients in old time, that for tomaintaine our health, thele three points were most expedient: To feed without fittery; To labour with alacrity; and To preserve and make fave of natural seed. For furely lascretious intemperance in venery of all things, most decayeth and enfeebleth the strength of that naturall heat, whereby our meat and food which we receive is concocted, and fo confequently is the cause of many excrements and superfluities engendred, whereupon corrupt humours areengendered and gathered within the body.

To begin therefore to speake againe of every of these points; let us consider first the exercises meet and agreeable to students or men of learning : for like as he who first said, That he wrote nothing of Teeth to those that inhabited the sea coasts, taught them (in so saying) the use of them; even to ammay fay unto (tholars and men of learning). That he writest nothing unto them as touching bodily exercises; forthat the dayly practice of the voice by speech and pronunciation, is an exercise wonderfull effectuall, not only for health, but also for strength, I mean not such as is procured to wrestlers and champions by art, which breedeth brawny carnofity, and causeth the skin to be firme and fast without forth (like unto an house which to the outward shew is rough-cast or thick coated with lime or plaster;) but that which maketh a tough constitution and a vigorous firmitude and firength indeed in the noblest parts within, and the principall instruments of our life. Now, that the spirits augment and confirme the powers of our body, the annointers of mens bodies in the place of publike exercife know full well, when they give order and command the wret-lers, and fuch like, when their limbs are rubbed, to with fland fuch frictions in fome fort, in holding their wind observing precisely, and having an eye to each part of the body that is handled or rubbed. The voice therefore (being a motion of the spirit (fortified, not superficially and by starts, but even inthe proper fountaines and forings which are about the vitall bowels) encreaseth naturall heat) doth subtiliat the bloud, cleanseth the veines, openethall the arteries, not suffering any obstruction, oppilation, or stopping by superfluous humours to grow upon us, or remaine behind (like unto dregs or grounds) in the bottome of those vessels which receive and concost those viands whereof we are nourished : by reason whereof they have need to use ordinarily this exercise, and make it samiliar unto them by speaking in publike place, and discouring continually. But if haply they doubt that their bodies be but weake, and not able to support and endure so much travell, yet at least wife they are to read with a loud voice; for look what proportion there is between gestation of carriage of the body, and the exercise thereof upon the very ground, the same is between simple reading and discoursing, or open disputation: for this reading doth gently stir and mildly carry the voice by the chariot (as it were) and litter of another mans speech; but disputation addeth thereto a certaine heat and forcible vehemence; for that the mind and the body conspire and concurre together in that action : howbeit, in this exercise we must beware of over-loud vociferations and clamours; for such violent strainings of the voice, and unequall extensions and intensions of the wind, many times cause some rupture of veines, or inward spasmes and convulsions. Now when a student hath either read or discoursed in this manner, good it is for him before he walke abroad, to use some unctious, warme, and gentle frictions, to handle and rub the skin and flesh after a foft and mild manner; yea, and as much as he can to reach into the very bowels within that the spirits may be pread and distributed equally throughout, even to the very extremities of the body. In these rubbings and frictions this gage and measure would be observed, that he continue them to long, and to often as he findeth them to agree sensibly with his body, and bring no offence with them. He that in this wise hath appeared and setled the trouble or tension of the spirits in the center of the body, if haply there should remaine some superfluity behind, it would do him no great harme: for fay, that he should forbeare walking for want of leifure, or by occasion of sudden businesse, it is all one, and it maketh no matter; for why, nature hath had already that which is sufficient, and standeth latisfied therewith. And therefore a man is not to pretend colourably for to excute his filence, or to bearance of reading either navigation, when he is accompanied with other paffengers at fea in one ship, or his abode and so journing in an hosselry or common inne, although all the company there should mock him for it: for as it was no shame nor dishonest thing to eate before them all, no more unfeemly is it to exercise himselfe in their presence by reading. But rather more undecent it were to be affraid or fland in aw of marriners, muliters, or inne-keepers, when they laugh at you, not forplaying at ball alone, or fighting with your own shadow, but for speaking beforethem in your speech, either teaching, or discoursing, or else learning by roat, and rehearling some good thing for your exercise. Socrates was wont to lay, That for him who would move and flir his body by way of dancing, a little roome (that would receive leven fertles or feats) wasfufficient and big enough; but him that mindeth to exercise his body either by singing or saying, every place will ferve, whether he stand, lie, or sit. Only this must we take heed of, that we straine not our voice, nor fet out an open throat, when we are privyto our felves that we have eaten or drunke liberally, ne yet prefently after the company of a woman, or any other wearifome travell what foever: as many of our Orators and great Malters of Rhetorickuse to do; who enforce and give themselves to declaime and pronounce their Orations too loud, even above the strength of their body; some for vain-glory and ambition, because they would put forth themselves; others for reward, and toget afee, or elle upon emulation to their concurrents. Thus did Niger, (afriend of ours) who profeffed Rhetorick in Galatia: this man having swallowed down afish-bone which Ruck still in his throat (when another Rhetorician, travelling that way, chanced to make a publike Oration; for that he was ashamed to be thought his inferiour, and yet durst not deale with him in that faculty) would needs their himselie in open place, and declaime, whiles the faid bone remained still in his troat: but by this meanes there entued a dangerous and painfull inflammation; and being no longer able to endure the dolorous anguish thereof, he suffered himselfe to be launced without forth, and to have a deep incision and a wide orifice made, whereby the bone indeed was plucked out, but the was to grievous, and oppressed beside with a descent and dessurion of rheumatick humours thither, that he died thereof. But haply, better to the purpole it were to speake of this hereafter. Well, after exercise to go presently into the bath, and to wash in cold water, were the part of a lusty wild brain and a giddy-headed youth, who will needs in a bravery shew what he can do rather than wholsome any way: for all the good that such cold baths bring is this, that they seeme to harden the body, and confirme it so as it is lesse subject to take offence by the qualities of the aire without; but surely they do more harme within by a great deale; for that they enclose and shur up the pores of the body, causing the humours and sumolities which would evaporate and breath forth continually to become thick and grosse. Furthermore, needfull it is for them that love to bath thus incold water to fall into the subjection of that over-straight and exquisite diet, (which we would avoid having evermore an eye upon this, notto breake the fame in any point whatfoever, for that the least fault and smallest exrour in the world is prefently chastised and costeth full deare: whereas contrariwise to enter into the baine, and wash in hot water pardoneth us, and holdeth us excused for many things; for it doth not fomuch diminish the strength and force of the body; as it bringeth profit another way for the health thereof; framing and applying most gently and kindly the humours to concoction: and in case there be some which cannot well and perfectly be digested, (so they be not alrogether crude and raw, nor float aloft in the mouth of the stomack) it causeth them to dissolve and exhale without any fense of paine; yea, and withall, it doth mitigate and cause to vanish and passe away the secret lassitudes of the musculous members. And yet as good as bases be, if we perceive the body to be in the naturall flate and disposition, firme and strong enough, better it were to intermit and for-let the wie of baths; and instead thereof I hold it wholsomer to annoint and rub the body before a good fire, namely, if it have need to be chafed and let in a heat; for by this means there is dispersed into it as much heat as is requifite, and no more; which cannot be against the sun; for of his heat a man cannot take more or leffe at his own discretion, but according as he affecteth or rempereth the aire, to he affordeth his nie. And thus much may serve for the exercise of students.

To come now unto their food and nutrure: if the reasons and instructions before delivered, by which we learne to restraine represse, and mitigate our appetites, have done any good, time it were to proceed forward to other advertisements; but in case they be so violent, so untily and uniamed; as if they were newly broken out of prison, that it is an hard piece of work to rank them within the compasse or eason; and if it be a difficult peece of work to wrestle with the belly, which Ass Case was wont to (ay) have no eats; we must work another seat and device with its namely, by observing the quality of the viands, to make the quantity more light and less officers and if they be such as be solid and nourish much; as for example, grosse shelf mears, cheefe, dry siggs, and hard eggs;

they must feed of them as little as they can; for to refuse and forbeare them altogether were very hard; but they may be more bold to eate heartily of those that be thin and light, such as are the most part of worts, or pot-herbs, birds, and fifnes, that be not fat and oylclons for in eating of fush meats a man may at once bothgratifie his appetite, and also never overcharge his body: but above all, take heed they must of crudities and jurieits, proceeding from liberall eating of flesh-meats; for befides that they load the flomack presently as they are taken there remaine afterwards behind naughty reliques: and therefore, it were very well, that they accultomed their bodies never to call for flefly, confidering that the earth it felfebringeth forth other kinds of food, sufficiently not only for the necessity of nourithment, but also for pleasure and the contentment of the appetite; for some of them are ready to be eaten without any drefling, or the help of mans hand, others be mingled and compounded after diversions to make them more favory and toothfome. But for almuch as cuflome(alter a fort)is a fecond nature; or at least wife not contrary to nature; we must not accustome our felves to feed on flesh, for to fulfill our appetites, after the manner of wolves, and lions, but use it only as the foundation and ground of other viands; which being once laid, we are to make our principall nourithment of other cates and dishes, which as they are more appropriate to our bodies, and futable to nature to they do incraffate and dull leffe the vigour and fubrility of the spirit, and the discouring reasonable pair of the soule, which is kindled, maintained, and set to burne cleare, by a more delicate and light matter. As touching liquid things, they mult use milke, not as an ordinary drinke, but as a strong meat that nominibeth exceeding much but for wine, we are to say to it, as Enripides did to Vensus:

Precepts of Health.

Welcome to me in mensure and in means, Too much is naught: yet do not leave me cleave. For of all drinks it is most profitable, of medicines most pleasant, and of dainty viands most harmleffe; provided alwaies that it be well delayed and tempered with opportunity of the time, rather: than, with water. And verily water (not that only wherewith wine is mingled, but also which is drunke between whiles, apart by it felfe Jeauseth the wine tempered therewith to do the leffe harm: in regard whereof, a student ought to use himselfe to drinke twice or thrice every day a draught of sheere water, for that it will enseeble the headinesse of the wine, and make theusuall drinking of pure water more familiar to the stomack: and this I would have to be done, to this end, that if they be dragen perforce to drinke faire water, they might not thinke it strange nor be ready to refuse it. For many, there be, who oftentimes have recourle to wine, when iwis, they had more need to run to the water; and namely, when they be over-heat with the fun; yea, and contrariwife, when they be fliffe frozen with cold, or have strained themselves to speake much, or studied and sitten hard at their book; and generally, after that they have travelled fore, till they be weary, or have performed some vehement exploit, or violent exercise; then (I say) they thinke; that they ought to drinke wine; as if nature her felie required and called for some contentment and refreshing of the body, and some change and alteration after travels: but nature verily is not desirous to have any good done to her in this fort, if you calliuch pleafure a doing of good; but the demandeth only a reducement to a meane between labour and reft: and therefore such persons as these are to becut short and abridged of their victuals and either to be debarred quite of all wine or elleen joyned to drinke it well delayed with water: for wine being of it felfe of a violent and ftirring nature, augmenteth and maketh more unquiet the stormy perturbations arising within the body, is doth irritate and diftemper more and more the parts therein already offended and troubled; the which had much more need to be appeased and dulced; to which purpose water serveth passing well : for if we otherwife being not athirfl, drinke hot water after we have laboured, or done some painfull exercise, in the exceeding heats of the summer; we find a notable cooling, refreshing, and easement in our inward bowels; the reasonis, because the humidity of water is kind and mild, procuring no debate or disquietnesse at all; whereas the moisture of wine hath a vehement force, which never is at quiet and repose, but maketh a deep impression, nothing agreeable nor fit to appeale the indispositions that are a breeding. Now if one do feare the four eard sharpe actimonies, and the bitter taltes which (by the laying of some) hunger and want of food engender in our bodies, or as little childem ule to do, thinketh much not to fit at the table for to eate, a little before the fit of an ague, or when he suspecteth it comming: the drinking of water is as it were a confine and frontier between both, very ficto remedy the one and the other; and many times we offer unto Bacchus himselfe certaine sacrifices called Nephalia, for that there is no wine used therein; accustoming our selves wicely thereby not to be alwaies defirous for to drinke wine. Minas tooke away from facrifices, the flute, and the chaplets nied to be worne on mens heads, in regard of griefe and forrow: and yet we know full well, that the heavy and fortowfull mind is neither by flutes nor flowers paffionate; whereas there is not the body of a man, (how strong and stout soever he be) but if it be stirred troubled, and enflamed, will take more harme and offence by wine if it be taken or powred into it. It is recorded in the Chronicles, that the Lydians in time of a great dearth and famine did eate but once in two daies, and spent the time between at dice-play, and other such games and pastimes : and even so it were well beleeming a student & lover of the Muses and his book, at such a time as he had need to make a late and short supper to have before him the figure serving for some Geometrical propohitton, or some little book, some harpefor lute; this will not suffer him to be led as prisoner to his own belly, but by diverting and turning ordinarily his mind from the boord, to these honest pastimes and recreations; will chase away from the Mules the greedy appetite of earing and drinking, as if they were so many ravenous sowles and harpies: For a shame it were that a Scythian whiles he is drinking should eftloones take his bow in hand ready bent, and twang the string, and by the found thereof awaken and quicken his courage, which otherwise would become drowlie, loose, and dull by wine: and that a Grecian should be ashamed or affraid of a flour or mock, in asfaying gently to refraine and bridle an unrealonable, violent, and greedy appetite, by the meanes of books and writings: for much after the same manner in a comedy of Menander, when there was a bawd, who for to tempt certaine young men fitting at supper together, brought in amongst them certaine pretty young wenches, very faire, and richly arraid severy one of the laid young men (becausethey were afraid and unwilling to look those beautifull damosels in the face) made no more ado, but ashe faith:

Precepts of Health.

Caft down the head, and like good merry mates, Full to their junkers bard, and dainty cates.

Moreover, men that are addicted to their fludy, and to learning, have many other proper and pleafant meanes to turne away their eyes, and divert their minds, if otherwise they be not able to looke off; and to stay or hold in this violent and dog-like greedy appetite, when the meat standeth before them upon the board. For as touching the speeche's of some masters of wrestlers, or the words of certaine schoole-masters, who go up and down, saying, That to reason, argue, and discourte at the table upon points of learning, causeth the meat to corrupt within the flomack, and breedeth head-ach, or heavinesse of the braine: we may indeed seare somewhat; if we will needs (while; we be at our repast) fall to rejoive such a sophisticall argument, as the Logicians call Indos: or if we be interest disposed to reason and dispute about the masteriul sophisme, named Kyritton: It is said, that the hor Troofcrown or upmost tuft growing upon the date tree, called the brainethereof, is exceeding sweet, and pleasant to the taste, yet hurtfull to the head: howbeit, these pricky and intricate disputations in vibich some Logick at supper time; are no pleasant banqueting dishes, but offensive to the braine, tedious, interpret, the and irkefome, nothing more. But if those men will not permit us to discourse, to heare, read, out bad handst talke of other matters in supper time, which together with honesty and profit, have an articalities being brade being brade to the control of the contro pleafure and fivectenefic pyned therewith: we will defire them to let us alone, and not trouble us, substitute but to artic from the table, and go their waies into their galleries and hals for investiling, and there a substitute is the substitute of the substitute to hold and maintaine such positions among their schollars and champions, whom they we that we tage the and turne away from the fludy of good letters; and accult oming them to spend their time all the and turnea way from the fludy of good letters; and accultoming them to spend their time at the property day long in leoftes and feurrile speeches, they make them in the end (as gentle Ar flow land,) as should be observed in the control of the land, as should be observed in the control of the land, as should be observed in the control of the land, as should be observed in the control of the land, as should be observed in the control of the land, as should be observed in the land, as should be observed day ining in content and fathing species, they made alternative (special the widelie, and without fend (yet gib) and well greated) as the figne pillars which support those galbring there.

It is a support of the pillar with the pil ing ruled by the Phylicians, who advice is alwajes to interpole fome competent timebetween imper and fleep, are not prefently to go unto it, giter we have fulled our belies with viands, and fluided our fpirits, even whiles the moriels of meat be all raw, or beginning now to be concoded, thereby to hinder and flay digetion; but give fome space and breathing rime between, until the meat be well fetled in the stomack. And as they who give us counsell to move and stir the body after meales, will us, not to run our feives out of breath, nor to exercise ourselves to, as that we put all the parts of our body to the triall, after the manner of the Pancratialis; but either to walke faire and loftly or to daunce after a gentle and easie manner; semblably, we are to thinke that we ought to exercife our wits and mi dsafter a dinner or impper, not about any affaires of deep study, and pro-found meditation, nor in sophistical disputes, tending to the oldentation of a guick and lively pri-nt for which be living our and breed contention; but there be many questions besides of naturally hilosophy, pleasant to be discussed, and easie to be decided; many pretty tales and narrations there are, out of which a man may draw good confiderations and wile inflructions, for to traine and frame; our manners; and these contains that grace and facility in them, which the Poet Homer calleth Menotikes, that is to lay, yeelding to anger and in no wile crosse and resistant : Hereupon it is that some do pleasantly tearme this exercise of moving, propounding, and resolving historicall or poeticall queftions; the second course or the service of banketting dilhestor students and learned men. Moreover, there be other forts of pleasant talke besides theie, and namely, to heare and recite sables, devised for mirch and pleasure; discourses of playing upon the flute, harpe, or lute, which many times, give more contentment and delight, than to heare the flute, harpe, or lute it felfe plaied upon. Now the very precise time measured as it were and marked out to be most proper and meet for such recreations; is when we feele that our meat is gently gone down, and fetled quietly in the bottome of the stomack shewing some tigue of concoction, and that natural heat is strong, and hath gotten the upper hand.

Now for simuch as Aristotle is of opinion, that walking after supper doth stirup and kindle (as one would fay) our naturall heat: and to fleep immediately after a man hath supped, dorh dull and quench it: confidering allo, that others be of a contrary mind, and hold, that rest and repose. is better for concoction; that motion so soon after troubleth and impeacheth the digestion and di-Aribution of the meats, which is the cause that some use to walke after supper, others sit still and take their eale: me thinks a man may reconcile and fatisfie very well after a fort their two opinions; who cherishing and keeping his body close and still after supper, setteth his mind a walking, awakeneth it, suffering it not to be heavy and idle at once by and by; but sharpneth and quickneth his fpirits, as it beforefaid, by little and little, in difcouffing, or hearing difcourses of pleafant matters and delectable, such as be not biting in any wife, nor offensive and odious.

Moreover, as touching vomits or purgations of the belly by laxative medicines, which are the curied and detellable easements and remedies of suinesse and repletion; surely they would never be used but upon right great and urgent necessity: a contrary course to many men, who fill their gorges and bodies with an intent to void them soone after; or otherwise, who purge and empty the same forto fill them againe, even against nature; who are no lesse troubled, nay, much more offended ordinarily, by being fed and full, then fasting and empty: insomuch as such repletion is an hinderan.e to the contentment and fatisfying of their appetites and lufts; by occasion whereof they take order alwaies, that their body may be evermore emptied; as if this voidance were the proper place and feat of their pleasures. But the hurt and dammage that may grow upon these ordinary purgations and vomits is very evident: for that both the one and the other put the body to exceeding great straines and violent disturbances. As for vomiting, it bringeth with it one inconvenience by it felle, more than theformer, in that it procureth and augmenteth an unfatiable greedinesse to meat: for ingendred there is by that means a violent and turbulent hunger (like as when the course or streame of a river hath been for a while stopped and staid Inatching or greedy at meat, which is evermore offenfive and not a kind appetite indeed, when as nature hath need of meat; but refembling rather the inflammations occasioned by medicines or cataplasmes. Hereupon it is that the pleasurus proceeding from thence passe and slip away incontinently, as abortive and unperfect, accompanied with inordinate pantings and beatings of the pulse, great wrings in the enjoying of them, and afterwards enfue dolorous tenfions, violent oppressions or stoppings of the conduits and pores, and the reliques or retentions of ventofities; which flay not for naturall ejections and evacuations, but run up and down all over our bodies, like as if they were ships furtharged, having more need to be eated of their burden, than still to be laden with more excrements. As for the troublesome motions of the belly and guts, occasioned by purgative drugs, they corrupt, spill, and resolve the natural strength of the folid parts, so that they engender more inpersuities within than they thrust out and expell. And this is for all the world like as if a man, being discontented to see within his native City a multitude of naturall Greeks inhabitants, should for to drive them out fill the same with Scythians or Arabian strangers. For even so, somethere be, who (greatly miscounting and deceiving themselves) for to fend forth of their bodies the superfluous humours which are in some fort domesticalland familiar unto them, put into them I wot not what, Gnidian graines, Scammony, and other flrange drugs fet from far Countries, such as have no familiar reference to the body, but are meere wild and favage, and in truth have more need to be purged and chased our of the body themselves, than power and vertue to void away and expell that wherewith nature is choaked and overcharged. The best way therefore is, by tobriety and regular diet to keep the body alwaies in that moderate meafure of evacuation and repletion, that it may be able by proportionable temperature to maintaine it-felfe without any outward help. But if it fall out other whiles, that there be some necessity of the one or the other, vomits would be provoked without the help of strange physicall drugs, and not with much ado and curiofity that they disquiet and trouble no parts within, but only for to avoid crudity and indigettion, reject & cast up that gently which is too much, and cannot be prepared and mademeet for concoction. For like as linnen cloaths that be scoured and made cleane with sopes, ashes, lees, and other abstersive matters, weare more and fret out sooner than such as be washed fimply infaire water; even so, vomits provoked by medicines offend the body much more, and mar the complexion. But lay, the belly be bound and coffive, there is not a drug that easeth it so mildly, or provoketh it to the fiege so easily, as do certaine meats, whereof the experience is familiarunto us, and the use nothing dolorous and offensive. Now in case the body be so hard that such kind viands will not worke and cause it to be soluble, then a man ought for many daies together to drinke thin and cold water, or use to fast, or else take some clitter, rather than purgative medicines, such as disquiet the body, and overthrow the temperature thereof. And yet many there be, who ever and anon are ready to run unto them; much like unto those lewd and light wanton women who use certaine medicines to cause abortion, or to send away the fruit which they have newly conceived; to the end that they might conceive foon again, and have more pleasure in that fleshly action. Now it is time to say no more, but to let them go that perswade such evacua-

As for those on the contrary side, who interject certaine exact, precise, and critical satings, observed too straightly according to just periods and circuits of daies: surely they teach nature, (wherein they do not well) to use astriction before it have need; and acquaint her with a necessary abstinence of food, which in it selfe is not necessary, even at a prefixed time, which calleth for that then whereto it is accustomed. Better yet, it were for a man to use these chaltiements of his body freely and at his own liberty, without any fore-knowledge or suspition: and as for other diet, (as hath been said before knowledge to order it so, that it may frame and be obsequent to all manner of occurrences and changes that shall come between, and not be tied and bound to one forme and manner of life, exactly to keep certaine daies, just numbers, and set circuits, without failing or missing in any jot. For this course is neither sure, no reasse; it is not civil, not yet agreeable to sumanity: it results in the cannot change or alter his viands; he may not once vary in his stiftings and assigning and saffingeries.

abstinencies, in his motions or repose, but continue alwaies close and covert in a shady kind of life. idle, private to himselfe, without convering with friends, without participation of honours, farremote from the administration of weale publike, which were to shut himselfe up as it were a close prisoner; a life I assure you which I cannot like nor allow: for we cannot buy our health with idlenesse and doing naught; which two are the principall inconveniences incident unto dileases: and all one this were, as if a man would think to preferve his eyes, by not employing them to fee; or his voice, by speaking not at all; thus to be perswaded, that for the preservation of health it were necessary to have continual repose, without doing ought: for a man in health, cannot do better for tomaintaine the tame, than to be employed in many good duties, and commendable offices of humanity. An abiturd errour therefore it is, to thinke idlenesse to be either healthy or wholesome, confidering that it deliroyeth the very end of health, which is employment: neither is it true, that the lette men do, the more healthfull they be. For Xenocrates had not his health better than Phocion; nor Theophrastus than Demetrius: and assor Epicurus and all the crew of his sectaries, they had no benefit at all for the attaining of that contentment and tranquillity of the body which they make so great reckoning of, and praise to highly; by flying and avoiding all State affaires, and medling in no publike and honourable office. Other meanes therefore and provision would be made to entertaine and keepe that di position and habitude of the body, which is according to nature: for this is certaine, that all forts of life be capable, as well of ficknesse as of health. Howbeir, Politicians (quoth he) and States-men are to be admonished to do cleane contrary unto that which Plato advertifed his young tcholars to do. For Plate ever as he went out of the schoole was wont thus to lay unto them: Go to my fons, see you employ that leisure which you have in some honest sports and pattimes. But we may exhort and put in mind those who deale in the administration of Common-wealth to bestow their labour and travell in honest and necessary things, and not to overtoile and spend their bodies in small matters of little or no consequence; as the manner is of most men, who trouble and torment themselves about just nothing, overwatching, running to and fro, here and there, up and down about things which many times are neither good nor honelt; but only because they would disgrace and shame others, either upon envy that they beare unto them, or upon obsitnate and wilfull selfe-conceit, or else to pursue and maintaine some vaine and foolish opinions that they have taken. For I thinke verily it was in regard of such persons especially, that Democritus faid, If the body should call the soule judicially into question upon an action of injury or wrong done, and for to make latisfaction of losse and dammage; she were not able to answer it, but must needs confesse the action, and be condemned. And Theophrastus peradventure faid well and truly, when speaking by a metaphor or allegory; he affirmed, that the foule paid a deare rent for her dwelling within the body. For (I affureyou) the body may thanke the foule for many harmes that it fulfaineth; when as fhe ufeth it not with reason, no intreateth it according as it is meet and convenient; and looke when she hath any proper and peculiar passions of her owne, or some enterprizes and actions to be performed, the makethno spare of the poorebody. As sorthe tyrant Jason, he was wont (I wot not upon what reason or ground) to say. The the ought to deale unjustly in small matters, who would be just in the greatest affaires; and even so, we may well advise a man of State, and Government, to make no reckoning of trifling things, but disport, play, and solace himselfe in repose with them; if he would not have his body over-spent, dull, or lazy, against the time that he should employ it in great and important causes: much like to an old shippe which hath been drawn up to land, for to be newly calked and trimmed, after it hath refted a time, is fit to do new service at sea; for even so, the body upon repote and ease, whensoever the soule shall put it to any affaires, will be ready to fol-

And therefore when occasions will permit and give leave, we are to refresh and recreat our selves, not envying the bodies natural fleep, or usual repole and refection of dinner, ne yet easement and recreation which is of a middle nature between pleasure and paine, nor observing a strict rule; which many men do keep, and in keeping it. spill and spend the body by sudden mutations; like as iron that is often made hot and quenched againe: for whenfoever the body is foiled and tired with travels, then they will even melt and diffolio it in exceffive and unmeasurable pleasures: and all upon the sudden againe, when it is weakned and enfeebled with the delights of Venus, or by drinking out of course they will draw and drive it presently to the serious travels of the Common Hall or the Court, to the solliciting and sollowing of some affaires of great importance, which require the amelt attendance and hot perfuit. Herselium the Philosopher, being fallen into a dropsie, willed his Physician to make drought of great raine. But most men ordinarily do sault herein exceeding much: now when they be wearied, toyled, and foiled with painfull labouts and wants, yeeld their bodies to be meited and ipent quire with voluptuous pleasures; and afterwards againe, wrest and straine them as it were upon the teinters, immediately upon the fruition of iome pleasures. For nature verily neither liketh nor requireth these alterations and sudden changes by turnes: but it is the incontinency and il iberall late iviousnesse of the soule, and nothing elfe, that abandoneth her selfe inordinately unto p easures and delights, to soone as it is out of laborious exercises; like as mariners and failers do at lea. And contrarivise, immediately after sports and pleasures, betaketh it selfeto the egger pursuit of gain, and to the mannagement of great affairs giving no time and space of rest to nature to enjoy repole and quiet tranquillity, whereof it hath need, but fetteth it out of frame, and diflempereth it mightily, by reason of this inequality. But wise and discreet persons are very wary and carefull in this behalfe; neuer presenting such pleasures to their bodies when they be out-wearied with labour and travell, for need thereof they have none at all; and besides, they do not regard nor thinke upon them, having their minds continually intentive upon the honelty and decency of the action or thing whereabout they are; dulling or dimming as well the joy as the earnest solicitude and care of their mind, by the meanes of other delires and appetites; as it is written of Epaminozdus, that he should say in game and merriment, of a certaine valiant man, who about the time of the Leuchtique war died of ficknesse in his bed : O Hercules, how had this man any leisure to dye amidit fo many important affaires! even so it may be faid truly and in good earnest of a great personage, who hath in his hand the mannaging of some weighty affaires in matter of government, or treatile of Philosophy: How should such a man as he have time either to be drunken, or to surfet with gluttony, or given himselie to fleshly pleasures of the body? But wisemen indeed, when they be freed from important matters of action can find a time to relt and repose their bodies, discharging them of · needlesse and unprositable travels, but much more of superstances and unnecessary pleasures, slying and flunning them as enemies and contrary to nature.

I remember that upon a time I heard, how Tiberim Cefer was wont to fay, That a man being once above threefcore yeares of age deferveth to be mocked and derided if he pur forth his hand unto the Phylician for to have his pulle felt. For mine own part, I take this fixech of his too be fomewhat too proud and infolent; but me thinks this fhould betrie, That every man ought to know the particularities and properties of his own pulle, for there be many divertities and differences in each one of us a flot hat it behoveth no man tobe ignorant in the leverall complexion of his own body, as well in heart as in drineffe: allo to be skilfull what things be good for him, and what be hunfull, when he ufeth them: for he that would learne thefe particularities of any other than 6 himfelie, or goeth to a Phylician to know of him, whether he be better in health in lummer time than in winter, or whether he I than dbetter affected in taking dry things rather than moils; allo whether naturally he have a ftrong put or a weake, a quit k or a flows i urely hat no fenic or feeling of hindelfe, but is asit were deafe and bind, a thranger he is dwelling in a borrowed body, and none of his own for fuch points as those are good to be be known and easie to be learned, for that we may make proofe thereof every houre, as having the body with us continually.

Alto meet it is, among meats and drinks, to know those rather which be good and who!some for the flomack, than fuch as be pleafant to the tooth; and to have experience of that which doth the Romack good, more than of that which is offensive thereto; as also of those things that do not trouble and hind reoncoction, than which content and tickle the taffe. For to demand of a Phyfician what is easie of digeltion, and what not; what doth loofe, and what bindeth the belly; me thinks is no leffe shamefull than to aske him, what is sweet, what bitter, what lowre, tart, or authere. But now we shall have many folk that know well how to find fault with their cooks and dressers of meat, for featoning their broths, or making fauce to their viands, being able to difcern which is fweeter than it ought to be; which is over-tart or too much falted: and yet they themselves are not able to fay, whether that which is put into the body and united therewith be light or no; and whether it be harmclesse, not offensive, or profitable. Herenpon it is, that their pottage milleth not often the right feafoning; whereas contrariwite, for want of well feafoning their own felves, but daily faulting therein they makemuch worke for Phylicians: for they effeeme not that pottage best which is the sweetest, but they mingle therewith many sharp juyces and source herbs, to make it somewhat tatt withall ibut contrariwile, they fend into the body all manner of sweet and pleasant things, even untill it cry, Ho; partly being ignorant, and in part not calling to mind and remembran e. that nature adjoyneth alwaies unto things that be good and wholfome, a pleasure not mingled with displeasure and repentance. Moreover, we are likewise to remember and beare in mind all those things that be fit and agreeable to the body; or contrariwite, in the changes of the seasons in the yeare in the qualities and properties of the aire, and other circumstances, to know how to accommodate and apply our diet accordingly: for astouching all the offences proceeding from niggardie, avari.e, and pinching, which the common fort do incurabout the painfull inning and laborious bestowing or laying up of their corn and fauits; who by their long watchings, by their running and trudging to and fro, discover and bewray what is within the body, rotten, faulty, and ulcerous: we are not to feare, that fuch accidents will befall to learned persons or students, ne yet to States-men and Politicians, unto whom principally I have addressed this discourse; but they ought to beware and eschew another kind of more eager coverousnesse and illiberall niggardise in matter of study and literature, forcing them to neglect and not regard their own poore bodies, which oftentimes being so travelled and outwearied, that they can do them no more service, yet they spare them never the more, nor give them leave to be refreshed and gather up their crums again; but force that which is fraile and mortall, to labour a vie with the foule which is immortall: that (I fay) which is earthly, to hold out with the spirit that is heavenly. Well the Oxe said unto the Camel his sellow-servant who would not ease him a little of hisburden: Thou wilt not help me now to beare somewhat of my hargesbut shortly thou shalt carry all that I carry, and me besides: which fell out to indeed when the Oxe died under his burden; semblably it hapneth to the soule, which will not allow the filly body (wearied and tired) some little time of reft and repofe: for soon after comes a seaver, head-ach, dizzinesse of the brain, with a dimnesse of the sight, which will compell her to lay associated all books, to abandon all good letters, disputations and study a and in the end is driven to languish and lie sick in bed together with it company. And therefore Plato wisely admonisheth us not to move and exercise the body without the soule, nor the soule without the body, but to drive them both together equally, as if they were two steeds drawing at one spire of a chariot; and especially a fust at time, when as the body is buffed with the soule, and laboureth together with her, we ought to have the most care of it, and to allow it that attendance and cherishment which is meet and requisite, to the end that thereby we may require it with good and destrable health; esteeming this to be the greatest benefit and most singular gift that proceedeth thereupon, in that neither the one nor the other sor default of good disposition) is impeached or hindered in the knowledge of vertue and the practise thereof, as well in literature as in the actions of mans life,

Of the Romans Fortune.

The Summary.

I F over there were any State pilitike in the rifing, growth, and declination whereof we are to fee and ac-knowledge the admirable providence of God, together with the firength and wisdome of man, certes the Roman Empire ought to be set in the formost range. The causes of the foundation and advancement of this great Monarchy, are otherwise considered by those whom the heavenly truth (revealed in the hely Scripture) acts illuminate, than by the Pagant and Sages of this world, guided only by the discourse of their reason, corrupted with sin and ignorance of the true God. For when the quistion is, at touching the generament of the univerfall world, all hough the fover aigne Lord thereof use often times the firitual and corporate vigour both of mortall menfor to execute his will; yet we may behold above it, and before any exploit of visible instruments, this great and incomprehensible wisdome of his; who having decreed in himselfe all things, executeth every moment his deliberations; so that in regard of him there is nothing casuall, but all kepa cow s according to his determinate and resolute will: but in respect of in many things be accidentally for that the counsels of that eternall and immutable wisdome are hidden from su, and appeare not but by little and little. Infidels and miscreams, who are not able to comprehend this secret, have imagined and fet down for governesset of mans life, Fortune and vertue; meaning by Fortune, that which the common sying compriset hin these sew words: In this world there is nothing else but good luck and had; but so, as if any man could kill how to manning his own fortune, he might make it of bad good and commodious and this they mean by the word Vertue, which is an habitude or disposition of the mind and bedy i by the meanes whereof he that is indued therewith, might prevent and overthrow quite all the all aults of Fortune. Some there be, who abuse the word Fortune, for to abol h the providence of God; and others have attributed for much unto Vertue, that they have fet man out of those limits, in which his own proper nature, and above all the divine truth placed him. Others againe, have ascribed something unto Fortune, and yet they neither understandnor declare what it importeth, but have given out (although very irresolutely) that Fortune cannot give the check to a vertuous man. If we had this Treatife following entire and perfit, all the ancient philosophy and learning as touching this question, had been manifesth discovered unto us. But the prin-cipal part of this discourse is test, in such sort, as Plutarch (having brought in Fortune and Vertue disputing upon this point: Whether of them should have the honour of the foundation and maintenance of the Roman Empire? hath left unto us nothing but the plea of Fortune; who by divers reasons and proofes holdeth that the wildome and valour of the people of Rome, was not the cause of their grandeur but Fortune, that isto fur (as he exprest sheweth in one place) the guidance and help of God, who hath so raised this estate for many others, and for to hold one good part of the world joyntly in one body, under such a chiefe and soveraigne. Asconcerning the reasons alledged in the favour and maintenance of Fortune, they be marked in order, and drawn out well at large: whereas those of Vertue are omitted, or peraduent were ferved to the judgement and discretion of the Reader, for to invent, devise, and apply them by himselfe, and of them all to collett and gather one conclusion, tending to this, for to show the great wonders of God providence in suffar-ning the Roman Empire, and the notable aide of an infinite number of instruments, which the said di-vine providence employed in planting, raising up, and pulling down so mighty and renowned adomini-

Of the Romans Fortune.

Furue and Fortune have fought many great combates, and those oftentimes one against the other: but that which presentes it selfe unto us at this time is the greatest of all the rest; to wit, the debate and plea which they had together as touching the Empire of Rome, namely; whether of them twaine wrought that worke? and which of them brought forth so mighty a pussance? For this will be no small testimony on her side who shall gaine the victory, or rather rather a great apology against the imputation charged upon the one and the other. For Vertue is accused, in that she is honest, but unprofitable: and Fortune, that she is uncertaine, but yet good: and it is commonly faid, that as the former is fruitleffe for all her paines; fo the other is faithleffe and untrulty in all hergifts. For who will not fay, if the greatnesse of Rome be adjudged and awarded to one of them, that either Vertue is most prohtable, in cale she could do so much for good and honest men; or Fortune most firme and constant, if she have preserved and kept so long that which she once hath given? In the Poet in those works of his which he composed without verse, and in prose, saith, That Fortune and Wisdome (two most different things, and far unlike one to the other) produce nevertheleffe most like and semblable effects: both the one and the other indifferently make men great and honourable; they advance them in dignity, puissance, estate, and authority. And what need I (for to draw out this matter at length) rehearse and reason up a number of those whom they have preferred, considering that even nature her selse who hath borne us, and brought forth all things; some take to be Fortune, and others Wisdome. This prefent discourse therefore, addeth unto the City of Rome a great and admirable dignity, in case we dispute of her as our manner is of the earth, the fea, the heaven and the stars, namely, whether it were by Fortune or by Providence, that the was first founded and had her being? For mine own part. I am of this opinion, that how foever Fortune and Vertue have alwaies had many quarrels and debates otherwise, yet to the framing and composition of so great an Empire and pulsance, it is very like they had made truce and were at accord; that by one joint confentalio they wrought both together, and finished the goodliest peece of worke that ever was in the world, Neither think I that I am deceived in this conjecture of mine; but amperswaded, that like as (according to the faying of Plato) the whole world was not made at first, of fire and earth, as the two principall and necessary elements, to the end that it might be visible and palpable, considering that as the earth gave massinesse, poise, and firmitude; so fire conserved thereunto colour, forme, and motion. Befides, the other two natures and elements which are between these two extreames (to wit, aire and water by forming, melting, tempering, and quenching (as it were) the great diffociation and diffimilitude of the faid extreames) have drawn together, incorporate, and united by the meanes of them, the first matter: even so, time and God together, intending such a stately piece of worke as Rome, tooke Vertue and Fortune, and those they tempered and coupled in one, as yokefellows; to the end, that of the thing which is proper both to the one and the other, they might found, build, and reare a facred Temple indeed, an edifice beneficiall and profitable unto all, a ftrong Castle leated upon a firmeground-worke, and an eternall element, which might serve inflead of a maine pillar to sustaine the decaying state of the world, ready to reele and inke downward; and finally, as a fure anchor-hold against turbulent tempests, and wandering waves of the furging feas, (as Democritus was wont to fay.) For like as some of the natural Philosophers hold, That the world at the first was not the world, and that the bodies would not joyne and mingle themselves together, forto give unto nature a common forme, composed of them all: but when the faid bodies, (fuch as yet were small and scattered here and there) flid away, made meanes to escape and flie for feare they should be caught and interlaced with others; such also as were more strong, firme, and compact, even then strove mainly one against another, and kept a foule coile and für together, in such manner, as there arose a violent tempest, a dangerous ghust, and troublesome agitation, filling all with ruine, errour, and shipwrack, untill such time as the earth arose to greatnesse by the tumulturary concourse of those bodies that grew together, whereby she her selle began first to gather a firme consistence; and asterwards yeelded in her selle, and all about her a sure feat and refting place for all other. Semblably, when the greatest Empires and Potentacies among men, were driven and carried to and fro, according to their fortunes, and ran one against another, by reason that there was not one of that grandeur and pulsance as might command all the rest, and yet they all defired that foveraignty; there was a wonderfull confusion, agenerall destruction, a strange hurliburly, a tumultuary wandering and an univertall mutation and change throughout the world, untill fuch time as Rome grew to some strength and bignesse, partly by laying and uniting to her selfe the neighbour nations and cities neare about her; and in part, by conquering the Seigniories, Realmes, and Dominions of Princes far off, and strangers beyond sea; by which meanes the greatest and principall things in the world began to rest, and be setled as it were a firme foundationand fure feat, by reason that a generall peace was brought into the world, and the maine Empire thereof reduced to one round circle, so firme as it could not be checked or impeached: for that indeed all vertues were feated in those who were the founders and builders of this mighty State; and befides, Fortune also was ready with her favour to second and accompany them; as it shall (more plainly) appeare and be shewed in this discourse entuing. And now methinks I see from this project, as it were from some high rock and watch tower: Vertue and Fortune marching toward the pleading of their cause, and to the judgement and decision of the foreiaid question propounded: but vertue in her pace and manner of going seemeth to be mild and gentle, in the carriage also of her eye, staied and composed; the earnest care likewise and desire she hath to maintaine and defend her honour in this contention, maketh her colour a little to rile in her face, albeit she be far behind Fortune, who commeth apace, and maketh all the haste she can: now there condust her, and attend upon her round about in manner of a guard, a goodly traine and troupe

Lo, what a-company came with Vertue to the trial of this controverse and matter in question!

Allwarriours flout in compleat armour dight: Expert in feats of arms, and prest to sight.

But on the other fide, the gate and going of Fortune feems quick and fast, her spirit great, and courage proud, her hopes high and haughty: she over-goeth Vertue, and at proacheth neer at hand already; not mounting and lifting up her felfe now with her light and flight wings, nor standing a tiptoe upon a round ballor boule commeth the wavering and doubtful ; and then goeth her way afterwards in discontenument and displeature: but like as the Spartiates describe Venus, saying, That after the had paffed the river Eurotas, the laid by her mirrors and looking glasses, cast aside her dainty jewels, and other wanton ornaments, and threw away that tiffue and lovely girdle of hers; and taking ipear and shield in hand, sheweth her selfethus prepared and set out, unto Lacurgus; even so Fortune having abandoned the Pernans and Affyrians, flew quickly over Macedonia; and foon shook off Alexander the Great: then travelled she a while through Egypt and Syria, carrying after her Kingdoms as she went; and so having ruined and overthrown the Carthaginians state, which with much variety and change she had oftentimes upheld; she approached in the end to mount Palatine, and when the had patted over the river Tibes, even there (as it thould feem) the cast off her wings; then the put off her flying patins; ther boule to inconflant turning and rolling to and fro the forfook, and fo entred Rome as to mak her flay and abode there: and in this guile and manner sheweth she her seite now, and maketh her appearance for to hear justice, and have this quartel decided not as a bale, unknown, and obscure person (as Pindarus faith) nor guiding and wresting with her hand two helms: but rather as the lifter of Eunomia, that is to fay Equity; and of Peitho that is to fay Periwalion: and the daughter of Promethia, that is to fay Providence; according as Aleman the Poet deriveth her Genealogy and Pedigree, Moreover the holdeth between her hands that plentiful Horn of all abundance, to much celebrated and renowned, and the same filled, not with flore of fruits always fresh and verdant which Autumn yeelde th, but b. in full of all those pretious and exquisite commodities

Which any land or sea doth breed, or out of rivers spring: Which in deep mines by delfe are found,

And those powreth she forth abundantly, and giveth abroad ingreat largeste. There are about her also to be seen in her train, a number of most noble and right excellent personnees, to wit, Namue. Pompilius descended from the Sabines: Tarquinius Priscus from the City Tarquinii; whom being aliens and meer strangers she enstalled Kings, and enthronized in the Royal seat of Romalus. Also Paulus Emilius, who brought back his army safe and sound from the deseature of Person and the Macedonians, where he archieved so fortunate a victory, that there was not seen one Roman with a weeping eye, for the losse of any friend in that war: and when he returned in trumph magnified Fortune. Even to did that good old Knight, Cacilius Metellus, surnamed Macedonicus, as well in regard of his brave victories, as of this rate felicity of his, that he was carried unto his Sepulture by four of his own fons, who had been all Confuls: namely, Quintus Balcarius, Lucius Diadematus, Marcus Metellus, and Caius Caprarius: there attended also upon his corps, two sons in law of his, that married his daughters, both confular men, and as many Nephews, his daughters children: men of mark and name all, both for great prowesse in seats of arms, and also for their high place which they held in government of State and Common-weale, Amilius Scaurus likewile (who being of a low degree and condition of life, yet came from a flock more base then it, a new upflart and of the firsthead) was raised and advanced by her, and by the means of her favour, made a great Lord and Prince of that high Court and honourable counsel, called the Senate. Cornelius Sylla likewise, whom the took out of the lap and bosome of Nicopolis a Courtilan, for to exalt himabove all the Cunbrick Trophees and Laureat Triumps: yea, and the seven Consulships of Marias; to raise him to that high pitch and foveraign degree of an absolute Monarch in the world, and a Dictator : he (I fay) openly and directly gave himselfe (as it were) by way of adoption unto Fortune, and attributed his whole efface and all his actions to her favour, crying with a loud voice with Oed pus in Sophocles;

To Fortunes court I ow all sute, And her good son my selfe reputes

Iusomuch as in the Roman language he surnamed himselfe Felix, that is to say, Happy: and unto the Greeks, he wrote thus in their tongue: Aval Togrand Evanas Inages 100, that is to fay: the diceas in the state of the gainst the Lieutenants General of King Mithridates, have the like inscription, and that right worthily. For it is not the night (as Menander faith) but Fortune, that is best acquainted and in greatest favour with Verm. Should not he therefore (who is desirous to plead the cause of Fortune) do very well to lay this for a good ground of his plea, and in the fore-front and Exordium of his Oration. bring in very firly and properly for his witnesses to depose, the Romans themselves, who have ascribed more unto Fortune than to Vertue: Certes, late it was among them, and after many ages, ere Scipio Numantinus builded a Temple to Vertue :and after him, Marcellus caused to be built that chappel bearing the name, Virtutis and Honoris, that is to fay, Of Vertue and Honour: like as Aemilius Scaurus gave order for another to be reared by the name of Mensis, that is to say, of underflanding; even about the time of the Cimbrick war: in which age, (when liteature, and professors of learning and eloquence, flocked thick, as it were, and reforted to the Citie of Rome Ithey began to have in price and reputation, such matters: and yet to this very day there is not one chappel of Wifdome Temperence, Patience and Magnanimitieine yet of Continence; whereas of Fortune therebe Temples fo stately, fo glorious, and io ancient withall, that aman would take them to have been edified even in manner when the first foundations of the Citiewere laid, For first and formost, Ancus Martins the Nephew or Daughters Son of King Numa, and the fourth King of Rome after Rome-Isus, founded one in the honour of Fortune. And peradventure he it was that iurnamed Fortune Virilie, and derived it of Fortie: for Virility, that is to say, Manhood, and Fortitude, that is to say, Proweffe and Valour, have most help by Fortune, to the atchieving of victory. As for that Temple of Feminine Fortune, named otherwise Mulicipia, they built it also before the days of Camillus, at what time as Martius Coriolanus (who led under banners displayed, against the City of Rome, a puisfant power of the Volicians) was turned back and retired, by the means and intercession of certaine noble Dames that encountered him: torthole Ladies went in folemn Embassage to ward him, accompanied with his Wife and Mother: and so earnestly intreated and effectually perswaded with him. that in the end they prevailed, infomuch, as for their fakes he pardoned and spared the City, and so withdrew the forces of that barbarous nation: and then it was (by folks sayings) that the statue or image of Fortune at the dedication thereof, pronounced these words: You have (good Roman Dames) according to the ordinance of the City, confectated me right devoutly. And verily Furius Camillus (at what time as he had quenched the flaming fire of the Gaules, and recovered the City of Rome out of the very scoles of the balance where it was to be weighed in counterpoise against a certain quantity of Gold erected a Temple, neither to Good Couniel, nor to Valour, but unto *Fame and Rumour, even in that very place by the new freet, where (by report) Marcus Caditius as hee went bythe way, heard in the night a voice, that gave warning and advertised, that shortly afsome think; ter they should look for the Gaules to war upon them. As for the Temple (upon the bank of the to the god-River Tiber) of Fortune furnamed Fortis, that is to fay, Strong Martial, Valiant, and Magnanimous, deffe Mont. for that to her belonged generofity and the forcible power to tame and overcome all things, they tort matto net octobe generous and the foreign potent contains and of the substitution navour or rottine; pecane the greatest man or an interconnect of the control of t at the very height and in the heart of Winter, he croffed the feas most fafely, as if Fortune had held in, the tempeffuous weather of that season; and when befound Pompeius strong and puissant as well by sea as land, as having all his forces affembled together about him in a set and standing camp, being himselse but weak and accompanied with a small power; for that the companies which Antonius and Sabinus should have brought, lingered and stayed behind, he adventured to take sea again; and putting himselse into a small Frigat, failed away unknown both to the Master, and also to the Pilot of the faid Barque, in simple habit, as if he had been some mean and ordinary servitor : but by occasion of a violent return of the Tide, full against the current of the River, and with alofa great tempelt that arofe, feeing that the Pilot was ready to alter his course, and turn about back, he plucked away his gament from his head, wherewith he far hood-winked, and discovered his face, laying unto the Pilot:Hold the Helm hard (good fellow) & be not afraid to fet forward:be bold (I fay) hoise fails, spred them open to the wind at aventure, and fear not, for thou hast aboard Cafar and his Fortune. So much perswaded was he, and confidently affured, that Fortune sailed with him, accompanied bum in all his marches and voyages, affifted him in the camp, aided him in battel, conducted, and dirested him in all his wars; whose work indeed it was, and could proceed from nothing else but her, to command a calm at sea, to procure fair weather and a Summer season in Winters to make them swift and nimble, who otherwise were most slow and heavy; to cause them to be couragious, who were greatest cowards and most heartlesse; and that which is more incredible then all the rest, to force Pompey to flie, and Prolomens to kill his own guest, to the end that Pompey might die, and yet Cafar be not stained with his bloodshed. What should I alledgethe testimony of his son, the first Emperour furnamed Augustus, who for the space of fifty years and four, was absolute Commander, both by Sea and Land of the whole world? who when he fent his Nephew or Sifters Son to the Wars, prayed and wished at Gods hands for no more, but that he might prove as valiant as Scipio, as well beloved as Pompey, and as fortunate as himselse; alcribing the making of himselse as great as hee was, unto Fortune; as if a man should entitle some singular piece of work with the name of the Workman or Artificer: which Fortune of his, was the cause that he got the start and vantage of Cicero, Lepidus, Panfa, Hirrius, and Marcus Antonius, by whole countels, brave exploits and proweffes, expeditions, victories, voyages, armados, legions, camps, and in one word, by whose wars, as well by fea as by land, she made him ever chiefe and principal lifting him on high still, & putting them down by whom he was mounted and advanced; until in the end, he remained alone, and had no Peere nor Second. For it was for his sake Cicero gave counsel: Lepidus led an army, Pansavanquished the enemy, Hirtius loft his life in the field, and Antonius lived riotoufly in drunkenneffe, gluttony, and leachery : for I reckon Cleopaira among the favours that Fortune did to Aug. flus, against whom, as against some rock, Antonius to great a Commander, so absolute a Prince, and mighty Triumvir, should run himselte, be split, and link; to the end that Casar Augustus might survive and remain alone. And to this purpose reported it is of him; that there being so inward acquaintance and familiarity, as there was among them, that they used often to pais the time away together in playing at tennis, or at dice, or feeing some pretty sport of Cocks and Quailes of the game, which were kept for the nonce to fight: when Antonius went evermore away with the worst, and on the losing hand; one of his familiar friends, (a man well feen in the Art of Divination) would many times frankly (ay unto him by way of remonstrance and admonition, Sir, what mean you to meddle or have any dealing with this young Gentleman, (meaning Angi stus) Fly and avoid his company, I advise you: more renowned and better reputed you are then he: his elder you are, you have a greater command and feignory then he, more expert in leats of arms, and of better experience and practice by far : but good Sir, your Genius or familiar spirit is afraid of his, your Forcune, which by it (elfe apart is great, flattereth and courteth his, and unlesse you remove your selfe far from him, it will forfake you quite and go unto him.

Thus you see what evidences and proofes Fortune may alledge for her selfe, by way of testimony. But we are besides to bring forth those which are more real, and drawn from the things' themfelves, beginning our discourse at the very foundation and nativity, as it were, of Romes City. In the first place therefore, who will not say and consesse, that for the birth, the preservation, the nurure, rearing, and education of Romulus, well might the excellencies of Vertue be the hidden ground-work, and first foundation: but surely it was Fortune alone that raised the same above ground, and built all up? For to beginnear the very generation and procreation, even of those who first founded and planted the City of Rome; they feem both to proceed from a wonderful favour of rare Fortune: for it is faid, that their Mother lay with god Mars, and was by him conceived: and like as the report goeth, that Hercules was begotten in a long night, by reason that the day extraordinarily, and besides the consie of nature was held back, and the Sunne stayed in his race and rifing: even so we finde it recorded in Histories, that when Romulus was gotten and conceived, the Sunne became Ecclipted, by reason of hisfull conjunction indeed with the Moone, like as Mars being a very god, medled with Sylvia a mortal Woman: all other the fame hapned againe unto Romalus, just upon the very fame day when hee was translated out of this life : for they fay, that even at the very inflant when the Sunne entred into the Ecclipfe, he alfo departed ont of fight, and was no more feen; which fell out to be upon the day called None Capratine: upon which day the Romans doe ftill at this prefent celebrate a folemn feath. Now when these first founders were in this manner bred and born: after that the tyrant fought to make them away; by good fortune it hapned; that the Minister to take them and execute the deed; was neither a birbarous nor a mercilessecruel slave, but a gracious and pitiful serviror, who would inno wife murder the filly babes: but finding a convenient place, upon the banck by the river fide, adjoining hard to a faire green meddow, and shaddowed with pretty trees growing low by the ground; there hee bestowed the infants, neer unto a wild fig-tree, which they called afterwards Ruminalis; for that a teat or pap in Latin is called Rama: which done, it chanced that a bitch-wolfe having newly whelped her litter, and feeling her paps bestrut with milk, and so sliffe by reason that her young ones were deed, that they aked again, and were ready to buirt, seeking to be eased and to discharge her selfethereof; camegently to these babes, stooped down, and seemed to wind about them, put unto them herreats, desirous and labouring to be delivered of her milk, as if it had been a second litter: And then (ice the fortune of it) a certain bird (confecrated to Mari, which thereupon men name in Latine Picus Martius, that is to lay. a Speght or Wood-pecker) chanced to approach neer, and having alighted gently upon the tips of her toes fall by them, and foftly opened with one of her clees the mouths of their infants, one after another, the conveyed into them certaine morfels, minied small, even of her ownfood and provision. That this is true, the said wild fig tree at this day is named Ruminalis of the Wolves reat, called in Latine Ruma, which she held unto the babes for to luckle them, doth teftiffe. And long time after, the inhabitants about that place have obferved this custome; not to expose and cast forth any thing that is bred and born amongst them; but to rear and nourish all, in a venerable memoriall of this happe and resemblance of the accident which befelunto Romulus and his brother Remus. Now that these two foundlings were nourished and brought up afterward in the City of Gabii, unknown to all the world that they were the children of Sylvia, and the Nephews or Daughters Children of Namutor the King; may feem to bee a crafty theevish cast, and deceitful tophistry, proceeding from Fortune; to the end that they should not perish beforethey had done some worthy exploit, by reason of their noble birth, but be discovered by their very deeds and effects; shewing their vertue as a mark of their nobility. And here I call to mind a certain speech which Themistocles (a brave and wise Captain) upon a time gave to some other Captains, who after him, and in a second place, were in great name at Athens, and much esteemed, howbeit, pretending to deserve more honour then he: The morrow-minde quoth he) quarrelled and contended upon a time with the feaft or holy-day, which went before it, jaying; That the was * full of labour and bufineffe, and never had any rest; whereas in her there was nothing but eating and drinking that, which before hand had been prepared and provided with great pain and travel ; unto whom the feast madethis answer: Certes, true it is, that thou fayest; but if I had not been, where hadit thou been? Even so (quoth Themistocles) if I had not conducted the Medians war, what good would you have done now? and where had your imployment been? Semblably, me thinks that Fortune faith the same unto the Vertue of Romulus: Thy acts are famous, and thy deeds renowned ; thou half shewed by them indeed, that descended thou art from divine blood and some heavenly race; but thou seeft again, how far short thou art of mee, how long after me it was, ere thou didft come in place; for if I had not (when time was) shewed my selse kind, gracious and courteous unto those poor infants, but had forsaken and abandoned them filly wretches, how could you have had any being, and by what means should you have been fo gloriously seen in the world? in case (I say) a temale wild beast, even a she-wolfe, had not come in the way, having her bigs swollen, enflamed and aking with the plenty of milk, flowing fastis were Ja fream unto them, feeking rather whom to feed, then by whom the should be feed? or if she had been altogether savage indeed and hunger-bitten; these roial houses, these stately Temples, these magnificent Theaters, these faire Galleries, these goodly Halls, Palaces, and Councel-Chambers, had they not been at this day, the Lodges, Cottages and Stalls of Shepherds and Herdi-men, ferving (as Slaves) fome Lords of Alba and Tufcan, or elic fome Mafters of the Lating Nation? The beginning, in all things, is chiefe and principal, but especially in the foundation, and building of a City; and Fortune is shee who is the Author of this beginning and foundation, in saving and preserving the founder himselse: for well may Vertue make Romulus great, but Fortune kept him, until he became great. It is for certain known and confessed, that the reign also of Numa Pompilius, which continued long, was guided and conducted by the favour of a marvellous Fortune : for to 1ay that the Nymph Ægeria, one of the Wood-Fairies, called Dryades, a wife and prudent goddeffe, was enamoured of him, and that lying ordinarily by his fide, taught him how to establish, govern and rule the Weale-publick, peradventure is a meer fabulous tale; confidering that other perions, who are recorded to have been loved by goddesses (and to have enjoyed them in marriage; as for example, Peleus, Anchifes, Orion, and Emathion) had not for all that (thorowout their life) contenument and prosperity, without some trouble and adversity: but surely it seemeth that Numa in very truth had good Fortune for his domeflical and familiar companion, and to reign jointly with him; which Fortune of his (receiving the City of Rome, as in a boifterous and troublefome tempef), or in a turbulent fea, to wit, in the enmity, envy and malice of all the neighbour Cities and nations bordering upon it; and besides disquieted within it selfe, and troubled with an infinite number of calamities and feditions factions) quenched all those flames of anger, and alayed all spightful and malicious grudges, as some boilterous and contrary winds. And like as men 14y, that the sea, even in midwater received the young brood of the birds Halcyones, after they be newly hatched, and given them leave to be nourished and sed in great calm and tranquility; even so Fortune (ipreading and drawing round about this people newly planted, and as yet ready to wag and shake every way, such a quiet and fill feason, void of all busie affairs, without wars, without mortality, without danger or fear of danger) gave good means unto the City of Rome to take root and let sure footing, growing ftill in repose with all security, and without any hinderance and impeachment whatsoever. Much like therefore, as a great carraque, hulk, or gally, is framed, wrought and fer together by many a knock & flroak, and that with great violence; whiles it feeles the blows of fledges and hammers, is pierced with spikes and great nails, cut with laws, axes and hatches; and when it is once made and finished by the Shipwright, ought to rest quiet and in repose, for a competent time, until the braces be well ferled and fastened, and the joints firmly knit and compact: for otherwise, he that should stir it, and shoot it into the Sea, whiles the junctures and commissures be yet green, fresh, loose, and not well consolidate, all would chink, cleave, and open, when it came to be never so little shaken and tossed by the boilterous billows of the sea, so that she would leak and take in water thorowout; even so, the first Prince, Author and Founder of the City of Rome, having composed it of rustical pellants herdmen, as it were, of rough hewen planks and posts of tough and stubburn oak, had much adoe, and took no small paines, but engaged himselfe far into sundry warres, and exposed his person and estate to manifold and great dangers, being of necessity enforced to encounter and fight with those who opposed themselves, and withstood the nativity (as it were) and foundation thereof, before hee could bring his work to an end; but the second King receiving the same at his hands, gaveit good time and leafure to gather strength, and to confirm the growth and augmentation thereof by the favour of happy Fortune, who afforded him the means to enjoy great peace and long repote. But if at that time, fome such as King Porfenna, had come against it, pitching his camp before it, and leading a ftrong army of Tuscans to give affault thereto, whiles the walls were yet green, lost, and ready to shake with every small thing: or if some pussiant Prince and Potentate, or worthy wartiour from among the Marsians; upon Apostasie and revolt: or eise some Lucan, for envy or upon a troubleiome ipicit and defire of contention, a buffe-headed perion, factious and quarrelione, such an one as afterwards Murius or front Silon was, surnamed the Bold: or last of all, Telesinus, with whom Sylla (cuifled, and found him elfe somewhat to do: him I mean, who (as it were) with one fignal could make all Italy rife and take arms: if one of these (Isay) had come and given the alarme, environing and affailing with found of trumpets this Sage-like Prince and Philosopher Numa, whiles he was at factifice, or in his devotions and prayers to the gods: furely the City in that infancy of hers and first beginnings, had never been able to have held out and withstood so great a florm and tempeft, rieither had it grown up as it did, to fo goodly a number of lufty and ierviceable men : whereas, it seemeth that the long peace which continued under this King, served in flead of a provision of furniture and all forts of municion for innumerable wars enfuing; and the people of Rome, much like unto a champion who hath to fight a combat, having been exercised and enured at leiture, in a peaceable time, for the space of three and forty years after the wars which they had fought under Romulus, became strong enough, and inficient to make head against those that alterwards affailed them: for it is for certain recorded, that during all that time, there was neither pestilence nor famine, no unkind barrennesse of the earth, nor unleasonable distemperature of Winter or Summer, to afflict or trouble the City of Rome, as if there had been no humane providence, but only a divine Fortune which took the care and government of all those years. In those days likewife it was, that the two-leaved doors of the Temple of Janus were shut up and locked fast, those (I mean) which they call the gates of war, for that they were fet open in the time of war, and kept four when it was peace. No looner was King Nama dead, but these gates were opened for the Albane war, which brake our suddenly and with great violence, and to stood open still, during an infinite number of other wars enfuing continually one after another thereupon: but in processe of time, namely, about four hundred and fouricore years after they were flut again, when the first Punick war was ended, and peace concluded with the Carthaginians, even that year wherein C. Artilins and Titus Manlins were Confuls. After this, they were fer open by occasion of new wars, which lasted until the very time that Cafer Augustus won that noble victory under the Promontory Aftium. Then had the Romans a ceffacion or jurcease of arms, but the same continued not long: for that the tumultuous stirs of the Biscains, the Galatians and Germans comming all together, troubled the peace. And thus much may ferve out of Histories, for testimonies in behalie of the felicity and good Fortune of King Numa.

But the Kings also that reigned in Rome after him, highly honoured Fortune, as the chiefe Patronesse, Nurse, and the Prop or Pillar, as Pindarus saith, which supported and upheld the City of Romes as we may judge by the reasons and arguments following. There is at Rome, I wot well, the Tem-'ple of Vertue highly honoured: but founded it was and built of late days, even by Marcellus, who forced and won the City of Syra:ufa. There was another also in the honour of reason, understanding, or good advice, which they called by the name of Menis: but Anilins Scarras was the man who dedicated it; about the time of the Cimbrick wars. For that by this, the learning, the arts, and pleafant eloquence of the Greeks were crept already into the City: but, to Wifedome there is not yet to this day so much as one Temp'e or Chappel: neither to Temperance, nor.Patience : ne yet to Magnanimity, whereas of Fortune there be many Churches and Temples very ancient, and those much frequenced; and to speak in one word, celebrated with all kinds of honour: as being founded and erected amid the noblest parts, and most conspicuous places of the City. For there is the Temple of Masculine Fortune called Fortuna vivilis, which was built by Marius Aucus the fourth King of Rome, and by him so called; for that he thought that fortune availed as much as Fortitude to the obtaining of victory. As for the other, entituled by the name of Fortune Feminine: otherwise called Fortuna Muliebris, every man knoweth that they were the Dames of the City, who dedicated it. after they had averted and turned back Martius Coriolanus, who was come with a puillant power of enemies and presented himselfe before the City. And Servius Tullius who augmented the puissance of the people of Rome, and brought it unto a goodly and beautiful manner of government, no Prince so much, having set down and established a good order for the giving of suffrages and voices at the elections of Magistrates, and enacting of Laws: and besides instituted the order of military discipline: having been himselfe the first Cenfor of mens manners, and the Controller or Overleer of every mans life and behaviour: who feemed also to have been a right valiant Prince, and most prudent withall: This man, I say, wholly avowed himselse the Vassaile of Fortune, and did homage to her, acknowledging all principality to depend upon her: in such fort as mensay Fortune her selfe used to come and lie with him, descending down by a window into his chamber: which now they call the gate Fenestella. He founded therefore within the Capitoll one Temple to the honour of Fo: tune, called Primigenia, which a man may interpret, first begotten: and another to fortune Obsequens, which some take to be as much as obeliants others gratious and favourable. But not to fland any longer upon the Roman names and appellations, I will leave them, and endeavour to reckon up and interpret in Greek the meaning and fignification of all the e Temples, founded and dedicated in the honour of Fortune. For in the mount Palatine there standeth one Chappel of private tortune, and another of gluing Fortune: which tearm may haply feem to be ridiculous; howbeit, by way of a Metaphor it carrieth a fignification very important, as if we were to understand thus much by it: That it draweth unto it, and catcheth those things which be far off: and holdeth fast whatsoever sticketh and cleaveth unto it. Moreover, neer unto the fountain called Mufcofa, that is to fay, Mossie; there is another Chappel of Fortune the Virgin: as also in the mount Equalities, another of Adverse Fortune; upon the tireet called the Long Way, an altar there is erected to Fortune Good-hope, or as it were Hope: and neer adjoining unto the Altar of Venus-Epitelaria, that is to fay, Foot-winged Venus, a Chappel and Image of Fortune Makuline: befides a thousand honours and denominations more of Fortune, which Servius for the most part instituted and ordained: as knowing full well, that in the regiment of all humane thines, Fortune is of great importance, or rather can do all in all. And good reason he had therefore, confidering that himselfe by the beneficial layour of Fortune, being descended as he was by birth from a Captive, and that of an enemy nation, was raifed and advanced to royal dignity. For when the City of the Corniculanes was wonfortibly by the Romans, a certain young Damolel named Ocrifia, being taken prisoner (who notwithstanding her infortunate captivity; was neither for beauty of face, nor comely behaviour blemished or stained) was given unto Queen Tanaquil, the Wife of King Tarquin, to lerve her, and afterwards bestowed in marriage upon one of the reteiners or dependants to the King; such as the Romans call Clienter: and from these two came this foresaid Servins. Others say, that it was nothing so; but that this Maiden Ocrissa taking ordinarily certain first fruits or affaies as it were, both of viands and wine from the Kings Table, carried the same to the hearth of the domestical Altar; and when one day above the rest she cast these primicies or libaments aforesaid (as her usual manner was) into the fire upon the hearth; behold all on the sudden when the flame went out, there arole out of the faid hearth, the genital member of aman; wherear the young Damosel being affrighted, reported what a ftrange fight she had seen, unto Queen Tanaquil alone: who being a wife and witty Lady, apparelled and adorned the Maiden like a Bride in every respect, and thut her up with the foresaid apparition; taking it for a divine thing, prefaging some great matter, Some say, that this was the domestical or tutelar god of the house whom they cal Lar; others Unlcan, who was enamored of this young Virgin: but what soever it was, Ocrifia was thereupon with Child, and so was Servine born. Now whiles he was but an infant, there was seen a shining light, much like unto the slash of lightning, to blaze out of his head round about, But Valerius Anias recordeth this narration otherwife: faying that Servius had a wife named Gegania, who hapned to die; by occasion of whose death, he grew into a great agony and passion of forrow, in the presence of his Mother, until in the end for very heavinesse and melancholy, he fell asleep, and as he slept, the woman of the house might perceive his head shining out in a light fire; a inflicient argument and testimony, that engendred he was of fire; yea, and an assured presage of a Kingdom unlooked for; which he attained unto after the decease of Tarquinius, by means of the port and favour that Tanaquil graced him with. For otherwise, of all the Kings that were of Rome, he seemed to be the man that was unlikest to reach unto a Monarchy, and least intended, or minded to aspire thereunto : considering that when he was King, he determined to resign up the Crown; though he was empeached and stayed for so doing: because an quil upon her death-bed conjured and bound him by an oath to continue in his royal estate and dignity, and in no case to give over the politick government of the Romans, wherein he was born. Lo, how the regal power and kingdom of Servius may be wholly ascribed unto Fortune, seeing that as he came unto it beyond all hope and expectation, so he held it even against his will.

But to the end it may not be thought, that we withdraw our selves and retire, slying unto antiquity, asit were into a place obscure and dark, for want of more clear and evident proofs, let us leave the history of the Kings, and turn our speech unto the most glorious acts of the Romans, and their wars, which were of greatest name and renown: wherein I will not deny, and who is there but must contesse, there did concur

according as Timotheus the Poet writeth? but the prosperous train and happy course of their affairs, the violent stream also, and current of their progresse into such puissance and growth of greatnesse, sheweth evidently unto those who are able to discourse with reason, and to judge aright, that this was a thing conducted neither by the hands nor counsels, ne yet by the affections of men, but by fome heavenly guidance and divine direction, even by a fore-wind and gale of Fortune blowing at the poup and haftening them foreward. Trophees upon Trophees by them were erected, one triumph met with another continually: the former blood upon the weapons not yet cooled, but fill warm was washed away by new bloodshed comming upon it: they reckoned and numbered their victories not by the multitude of enemies slain and heaps of spoiles, but counted them by realms subdued by nations conquered and brought to subjection, by isles and firm lands of the continent reduced into fervitude and bondage, and allto augment the greatnesse of their Empire. In one battel King Philip was chased out of Macedonia one blow & one conflict caused Antiochus to abandon and forego Asia; by one deseature the Carthaginians lost Lybia: one man alone in one expedition, and by the power of one Army, conquered unto them Armenia, the Kingdome of All this is Pontus, the lea Euxinus, Syria, Arabia, the Albanians, the Iberians, all thenations even as far as the to be unmountain Caucajus, and the Hircanians, yea, and the very Ocean Sea which environeth the world deritood round about, faw the same man thrice Vistor and Conqueror: the Nomades in Affrick he represent of Fomptas fed and vanished, even to the coasts of the fourth Sea: the Kings of the Albanians he bursued, and Magazinever left the chale until he haddriven them to the CaspianSea. All these brave exploits and glorious conquests he archieved, so long as he used the publick Fortune of the City, but afterwards hee was overthrown and came to ruine by his own private deftiny. Now that great Damon and tutelar god of the Romans, did not second them for a day as it were and no more: neither in a short time did his best and came to the height and vigour of his gracious favour, as that of the Macedonians; norgave them his affilten e upon the land only, as he who was the patron of the Lacedemonians; or at Sea alone, as the Athenians god; ne yet was longete he would flir, as hewhom the Colophonians trulted upon; no, nor gave over quickly, as the Persians patrondid: but even from the very nativity and foundation of the City; it began, it grew up, waxed, and went forward as it did, it managed the government of it, it continued firm and jure with it, by land, by sea, in war, in peace, againft Barbarians, and againft the Greeks: He it was that when Annibal the Carthaginian overfpred all Iraly, in manner of a land-flood, or violent brook, wrought it fo, that partly through envy, and in part through the malice of his spightful sellow-Citizens, no succours and supplies were fent to feed and maintain him; and so by that means wasted, spent, and consumed him to nothing in the end: he it was that dispersed and kept the Armies and Forces of the Cimbrians, and Teutonians a great way, and a long time afunder, to as they could not meet; to the end that Marius might be furnished and provided sufficiently to fight with them, and to defeat them both, one after aftother: he empeached the joining together of three hundred thouland fighting men at one time, all invincible fouldiers, and appointed with arms insuperable, that they might not invade and over-run, all Italy. For this cause, and by the means of this Protector, Antiochii sat still, and stirred not to aid Philip, all the whiles that the Romans made sharp war upon him: likewise, when Antiochus was in diftresse and langer of his whole estate, Philip being discomfited before, dust not hold up his head, and died the while: he, and none but he procured, that whiles the Marsans war set all Rome and Italy on a light fire, the Sarmatian, and Bastarnian war held King Mithridates occupied. Finally, through his procurement, King Tigrane; when Mithridates flourished, and was in his ruff most puiffant, upon suspition, envy, and distrust, would not join withdim; and afterwards when the said Mithridates had an overthrow, combined and banded with him; that in the end he might also lose his life and perish with him for company.

What! in the greatest distresses and calamities that lay heavy upon the City; was it not the Roman Fortune that redressed all, and set it upright again? As so resample: When as the Gaules were encamped round about the mount Capitol, and held the Cassle besieged:

A plague she sent, the souldiers soon fell sick, Throughout their hest, whereof they died thick,

Fortune also it was, and meer chance, that revealed their comming in the night, and gave advertisement thereof, when no man in the world either knew or doubted thereof: and peradventure it would not be impertinent and besides the purpose, in this place to discourse of it more at large, After the great discounture and overthrow that the Romans received neer the river Alia: as many as could fave themselves by good footmanship, when they were come to Rame, filled the whole City with a fright and trouble; infomuch, as the people wonderfully amazed with this fearful news, fled scattering here and there, excepting only a few, who put themselves within the Castle of the Capitol, resolved to keep that piece, and abide the extremity of the fiege: others who escaped after that unfortunate battel and defeature, assembled themselves immediately in the City Veii; and chose for their dictator Furine Camillus, a man, whom the people (proud and infolent upon their long prosperity) had beforetime rejected, and lent away into banishment, condemning him for robbing the common treasure: but they being humbled by this affliction, and brought to a low ebbe: called him back again, after that discomfiture: committing and putting into his hands, the absolute power and foveraign authority: but to the end it might not be thought, that it was by the occasion of the iniquity and infortunity of the time, and not according to order of Law, that the man accepted of this high magistracy, and that in a desperate state of the City, without all hope that ever it should rise again, he was elected by the rumultuary suffrages of a broken Army, dispersed and wandering here and there: his will was, that the Senators of Rome who had retired themselves within the Capitol aforesaid, should be made acquainted and advertised thereof, and that by their uniform confent, they might approve and confirm that election of him, which the fouldiers and men of war had decreed. Now among the others, there was one named Cains Pontius, a valiant and hardy man, who undertook and promited in his own perion to go and carry the news of that which had been determined, unto those who abode within the Capito! : and verily he enterprised a thing exceeding dangerous, for that he was to passe through the midst of the enemies who then invested the Capitol with trenches, and a firong Corps-de-guard: when he was come to the river fide by night, hee fastened just under his brest certain broad pieces, or plates of Cork, and to committing his body to the lightnesse of such a Barge, he bare himselse thereupon, and hulled with the course of the water, which was to good and favourable unto him, that it carried him over, and let him gently upon the bank on the other fide of the river, without any danger at all; where he was no fooner landed. but he went directly toward that place which he law was without allight, conjecturing by the darknefie and filence withal, that he should not light upon any of the watch or ward there: thus hee began to climb up the sleep rock, whereas he could find any way to fee sure footing upon the stones that fluck out, or whereloever he found a place to yeeld better accesse and ascent then another 10 fetching a compasse, and catching hold with his hand upon the rough crags, and bearing himselse as well as possibly he could; he made such shift, that in the end he crawled up to the top thereof; and wen as pointify ne county ne made that nation and were formed if the Corpular quart, having epide him, helped to pull him up: then declared heunto those within the place, what had been set down and agreed upon by them who were without, from whom he had no sooner received their assent and approbation of the foresaid ordinance concluded, but the very same night he made his return the way that he came, unto Camillus: the next morning one of the barbarous enemies, as hee turn the way man be came, mino cambiant the links thorough your other barbarous chemics, as need walked about that place, thinking of no juch thing, perceiving by very chance, partly the princ of a mans ciproes, together with the marks of unfleady footing, and partly the grafte and weeds croftled and broken, which grew here and there in fuch places, where they had fosse little earth to main them; as allo the tracks and traces where he had leaned and wrettled with his body, either in clambering up, or striving overthwart; went strait ways and related unto his fellow souldiers what he had feen : who taking it thus, that the enemies themselves shewed them the way, and tred it out before them, affayed presently to do the like, and to gain the top of the rock. In the night time therefore having observed where the place was most folicary, and void of watchmen, they mounted up, without being descried and discovered, not only by the men who were in guard and sentinel but not fo much as by the dogs, which were fet afront before, for to affilt the watch, fo fleepy they were all, both the one and the other. Howbeit, the good Fortune of Rome wanted no voice to beweray fo imminent a danger, and to give warning thereof; for there were within the Capital certain Geele conferrated into the goddesse Juno, kept at the Cities charges, in the honour of her, colocunder temple: now is this creature of albefuers by nature very timorous, and a every little notic that is made, ready to be affigipled; and as that time especially, by reason that there was within the place great (arity of victuals, they were neglected, and for that they wereker fomewhat hungry, flept not fo foundly as they were wont to do; by reason whereof, at the fift being aware of the enemies comming, even to foon as they had gotten over the battlements of the walls, they came full butt upon them, and being affrighted besides to see their bright armour, set up such a gagling note after their manner, that all the court of the Castle rung with their violent and dissonant noise: whereat the Romans were awakened, and suspecting deeply what the matter was, ran incontinently to the wall, gave the enemies the repulse, and turned them down with their heads forward: in memorial of which accidents and occurrents, Fortune goeth as it were in triumph even at this day. For at Rome they are wont upon a certain fer day of the year in a folemn procession, to have a Dog carried in a shew crucified; and a Goole borne in a gorgeous litter upon a righ cushion, most sumpresously dight and set out: which spectacle representeth and sheweth unto us the puissance of Fortune, and the great means that the hath to effect all those things with ease and facility, which in mans reason teem unpossible; considering that she giveth a kind of witty perceivance and understanding, to brute beatts, otherwise foolish and void of reason; yea, and insuleth bold courage and fitength to those which by nature are fearful, weak, and cowardly. For what man is there, unlesse he be altogether deprived of natural sense and affection, who would not be assonible. ed and ravished again with a wonderful admiration, to consider and discourse after a fort with himielfe, comparing the heavy cheer and mournful condition of this City in thole days, with the felicity and stately port thereofatthis present; to look up (Hay) to the Capitol, and behold the riches there, the sumptuosity and magnificence of the monuments and oblations there to be seen; the excellent pieces of work wrought by most cunning artificers, striving who might do best; the prelents of Cities, contending who should be most bounteous and liberal the Crowns sent by Kings and Princes, and what precious things loever the earth, the lea, the illands, the firm lands of the continent, the rivers, trees, beatls, champion fields, mountains and metal mines, do afford; and in one word, the first fruits and choice parcels of all things in the world, which seem all to strive one with another, to embelish grace, adorn, enrich and beautifie this only place? and withal, to look back unto those times pall, and consider how it went within a very little, that all this should never have been, or at least wise not extant at this day; seeing that all being within the power of mercilesse fire, fearful darknesse of the mirk night, cruel and barbarous swords, and most bloody minds and inhumane hearts of these Gaules; the poor contemptible beasts, foolish, reasonlesse and timorous, made the overture to fave all, and were the principal instruments of preservation; also, how those brave sallants, valorous Knights, and great Captains and Commanders, the Mantii, the Servii, the Pofisiumi and Paprii, the ancestors and progenitors of so many noblehouses afterwards, were very neerand at the point to have been undone for ever, and come to nothing; had not these filly Geese awakened and started up to fight for their countrey, and to defend the god, Patron and Prorestor of the City. And if it be true that Politius writeth in the second book of his History, as touching those Gaules, who at that time surprised the City, and were Lords of Rome: That when news came suddenly unto them, how certain of their barbarous neighbours neer at hand, were entred in arms within their own country, and won all before them as they went: they had returned in halle back, and made peace with Camillai, cerres, without all doubt, Fortune even then had been the canie also of the Ciries safety, in distracting the enemies, or rather in withdrawing them another way, contrary to all hope and espectation of man: But what need we to fland thus upon thefe old Hiltories, wherein there is no certainty to build upon delivered: confidering that the state of Rome was then ruinate, and all their Annals, Records, Regitters, and Memorials, either perifhed or confounded, according as Livie himself hath left in writing; seeing that the affairs of the Romans which happened afterward, and carry more light and perfoicuity with them, declare and tellifie fufficiently the love and indulgence of Fortune? For mine own part, I count this for one fingular favour of hers, to wit, the death of Alexander the Great, a Prince of incomparable courage, and spirit invincible, who being lifted up by many great prosperities, glorious conquelts, and happy victories, lanced himself in manner of a Star Volant in the Air, leaping out of the East into the West, and beginning now to shoot the flaming beams and flashing raies of his armour as far as into Italy : having for a pretente and colourable cause of this enterprise and expedition of his, the death of his kinfman Alexander the Miloslian, who together with his army, was by the Brutians and Lucanians (neer unto the City Pandasia) put to the sword and cut in pieces: although (in truth) that which carried him thus against all nations, was nothing else but a defire of glory and foveraignty, having proposed this unto himselfeupon aspirit of zeal and emulation, to surpasse the acts of Bacchus and Hercules, and to go with his army beyond the bounds of their voyages and expeditions. Moreover he had heard fay, that he should find the force and valour of the Romans, to be as it were a gad of steel, to give edge unto the fword of Italy: and he knew well enough (by the general voice and reportabroad in the world, which was brought unto him) that famous warriers they were and of greatest renown, as being exercised and hardened like stout champions in wars and combats innumerable,

And verily, as I doween, A bloody fight there would have been, if the undanted and unconquered hearts of the Romans, had encountered in the field with the invincible armies of the Macedonians: for furely the Citizens of Rome were no fewer at that time in number, by just computation, then a hundred and thirry thousand fighting men, able all to bear arms. Who expert were on hor seback for to fight, And when they saw their time, on foot to light. and hardy withal:

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Whether we may discourse of Learning and Philosophy at the Table.

Ome there be(Sir Soffins Senecio) who say that this ancient proverb in Greek, Mieso undustration.

At banquet, wine, or any feast, I hate a well remembring guest.

was meant of *Hosteliers or rulers at feasts, who ordinarily are odious, troublesome, uncivil, saucy, and imperious at the table. For the Dorians who in old time inhabited Italy (as it should feem) were wont to call such an one, yrique, Others again, be of opinion, that this proverb admonishest and reachest us to forget all that hath been done and said at the board, and among our cups, when we have been merry together. Hereupon it is, that in our countrey, men commonly say: That both Oblivion and allo, the Palmar, or the plant Ferula, that is to say, Fenel-giant, bee conservated unto Bacchui; which givest us to understand, that the errors and saults which palle at the table, are either not to be remembred at all, or else deserve to be chastised gently as children are,
But fecing you also are of the same mind that Euripidus was, namely: That howsovere

Bad things and fifthy to forget, Indeed, is counted wisdom great.

yet the Oblivion generally of all that is spoken at the board and when we drink wine, is not onely repugnant to this vulgar faying: That the table makes many a friends but allo hath divers of the most renounced and excellent Philosophers to be are winesse to the contrary, towir, Plans, Kenphons, Artifalls, Spensphus, Epicarus, Prisanis Hisronymus' and Dion the Academick, who all have thought and reputed it a 'thing worth their travel, to put down in writing, the talk that had been 'held are and drink in their presence. And for that you have thought it meet, that I also should collect and gather together the principal and most memorable points of learned discouries, which have palefed fusbuy times and in divers places, both here and there: I mean aswell at Rome among you, as also with us in Greece, when we were eating and drinking together among our friends: I leaded my selfe unto it willingly; and having sent unto you three books heretofore, containing every one of them ten questions, I will shortly sent dyouthe rest, if I may perceive that these which you have already, were not a longether thought unlearned, impertinent, and without good grace.

The first question then, which I have set abroad; is this: Whether it be a seemly and decent thing, to Philosophize, that is to say, To speak and treat of matters of learning at the table? for you may remember very well, that this question being moved upon a time at Athers after supper: Whether it were besitting those who are come to make good cheere for to enter into speech, or mainteine discourse, as touching Philosophical matters or no? and if it were: How far forth it might be allowed, and within what bounds it ought to be limitted? Ariston, one of the company there present: What (quoth he) and are there any persons indeed (tell me for the love of God) who deny Philosophers and learned men a room at the board? Yea marry are there (my good friend, quoth ny rinnophres and resulted inclus room at the obtain results are timere in good ritend, quoth I again) who not only do lo, but also in good earneft and great gravity (after their ir notical manner) give out and say: That Philosophy, which is (as it were) the militefic of the house, ought not to be heard speaking at the board, where men are met to make merry; who commend also the manner of the Persians for good & wife, who never would seem to drink wine merrily, and until they were drunk, nor yet to dance with their wedded Wives, but in the company of their Concubines: for femblably, they would have us at our feafts and banquets, to bring inmufick, dances, plays, masks, and counterfeit pleafures, but in no wife meddle with Philosophy; as if she were never meet for mirth and play, nor we at such a time sit and disposed for serious study. For even so the Orator Ifocrates (fay they) could never be brought to make any other answer to those that earnestly intreated him, and were very urgent, that he should make some good speech before them, when he and they were drinking wine, but this: The time fitteth not now for those matters which I professe, and have skill in; and of such things as this present time requireth, I am altogether unskilful. Then Crato crying out with a loud voice: Now fo god Bacchus help me (quoth he) I con the manthank, and commend him highly, for refusing, and (as it were) for wearing talk at Ta-ble, in case he meant those long clauses and tedious trains or periods of sentences of his, wherewith he should have driven away all the Graces from the feast. Bur, in my conceit, it is not all one. to banish from the boardan affected speech or rhetorical language; and to chase away a Philo-fophical discourse; for certainly, Philosophy is a lardifferent thing, which being the art professing to teach us how we are to live, there is no reason to shut the doors against her, at any game, sport, or pleasant pastime for our recreation whatsoever: for she ought to stand by and be present at all, for to inftru it us what time, what measure and meane we should observe: unlesse by the same rule wee will fay, that we must not admit to our feasts either Justice or Temperance, or other vertues, as scorning and scoffing (forfooth) their venerable gravity. Now, if we were to eat and drink some where in a folemn judicial Hall or publick place of juffice, as the manner is of those who seasted Orestera, and entertained him with all silence; somewhat it wert, and peradventure it might serve for some pretenie or excuse (though the same were but a unnoward and unhappy precedent) to colour and cloak our ignorance and incivility; but in case, Baccha be by right immamed Lysiu or Lydius, that is to say, the Deliverer and setter free of all things, and principally of the tongue, stom which it taken away the bit and bridle, giving all liberty to the voices! suppose it were meer folly and fortishmess in the same of the same and the same should be supposed to the same should be sam and withal exhorted and animated me to speak mine advice, I entred into speech and said: That first and formost I thought it a point especially to be considered, what manner of persons are meet ara feast, and what the company is? for if there be more in number of learned men then of others artheboard, such as the table was of Agathon, of Socrates, of Phedrus, Paufanias, Eryximachus, Calbias Charmidas, Antishenes, Hermogenes and others like unto them, luffer them as well to have Philosophical talk, tempering and mixing Pacehus, (that is to say Wine) no lesse with the Muses then with the Nymphs (that is to fay Waters;) for that, as these make him to enter and go down into the body mild and gentle; so the other may cause him to be as kind, curteous, and acceptable to the mind. For iffo be there are some sew ignorant and unlettered persons, among many learned and skilful clerks, yet will they like unto mure letters, and confonants between vowels, participate with them in a kind of voice, not altogether inarticulate and unfignificant, yea, and learn fomewhat by by those means, of their skill and knowledge: but say there be a fort of rude guests, such as can abide to hear either the crowing and finging of any bird whatloever, or the found of any fitting or piece of wood, it skills not what it be, rather then the tongue of a Philosoper: then were it good to practife that which Pififrains did; who being as some debate and difference with his own children, and perceiving that his enemies were well enough contented therewith, and laughed thereat in their fleeves; called a folemn affembly, wherein he delivered this speech unto the people: That desirous he had been indeed to have drawn his children to his own opinion, but since it would not be, and feeing how obtinate they were bent, he meant to bernled by them, and to follow their mind; even so a learned man and a Philosopher being matched with other guests, that have no lith at all to give ear unto his fage laws and wife words, will range himfelfe to their fide, and change his own conceit, he will I lay, dance after their pipe, and take pleafure in their pafimes, fo long as they exceed not the bounds of honelty and civility; asknowing thus much: That men cannot shew and exercise their eloquence but in speaking, but they may declare and prachie their Philosophy even in slence and saying nothing: yea, and in disporting themselves withouters, giving and taking pretty scotl's enterchangably. For it is not only a point (as Placo saith) of extream injustice, when a man is unjust, to make a semblance and shew of justice, but also a kind of soveraign and principal wisedome to Philosophize, and yet to seem no Philosopher, and by way of game and mirth, to do the ferious offices of those that are in good earnest, studious for like as the frantick women in Euripides called Baccka, without arms or any weapon of iron and fleele, onely smiting with their little javelins or ferula-flems, wounded those that set upon them; even so the pleasant words of true Philosophers indeed, cast out by way of jett, yea, and the very laughters of wilemen are able to move and correct in some fort, such as are not altogether incorrigible, nor so hard as nothing will pierce and enter into them. Moreover, I suppose there be cergible, nor so hard as nothing will pierce and enter into them. tain narrations fitto be related at a feast where men are assembled, whereof some be drawn out of Written Histories, others, present occasions, and occurrences do dayly yeeld, and those containe examples to incite and provoke men partly to the fludy of Philosophy, and in part to Piety, Religion and Devotion toward the gods: some induce us to imitate generous and magnanimous acts, othersingender a fervent zeal to perform the works of bounty and humanity : which precedents, he that can closely and with dexterity use as documents and instructions to those that be drinking with them, so as they perceive him not, shall discharge the time which they drink, of many vices, and those not the least, which are imputed unto it: some there be, who put leaves of Burrage into Wine, others beiprinkle the floores and pavements of parlours, and dining chambers with water, wherein they have infused or steeped the herbs Vervain and Maiden-hair; having an opinion, that these devices procure some joy and mirth in the hearts of those who areat a seast; and all to imitate Lady Helene, who, as Homer reporteth, with certain spices and drugs wherewith shehad medicined and charmed (as it were) the Wine that her guests should drink: but they do not perceive) that this tale being fetched from asfar as Egypt, after a great way and long circuit, endeth at the last in honest discouries fitted and accommodated to time and place: for that the faid Helene reconnteth unto them as they drunk with her at the table, the travels of noble Utyffes, and namely, What things this valiant Knight had done, and what he had endured; What wrongs also he wrought himselfe, towhich he wasinured; Forthis was that Nepenthes (if I be not deceived) a medicine which discusseth and charmeth all forrow and paine, even a different speech, framed aprly and in season to the affections and occasions, which are prefented: but men confiderate, well advised, and of good jndgement, howsoever they may seem to deal in Philosophy, yet they carry their words, and place them so, that they are effeclua, rather by a gentle way of perswasion, then by force and violence of demonstration. For thus you see how Plato also (in the Treatise called, His Banquet: where he discourseth of the final end orhumane actions, of the foveraign good ofman, and mone word, treateth of God and Heaven-ly matters, like a Divine and Theologian) doth not enforce and stretch the proofe of his Demonstration, nor bestrew and powder, as it were, with dust his adversary, according to his womed manner, otherwiseto takesurer hold, that hee might not possibly struggle out of his hands: but induceth and draweth on the hearers his guests, by a weaker kinde of arguments and suppositions, by pretty examples, and pleafant fictions. Moreover, the very questions and matters at fush a time and place propounded, and not only their reasons ought to be somewhat easie, the problems and propositions plain and familiar: the interrogations also and demands probable, and carrying a refemblance of truth, and nothing dark or intricate: lest they doe perstringe and dazzle their eyes, who are not quick fighted, fuffocate fuch as are but weake spirited, and in one word, turne them clean away, who are but shallow witted and of a mean conceit. For like as there is a custome allowable to remove and stirre (when a man will) the guests at a feast, by urging them either to dance alone, or in a ring: bur he that should force them to rise from the lable, for to put on Armour and fight in complete harners, or to fling the bar, or caft a fledge, doth not only make the feath unpleatant and nothing acceptable to his guests, but also hurtfull unto them: even so, ease and light questions, exercisemens spirits handiomely, and with great fruit and commodity: bur we must reject and banish all disputations of matters litigious, intricate, and snarled (as Democritus faith) to wit, knotty questions and hard to be undone, such as both busie themselves, who propose them, and trouble those that hear them. For thus it ought to be, that as the Wine is all one and commonthroughout the Table; fo the questions propounded at a feast or banquet, to be talked of, should be intelligible unto all, for otherwise, they who broach matters so dark and mystical, were as unreasonable, and should have as little regard of the common benefit of their company, as the Crane, and Fox in Lop Fables, had one of the others good. For the Fox having invited the Crane to dinner, tet before her a good messe of fatty broth, of beans and pease, which he had nowred upon a broad shallow stone vessel, in such fort, as the poor Crane was made a soole and laughing-flock by this meanes, for that with her long and small bill she could get none of it up, but it went slill besides, it was so thin and glib withal: the Crane again, because she would be quit and meet with the Fox, bade him to dinner, and prefented unto him good victuals within a bottle, that had a long and narrow neck, at which the her telfecould eafily convey and thrust her bill to the very bottome; But Reinard was not able to take out his part with her; even so, when learned men at a table plunge and drown themselves (as it were) in subtile problems and questions interlaced with Logick, which the vulgar fort are not able for their lives to comprehend and conceive; whiles they also again for their part come in with their foolish longs, and vaine ballads, of Robinhood and little John, telling tales of a tub, or of a roasted horse and such like; enter into talke of their traffick and merchandile, of their markets and such mechanical matters; Certes all the fruit and end of such an affembly at a feast is utterly lost, and meer injury done unto god Bacchus: for like as when Phrynicus and Eschylus first brought a Tragedy (which at the beginning was a folemn long, in the honour of Bacchus) to fables and narrations pathetical, arose this proverb: And what is all this I pray you to Bacchus? even so it comes many times into my mind to say thus unto one that draweth by head and shoulders into a feast, that sophistical and masterful syllogisme called Kiertlov. My goodsriend, what is this to Bacchus? Haply there is some one who singeth certain of these ordinary longs at feasts, called * Scotia, as a man would say oblique, or crooked, when the great standing cup of wine is set in the midst of the table before all the company, and the chaplets of flowers divided and dealt among the guests, which that god Bacchus putteth that is to fay, by the upon our heads, to fignifie, that hee giveth us all liberty: but surely this is neither good nor honest, nor yet beseeming that freedome which should bee at fealts, howsoever some say that those sonnets are not darkly composed, as the word Scotia seemeth to imply, which signifieth crooked; but that they took the name; because in old time the guests, at first sung altogether with one voice and accord, one long in the praise of Baschus, and afterwards every *Or rather one in his turne chanted another apart; giving one to another in order from hand to hand, a branch or garland of a mystle tree; which I supposed they called * Afaron; for that he who took the faid branch was to fing in his course and to the same purpose, a lute there was, or an harp that went round about the table; and look who could skill to play upon it, took it in hand and fung thereto in measures; but those who had no knowledge at all in musick, and refused the said instrument, gave occasion of the name Scotion, because such manner of singing was not common or easie unto all : others there be who say, That the said branch of myrtle went not round about to all the guests in order, but passed from table to table, or from bedto bed; for when he that fat formost at the first table had jung he fent it to the principall or first man of the second, and he to the chiefe person of the third; and so consequently, the second did by the second; by reason whereof, and in regard of this crosse and overthwart variety in the oblique revolution thereof, the fong was called Scotion.

For this time now to supper goye, That soon twixt us a combat may be.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether the mafter of the feast ought himselfe to assigne unto every guest his place, or suffer them to sit as they will themsclves?

Y brother Timon having upon a time invited many persons to a feast, willed every one of them Mas he entred in, to take his place, and fit where he thought good himselfe, for that there were among them thrangers, citizens, neighbours, familiars, friends, and kinstolke, and in one word, all that were bidden were not one mans children, but a medley and mixt number of all forts and conditions. Now, when as they were for the most part come already, and had taken their places, a certaine stranger well appointed, like an amorous gallant in some Comedy, all in his purple, excessive otherwise in curious and cofily apparell, attended beside with a traine of lacquies and pages following athis heeles; and in one word, better guarded than regarded, came to the doore of the Hall or dining-Chamber, who after he had cast his eye round about, and viewed all the company how they fate at the table would not enter in, but flung away immediately, and stayed not. Many there were who ran after him, requesting him to return and beare them company; but in no wile would he, faying That he law never a place left worthy his person : which when they who were set already, underitood, (and many of them had taken their drinke well, and had in manner their full load) they being right glad, took up a great laughter, and with this note:

Now for well he, since needs he will be gone,

Better his roome than company (quotheachone.)

But after supper was done, my father addressing his speech unto me who sate a great way off: Timon and I (quoth he) have chosen thee for a judge, to decide a matter of some question and difference between us: for I blamed and reproved him a pretty while fine about this stranger; for if at the in his own place, we should not have been condemned for our over-sight and disorder in this behalfe especially by such a person who hath the skill

And tagatiers on foot, to lead the way.

For it is reported, that Paulus Emilius (him I meane, that defeated Perfeus King of Macedonie, after that glorious victory) made many great and magnificent feafts; wherein (besides the wonderfull furniture and provision that he ordained) he ob erved in all points a fingular order and dispose, faying. That to one and the same man belonged the knowledge, as well how to set out a most friendly and merry fealt, as to range a most terrible battell; for both the one and the other required great discretion and good order: which was the reason that Homer the Poet was wont (when he spake of right valiant warriers and most royall personages, deserving best the highest place of command) to tearme them κοσμάτος ως καδός, that is to say, the disposers and setters of the people in order. Yea, and you that are Philosophers doubt not to say and affirme: That the great God of heaven (in making and creating the world I did nothing but change disorder into good order, without putting to' or taking away ought that was before, by disposing and setting every thing in place meet and convenient; and so by giving a most beautifull forme to that consused on after or Chaos in nature, which had no forme at all wrought this admirable piece of work, which we call the World. As for these great and high points indeed of doctrine, we learne them of you; but we our selves are able to see and observe thus much; that how sumptuous soever a feast be otherwise, yet if it want good order, there is no grace or pleasure at all in it. A very ridiculous thing it is therefore, and a meere mockery that cooks, clerks of the kitchin, and fewers, should be so carefull what dishes ought to be served first, second in the middle, or in the last place : yea, and (beleeve me) to look unto it very diligently, that there be a convenient place ordained for perfumes & sweet odours, when they are to be brought in; for chaplets also and garlands that are to be distributed and dealt about; and last of all, for a minstrell wench (if any be there) to sing and play, where she may be best heard; and in the mean while the Master of the feast suffer those who are bidden to all this for to sit pell-mell at the table at a venture, as it they came only to fill and cram their bellies, without giving (either to age or to dignity, or to any matter of like quality) that ranke and order which is fit decent, and meet for every one: in the keeping of which diferetion, the best man in the place hath his due honour in sitting highest; he that is secondard inferior is by use and custome acquainted and well contented to sit accordingly; and the huisher who hash the ordering of the matter is well exercised to distinguish and judge that which is befitting every one according to his estate and degree. For it cannot stand with any reason, that in the Councell-house there should be a place known, either of sitting or standing, more or lesse honourable, according to the quality and dignity of the person; and that for setting men at the table, there should not be the like order observed. And is it meet, that the host or master of the feast frould drink to one before another, and yet have no regard at the first in placing of his guests? putting no difference, nor observing any distinction at all? making of a feast, even in the very beginning, one Myconos (as they say in the common proverb) which is as much as mith-math and confused minglemangle of all. And thus much of the realons and allegations of my father for his plea. But Timon my brother, on the contrary fide, answered. That he was not wifer than sage Bias; and confidering, that he refuted alwaies to be arbitratour or umpire between two of his own friends, though they requested him; why should himselfe become a judge at onceamong so many kinssolke and triends, yea, and other persons besides? especially, where the question is not about money and goods, but as touching pre-eminence and superiority; as if he had tentfor them all, not to be merry and make good chear, but to disquiet them, and set them out one with another, who were good friends before? For if (quoth he) Menelaus in old time committed one great abfurdity, infomuch as there grew upon it a proverb and by-word, in that he intruded himselfe unsent for into the Councill of Agamemon? far greater reasonthere is, that he should be thought more absurd, who constituteth and maketh himselfe, of a courreous host and civill master of a feath, an austere judge and precise censurer of those that require no such matter, nor willingly desire that one should determine and judge of them, who is the better man or the worfe; feeing they are not cited peremptorily to a judiciall Court for triall of a controverse, but invited friendly to a good supper, for to make merry? Over and besides no eafie matter it is to make diffinction aright; for that fome go before in age, others, in degree of kindred and linage; and therefore, he that would take such a taske or charge in hand, ought evermore to be fludying upon the degrees of comparison, or elle of the argument in Logick, A comparate, that is to fay, drawn from comparison; and to have alwaies in his hand, either the Topiques of Aristotle, oreliethe Precedences of Thrasymachus, abook which he entituleth Hyperbollontes, wherein a man should do no good at all; but contrariwise much harme, by transferring the vain-glory about higher place, from judiciall Courts, Common Halls and Theaters, to fitting at feafts; and whenhe hath endeavoured to abate and represse other passions of the soule by good-sellowship and company, keeping, now stir up and set on foot pride and arrogance; of which, inmine advice, we ought to fludy more for to clense our soules, than to wash and scoure away the dirt and filth from our see: to the end that we may converie familiarly and fellow-like at the table, with all mirth and finglenelle of heart. But now, when we go about and do what we can with one hand, to take away from our guels all rancor and enmity, bred either upon anger, or some worldly affaires that they have had together, in making them eate at one table, and drinke one to another, we do as much as lies in us, with the other hand to fret an old fore, and kindle a new fire of grudge and malice by ambition, in debafing one, and exalting another: but if withall, according to the preference which we have made in the placing of them we take the cup also and drink oftner, or fer better meat and daintier dishes to fome than to others; if, I say, we make more of this man than of that, cheare one up, and speak unto him after a more familiar manner than to another; furely, instead of a feast of friends and familiars, it will be a stately Assembly altogether of Lords and Potentates. But if in all things else we are carefull and precise in our featts, to observe and maintaine equality of persons; why begin we not at the first, in the placing of our guests, to accustome and acquaint them for to range themselves, and take their seats simply and familiarly one with another? considering at the first entrance into the Hall or great Chamber, they fee that they were not summoned aristocratically to a Senate house of Lords and great States, but invited democratically and after a popular manner to supper, where the poorest may take his place with the richest, like as in the state of a City and Commonwealth, called Democracy, After their opposite reasons were alledged, and that all the company there present demanded my sentence, I said, That taking my selfe chosen as an arbitrator, and not as a judge, I would deale indifferently, and with an equall hand in the middle between both As for those (quoth I) who feast young men their equals, all friends and of familiar acquaintance, they ought to accufrom shem (as Timon faith) to carry themselves so void of pride and arrogance, that they may take contentment in any place what soever that falleth out unto them; and to thinke this facility and singlenesse of heart, to be a singular meanes and provision for the feeding and nourishing of amity : but in case the question be of entertaining strangers, or worshipfull personages of high calling and great place in Common-weale, or of elder perions; I feare me, that as we shut out at one doore in the fore-front pride and arrogance, so we let it in at another bak-gate behind, by our indifference and making no distinction. Herein therefore we ought to give formewhat unto use and custome, or else we must altogether for beare all manner of cheering up, drinking to and faluting of our guests, which fashions we use not without judgement and discretion hand-over head, to such as we meet with or fee first; but with as great regard and respect as we can, honouring them according to their worth and quality:

With highest place, with viands of the best,

With most cupifull, and those not of the lest.

As faid Agamemon that great King of the Greeks, putting as you see the seat in the first and chiefe place of honour. We commend also King Aleinous, for that he placed the stranger who came in, next unto himselfe,

And caus'd his fon Laodama, A gallant, for that guest To rife, who close to father fat, And whom he loved best.

For to displace a best-belowed son, and in his roome to set an humble suppliant, was a singular example of rare cuttesse, and humanity. And verily the gods themselves do observe this distinction of place, and of sitting: for Nepsune although he came last into the Assembly of the gods in council.

Yet took his own place for all that, And in the midst of them he sat.

as being the feat which of right appertained unto him. And Minerva feemeth alwaies to challenge as proper and peculiar to her above all others, the very next place to Jupiter: which the Poet Homer dothafter a fort coverly infiniare unto us, speaking of dame There in this manner:

By Jupitet she sat, of speciall grace
And savour : For Minetva gave her place.
But Pindarus signifieth as much in expressed tearmes when he saith:
To lightning next that $\frac{1}{2}\text{lifeth}$ fire

To lightning next that Ji speth fir Sat Pallas, close unto her fire.

Howbeit, Timon faid, That we ought not to take from others, for to gratifie and pleasure, one; and takehe doth away, who maketh that vulgar and common, which by right is proper s and proper there is nothing more than that which is meet and befitting the dignity of each person: Moreover, in giving that superiority and preeminence to running fast, and making most haste, which is done unto vertue, kindred magistracy, and such other qualities, in seeming to avoid the opinion of being odious or offentive, to his bidden guests, he draweth upon himself so much more trouble and heartburning of others; for he offendeth them in depriving every one of that honour which he deferveth, or is wont to have. For mine own part, I do not thinke it so hard a peece of worke to make this diffinction, as he would have it to be: for first and formost, it is not ordinary nor often feen; that many men of like degree and dignity are bidden to one and the same feast; besides, being as there are, many honourable places, a man of judgement and discretion hath good meanes to dispole; of them accordingly, among many, if there be occasion; for one of them he may content in setting; him highest and above the rest; another he may please with a place in the midst; to one he may do the favour as to fet him next unto himselse; another he may gratifie by placing him close to some, friend or familiar of his, or elsefast by his master and reacher: in this order, I fay, he may fatisfie many of them who seeme to be of better reputation, in distributing the places also which are of more respect among them; as for the rest, I leave them meanes also for their contentment; namewant of iome honourable place. But fay, that their deferts and dignities be hard to be diffined want of iome honourable place. But fay, that their deferts and dignities be hard to be diffinentified, or the perions themselves not easie to be pleased; marke what advice I have in such a cale to lerve the turne: My father (if he be present) I take by the hand and let him in the most honourable place of all; if not, I do the same by my grand-fire, my wives father, or mine uncleby the fathers fide, or my colleague and companion in office, or elfemy fellow-Senatour and brother-Alderman, or fome one of those who hath some speciall and inward prerogative above others of honour and account; with the Master of the feast himselfe, that biddeth the guests : taking this for a sule in the cases borrowed out of the books of Homer, which are prefidents of duties and shew what is beleeming everyman to do; and namely, in that place where Achilles feeing Monelaus and Anulochus debating the matter very horly about the second prize for horse-running, and doubting how far forth theiranger and contention might proceed, would needs give the faid prize in question to a third man; pretending in a word, that he took pity of Eumelus, and that he was minded to do him some honour; but indeed and truth, it was to rake away the occasion of difference and quartell between the other two. As I was thus speaking, Lamprias, who was set close in an odde corner of the chamber, upon a low paller, thundering out his words after his wonted manner, demanded of the affiflance or company, in this wife; My Masters, pleaseth it you to give me leave forto teprove and rebuke a little this lottish judge here? and when every one made answer, saying, Good leave thave you speake your mind freely, and spare him not: And who can (quoth he) forbeare that Philosopher, who letteth out and disposeth of the places at a feast, like as he would do in some theater, namely, according to birth and parentage, wealth and riches, estate and authority in Common-wealth? year and as if he ordained the feats and fitting places, for to opine or give voice in that foleran Affembly, of the States of Greece, called Amphatrones; to the end, that even at the very table, whereas we are met toldrinke wine and be merry, we should not be 'rid of ambition, nor shake off the foolish defire of glory : for furely, the places at a feast ought not to be distributed for as respective to honour, but rather to the ease and pleasure of the guests that areto sit in them; neither is the dignity of each one by himselfe in his degree to be regarded, but rather; the affection, disposition, and habitude of the mind one to another how they can fort and frame together; like as our manner is to do in some other things which are to meet in one common conjunction: for a good architect or maion will not (I trow) lay his first worke or fore-front of the house with Attick or Lacedamonian marble, before the Barbarian stone, because the same is in some fort of a noble kind and comming from the worthier place; neither will a cuming painter dispole his richest and most costly colour in the principall place of his picture; nor the Carpenter or Shipwright employ before all other timber in the flem of his ship, either the pine tree wood of Pathmos in Pelopomesus, or the Cypresse of Candy: but so they order and distribute their stone, their colours, and their timber, that being joyned and fitted well together one with another, the common worke arising of them all, may be more streme and strong, faire, and beautifull, good, and commodious. And thus you see, God himselfe, whom our Poet Pindams calleth the best workeman and principal artisan, doth not place the fire alwaise alost, nor the earth below, but according as the use of bodies compounded doth require; like as Empedacles testifieth in these veries:

The oilters, minets of the fea,
Malhel fifth every one,
Wish maffle coat; the tortoile eke
Wish cruff at hard he flone,
And vaulted back, which arch-wife he Aloft doth hollowreare,
Show all; that heavy earth they do

Not in that place which nature ordained for it in the first constitution and framing of the univerfall world, but in that which the composition of a new worke requireth : for disorder and confufion is bad enough in all things; but when it commeth among men, especially when they are drinking and eating together, it sheweth her badnesse most of all by insolency, outrages, and other enormittes that camot be numbred; which to foreiee and remedy is the part of a man indultrious, well feen in policy, good order and harmony. And that is well faid of you, (answered we) but why envy you to this company that science of order, proportion, and harmony, and do not communicate it unto us ? Surely there is no envy at all (quoth he) in the way, in case ye will beleeve me, and be mled by me, in that which I do change and alter in the order of the featl, like as you would be directed by Epaminondas, if he should range a battell in good order, which before was in difarray. We all agreed, and gave him leave for odo: then he voiding first out of the hall or dining-place all the boies and lackies, calthis eye upon every one of us in the face, and faid, Hearken and give eare, how I meaneto range and fort you one with another; for I would advertile you of it before hand, because I am of this mind, that the Theban Pammenes, justly and upon good reason reproved Homer, faying that he had no skill at all in * love-matters, for that he ranged together in battell those who were of one and the same ration, and mingled such as were of the same race, linage, and bloud; whereas he should have joyned the lover, and the beloved, to the end that the whole battell might be incited by one spirit, and draw in the same line, as linked by a lively bond. Semblably, will I do in this feast of ours, not coupling at the table one rich man with another; nor matching a young man with a young man; ne yot fetting a Magistrate or a Ruler just by another; no, nor two friends rogether; for furely such an ordering as this hath no life in it, no vigour and power at all, either to breed and imprint, or to nourish and augment the hear of mutuall benevolence and affection of one to another; but framing and applying to that which hath need the thing that is fit and proper thereto, I would have a student to stenex unto a learned man ; a mild and gentle person unto one that is hard to be pleased; to an old prating sellow who loves to heare himselfe speake, a youth who is defirous to heare, I would place a boatting and glorious bragger with a dry child and foothing companion; with a teafly and cholerick man, one who is filent or of few words: if I fee a tichor mighty personage, and withall, bountifull and free of gift; I will setch out of one corner or other, some poore honest body to be his next-neighbour, to the end that from him (as out of a full sup) there might overflow some goodnesse into another which is void and empty: but I will be very wary and circumspect, that I do not fort two Oratours or professed Rhetoricians together, nor match one Poet with another for according to the proverbiall verie:

A barger can no betyer well abide, And chanter one by another is envitd.

Howfoever these two here Sofictes and Modes in confirming in alternative course the speeches one of another:

Blow not the conless that ready are to dye, But suft accord together most friendly.

I fever also assunder busic and troublessome persons, such as take one another by the throat; injurious folk, teastly and cholerick mensimerposing alwaies some mild and model: hatture between, as an emolitive of their hardnesse, for teare they should crisin and busic one another: contrastiviste, I bring together such as love wrettling, and other exercises of the body, hunters also, and those that proiesse husbandry: for of similitudes and resemblances two forts there be, the one quartellous and given to fight, as that of cocks; the other leving and timiable, as that of jays or daws. Also those that be good companions and can drinke well, I use to set und match close together; yea, and amorous folke:

Nationly those who feele hos fancies prick. To boies and of love musculine are sick.

As Sophoeles faith, but firch also as are pinched with the love of wives and maidens; for that being heat and enchafed with the fame fire; they will catch and take hold the fooner one other; like as pecces of iron that cleave and be nuited together when they be red hot; provided alwaies, that their loved o not fettle in one plate, whether it be made or female;

THE

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the reason that the place at the table, named Consular, is held honourable?

A Fter this there arose a question as touching the places of fitting at a table; for that some are reputed honourable in one countrey, and some inanother. Among the Persians, the middle place is accounted beit; for therein fitteth the King: In Greece the first is held chiefe and principall; and the Romans make most regard of the laft in the middle pallet or table; and this commonly is called the Consular place; whereas contrariwise, certaine Greeks that inhabite the Countrey about Ponrm and namely those of Heracles reckon the first of the said middle pallet, the highest place of honour: but we made most doubt of the said place called Consular: for the same was in our time alfocunted honourable; but not in regard that it was either the formost, or the midst; and besides, of the accidental qualities observed therein, some were not proper and peculiar to it alone, and othere feemed to be of no importance at all: howbeit, three reasons alledged there were, which seemed somewhat to move and induceus above the rest: the first was this, That the Consuls having denoted and expelled the Kings of Rome, and changed all into a more popular efface, withdrew them elves from the royall place in the midft to a lower roome, to the end, that by quitting and forgoing the place which to them appertained, they might avoid all occasions of making their power and authority odious unto thole that converied with them. Secondly, that feeing the two first tables or pallets being dellined and appointed for the guests invited, the third, and namely, the first place thereof belonged properly to him who made the feast; for there sitteth he most commodioully, in manner of a Coach-man in a Chariot, or Pilot in a ship; to see the whole order of the fervice: neither is he far from other tables, but that he may cheare up and welcome all the combany: for, of the places neare unto him, that underneath is appointed usually for his wife or children; and that above, ordinarily and by good right, was allowed for the most honomable personage of all them that were bidden, to the end, that he might it neare unto the Master of the feast, Thirdly, this place feemed to have this property by it felfe, that it was thought commodious for fich as were employed and had any affaires in hand. For the Roman Confull was nothing like unto "Archias sometime the Captaine Generall of the Thebans; who if there had been brought unto him any letters, news, or advertisement of importance, in the midlt of supper time; or if there fell out any actions occasions, would ry out aloud, and lay, To morrow morning will we think of eather matters i the pacquet of lettershe laid ande, and instead thereofcooke a boule of wine in hand: the Roman Confull (I say) was not such an one, but even at these times especially he is most seeilant, and looketh circumpectly about him, for not only according to the common proverbe in Æschylus:

But also amidst all pleasures, seasts, and patitimes, it is requisite in a wife Captaine, and man of goversiment, that he alwaies stand upon his guard, and carry a watchfull eye about him; to the end therefore that he might evermore be ready to understand all occurrents, to command allo, direct, signe, or usual relations to the standard of the stan

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What manner of man he ought to be who is chosen M. fter of the Feoft?

Rate my son in law, and Them our familiar friend, being with us at a certaine feast, where there began some missule and disorder, upon large drinking of wine, which notwithstanding was sone appeased, tooke occasion thereby to speake of the Mastery and Presidency of such feasts observed in old time, being of this opinion and sying (withall to me; That I ought to weare a chaplet of flowers upon my head, and not unsert the ancient custome of creating a King or Governous of the seast, who is to give order in all things, and to see there be no missule, by disuste and discontinuance to be utterly neglected and abolished; but rather that I ought to bring that laudable order up againe, and put it in practice. Of the same mind was the whole company, and liked very well of the morion; insomuch as they all with a loud voice and one accord, requested me to take the thing upon me: Seering then (quoth I) that you be all of this mind. I am content to chuic my selfe President, and Master of this Feast; and here to begin withall, I give commandement.

* मेरी हेट्स गामका दे-जनहर्त्तार to all the rest, that for this present they drinke at their own discretion, and as it pleaseth themselves: as for Crato and Theon, who were the first that set this matter on foot, I will by vertue of my office and place enjoyne them immarily and in few words, to declare here before us what manner of person ought to be chosen for the president, and Master of such a feast, and what he must aime at when he is elected; as also how he is to carry himselfe towards those who have made choice of him; and this charge I lay upon them two, permitting them to divide it between them, and to handle it according to their good discretion. At the first, they made some semblance of refusall, praying me to hold them excused: howbeit when they saw the whole company crying upon them tor to obey the President; (raw began first, and faid, That as the Captaine of the guard or watch ought himielie especially to be a most diligent and vigilant warder, according to the saying of Plas; even to should he who hath the command of guests met togetherior to make merry, be himselfe of all other a right good fellow, and a cheerefull companion; and fuch an one he shall be, in cale he be neither one that will quickly be cup-shotten, and over-seen with wine; nor yet untoward and unwilling to drinke liberally, much like as Cyrus wrote fometime unto the Lacedamonians: That as in ail other points he was more worthy to be a King than his brother; fo in this respect especially. that he would take his wine ingreater measure, and beare the same better than he: for he that will be foon drunke groweth infolent, unfeemly, and outragious in his drunkennesse: and he again, who is too too fober, and abitinent altogether, becommeth unpleasant and unsociable, meeter indeed to be a schoole-master, and to have the bringing up of boies, than a President of a seast to order guests. Pericles, 10 oft as he was chosen Captaine Generall of the Athenians, no looner put on his mande of estate, and was ready to set forward, but before any thing else, used thus to say unto himselfe, as, it were to refresh his memory by way of admonition : Look about thee now Pericles, thou hast the command of free men; thou commandest now the Greeks; nay, thou are commander of the Athenians; even so should our Master of a feast reason thus within himselfe: Thou hast the rule now of friends; to the end that he neither permit them to do any unleamly or dishonest thing; nor bereave them of their delights and pleasures; for as he ought to be friendly affected unto them in their ferious occasions, so he must be no enemy to their sports and pastimes, but framed indifferently and as it were well tempered for the one and the other; and yet by his natural disposition, he should, like good wine, be somewhat more enclined unto a kind of hardnesse or austerity: for by this meanes the wine which he drinketh will reduce his manners and behaviour to a meane or mediocrity, by moistning, as it were, and softning it, that it may be more gentle and pliable for as Xennphon faid, That the fad cheere, heavy and rusticall severity otherwise of Clearchus, seemed to bemore lightsome and pleasant in battell and conflict, by reason of his resolute confidence; even so, he who is by nature not bitter nor crabbed, but only grave and severe, by drinking, becommeth more remifle, and not so straight-laced; and by that meanes more lovely and amiable also. And thus much

Moreover, he ought above all things to know by experience every one of the guests: what alteraration there is wrought in them by drinking? Into what accidents or passions they be ready to falls and how they can beare ftrong wine? For we are not to thinke, but if there be a proper temperature and leverall mixture with water fit for every fort of wine; which Kings tafters and cup-bearers know well enough, and in that regard can differne and diffinguish, when they are to use more or lesse water to the delaying of wines; there is more reason that there should be a temperature likewife of man and wine, which our Master or President of a feast ought to know, and when he knoweth it, to observe; that like an expert Musician, by stretching as it were and setting up one a note higher, in making him to drinke largely, and letting down another by causing him as much to spare, he may bring and reduce different natures unto an uniforme equality and consonance, not measuring the same by weight and measure, pints or quarts, nor by so many cups or glasses, but going by a certaine rule of time and age, as also by the strength of the body, giving to each one that which is meet and convenient. Now if peradventure this seeme an hard peece of worke, namely, to know all these particularities, yet meet it is at least wife that he should be skilfull in generality, as touching severall complexions and ages: as for example, that old folke are sooner and more easily made drunke than young persons; those that be stirring and in continual motion, rather than sich asbe in repose and rest; sad, heavy, pensive, and melancholick men, more than those who are jocund and merry; laftly, those who are chafte, or use women modeftly, much more than such as be dissolute or excessively given that way. He that is thus far forth acquainted with these circumstances, may be a meeter and fitter person a great deale to maintaine decency, order, and agreement at a fealt, than he who is ignorant therein. Furthermore, what is he who knoweth not very well, that the mafler of a feast ought to be well affected, and to carry a loving mind unto all those who are invited to a feast; to carry neither open malice, nor fecret grudge to any one of them: for otherwise, if he commandeth ought, it will not be well taken; if he distribute and deale amongst them, he shall not be thought equall and indifferent slaft of all, if he be disposed to mirth and jollity, he shall hardly escape a rebuke and blame. Loe, Theon, what manner of President and Master (quoth Crase) I have framed unto you by words, as if he were wrought out of waxe, and him I deliver into your hands. Then answered Theon: And I receive him from you so much the rather, as one shaped and fashioned indeed for a right governour of a feast, and a good companion besides: but whether I shall ever use him or no, or whether in so doing I shall shame my selfe, I wot not : howbeir, this I am assured of, that if he be such an one as you have described, he will know how to order and governe a feast, and not suffer that one while it seeme a solemn assembly of a City, another while a schoole of Rhetorick, now a knot of dice-players or cheaters met together, and anon a scaffold for footh for dancers and fingers, or a stage for players and comedians: this I say, for that you see ordinarily some making orations, and pleading at the table, as it were in the Court, or at the barbefore judges; others exercifing themselves how to speake in publike, or elle rehearing and reading certaine of their own compositions; and others againe taking upon them like judges of dancers and stage-plaiers, who do belt for to win the prize; and yet this is not the world for Alcibiades and Theodorus made of Politions leaft, a very place of divine mysteries, representing there the, folemn carrying of torches and other ceremonies, at the shewing of some sacred reliques; which I would not have a good Master and President of a teast to be so carelesse as to abide; but to allow place and time for such talke, such spectacles, sights, plaies, and pastimes only, which tend to that end for which leasts be made; that is to fay, to breed and augment amity between them that are prefent, by the meanes of the delight they take in eating together; for that in truth a feast is nothing else but a pleasant recreation at the table, a ming at this marke, to contract triendship by the entercourse of mutual drinking one to the other.

But foraffnuch as in all things variety is very pleafing, and nature joyeth in nothing more than in diverfity and change; but contrarisule, a fimple uniformity alwaies, one and the lame, is furtfull, and bringeth tedioulned with it incontinently; whereas the mixture of diversthings applied in time and place with measure, taken that away which is oftenive to pleafure, and hurtfull to profit therefore the Mafter of a feaft must devile for his suefts, and exhibite unto them fome mixed foror top: file away the time whiles they be drinking. I have heard many men fay, that to walk by the feaf fide, as also to faile along the shore is most pleafant; and even io a man must joyne alwaise for with ferious affaires, and profit with pleafure, to the end that those who play may in some fort be in good earneft; and likewise, when they be buse in ferious matters, find some eccreation; like as those who are fea-fick, and ready ever and anon to calt up their shorack, recover their spirits and are revived, when they be how they be neare the land; even so aman may profit in mirth and laughter; he may likewise laugh and be merry in profit, and make his serious affaires pleasant enough; for as the old proverbe gooth:

With calthrop thiftles, and among the pricky rest-harrow, The violets and soft wall-slowers are alwaies wont to grow.

But as for all other sports and plaies, which without any profit at all leap impudently into feasts, he shall command his guests expresly to forbeare, lest ere they be aware they become outragious and furious, like as those who have taken the juyce of henbane: they also abuse their power, and go too far in their commandements, (for to they be called at the wine) who enjoyne flutters, frammerers, and mafflers to fing, or bald-pates to kembe their heads for lame creeples to go upright on their feet without halting. Thus upon a time at a certain merry meeting and feaft, where Agamefor the Academick Philosopher was, who had a withered leg, and nothing let thereof but skin and bone, all the company (by way of mockery) infulted upon him, and made a Law among themselves, that they should stand all upon their right leg, and every one drinke his boule of wine, or else pay a. certaine peece of money, as a forfeiture: now when it came to Agamefors turne by right to com mand, he charged them all to drinke in that fore and manner as they faw him to drinke: then called he for an empty earthen pitcher with a narrow mouth to be brought into the place; into which when he had thrust his poore consumed leg aforesaid, he dranke up his cup of wine; and when all the rest had assaud, and sound they could not do as he did, were all forced to pay the forseir. Herein was Agamesor to be commended : for after his manner the Master of a feast ought to be revenged in a kind of mirth and gentle fort; also to accultome himselfe to such commandements, as tend to pleasure and profit both, charging each one to do those things which be proper, possible, and easie for him, and yet may commend the doer: as for example, to impose upon them who have good voices, and be professed Missicians, to sing; Orators and Rhetoricians to declaime; Philosophers, to associate associated every one of these joyeth and taketh pleasure to be put to that

Wherein he knows he can do well, And other men far doth excell.

There was sometime a King of the Assyrians, who by voice of heralds, and sound of trumpet. Proclaimed a great prize and reward to him that could devise a new kind of pleasure: but the King and Governour of a seast should do very well to propose an honourable reward unto him that could invent an honest game or pastime, wherein were no insolency, some delight or disport profitable, and provide laughter not accompanied with wanton reproofe and scornfull reproach, but such as carrieth, agrace and peasure with it: for this is it wherein most part of feasts insten shipwrack, namely, when they are misgoverned, or not ordered as they ought to be. But the part it is of a wise and pradentman, to know how to avoid enmity and anger in the market-place, gotten by avarice; intelleptuals of the bubblish halls of bodily exercises, by contention and emulation; in bearing offices, and suing for them, by ambition and Jvain-glory; and last of all, in feasts and banquets, by such places and paftimes.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is meant by this common proverbe: Love teacheth musick and poetry.

"He question was moved one day in Soffius Senerius houle, after certaine verses of Sappho were A chanted, how this faying of Euripides should be understood: Love teacheth musick, marke when you will,

Though one before thereof had no skill.

Considering that the Poet Philoxenus reporteth, how Cyclops Polyphemus the giant cured his loveby the sweet tongued Muses? Whereupon it was alledged, that Love is of great power to move a man for to be bold, hardy, and adventurous, yea, and ministreth a readinesse to attempt all novelties, according as Plato named it, the enterprizer of all things; for it maketh him talkative and full of words, who before was filent; it causeth the bashfull and modest person to court it, and put himfelle forward in all manner of fervice; it is the meanes that an idlecarelesse lubber, and a negligent, becommeth diligent and industrious; and that which a man would most marvell at, a miching hard-head and mechanicall penni-father, if he fall once to love, doth relent and waxe foft as iron in the fire, and so proveth more liberall, courteous, and kind, than ever before: so that this pleasant and merry proverbe, feemeth notto be altogether ridiculous and impertinent, namely, that Lioves purie is tied and knit up with a leeke or porrer blade. Moreover, it was there spoken, That Love resembled drunkennesse, for that the one as well as the other doth set folke in a heat; it maketh them cheerefull, merry, and jocund; and when as men be once come to that, they fall foon to fing, to rime and make veries. And it is faid, that the Poet Eschylus composed his Tragedies, when he had welldrunken, and was heat with wine. I had a Grandfather also my selfe, named Lamprias, who leemed alwaies more learned, witty, and fuller of inventions, yea, and to surpasse himselse in that kind, when he had taken his cops liberally; and he was wont to lay, That at such a time he was like unto incense, which being set on fire, rendreth the sweet odour that it hath. Moreover, they that take exceeding great pleasure to see their loves, are no lesse affected with joy whenthey do praise them, than in looking upon them : for love, as it is in every thing a great pratter, and full of words; so especially and most of all, in praises: intomuch, as lovers would willingly perswade others to that, wherein they are themselves perswaded first; namely, that they love nothing but that which is perfect in goodnesse and beauty; and others they would have to be witnesses with them with the most in that induced the Lydian King Candaules, to draw and traine Giges into his bed-chamber, for to fee the beauty of his wife naked: for why? fuch are willing to have the testimony of others. Loe, what the reaton is, that if they write the praises of that which they love, they embelifth and adorne the fame with verfes, fongs, and meeter, like as imiges with gold; to the end that the faid praires might be heard more willingly, and remembed better by more people: for if they bestow a fighting-cock, an horse or any other thing whattoever, upon those whom they love, their mind is principally, that this their present should be faire and beautifull in it selfe; afterwards, that it be most gallantly and in best manner set out ; but above all, in case they be disposed to slatter them in words or writings, their chiefe care is, that the same run roundly and pleasantly, that they be also glorious and beautified with fine figures, such as is ordinarily the slile of Poets. Then Soff as approving well of these reasons, said moreover, That it were well is some would take in hand to draw and gather arguments out of that which Theophraftus left in writing as touching Musick: For long it is not (quoth he) fince I read over that book; wherein he delivereth thus much after a divine manner: That three principall causes or roots there be of Musick, to wit, paine, or griefe, pleasure, or joy, and the ravishment of the spirit; of which threevery one doth bend and turne the voice a little out of the ordinary tune: for griefes and for rows usually bring with them moanes and plaints, which quickly run into fong; which is the reason that we see Oratours in the perora-tions or conclusions of their speeches the actours also in tragedies, when they come to make their dolefull lamentations, bring their voices down gently to a kind of melody, and by little and little tune them(as it were) thereto. Also the great and vehement joyes of the mind do lift up all the body of them especially who are anything lightsome by nature, yea, and provoke the same to leap, skip, and clap their hands, observing a kind of motion according to number and measure, if they

And otherwise in furious fort, Like frantike folke they dodiffort ; They shake, they wag, they fet out throat,

And fend out many a foolifh note.

According as Pindar: staits. But in case they be somewhat more grave and staied than others, when they find thenellees moved with fuch a palison of joy, they let their voice only go at liberty, feather and national moves when they find thenellees moved with fuch a palison of joy, they let their voice only go at liberty, feathing aloud and finging lonners. But above all, the ravishment of the spirit, or that divine impiration, which is called Enthusiasmus, cateth body mind, voice, and all, far beyond the ordinary habit; which is the cause, that the surious and riging Priests of Bacchus, called Baccha, use rime and meeter; those also, who by a propheticall spirit give answers by Oracle, deliver the same in verse; and few perions shall a man see starke mad, but among their raving speeches, they sing and say some verses. This being fo, if you would now display love, and view it well, being unfolded and laid open abroad, hardly shall you meet with another passion, which hath either sharper dolours, or joyes more violent or greater extanes and ravishments of the spirit, lying (as it were) in a trance; so that a man may discover in amorous persons, a soule much like unto that City which Sophocles describeth:

Full of songs and incense sweet,

Of fight and grounds nevery freet,
No marvell is it therefore, nor a strange thing, if love (containing and comprehending in it selfeal those primitive causes of musick, to wit, dolour, joy, and ravishment of spirit, be likewise in all other things diligent, industrious, talkative, and namely, inclined to making of veries and chanting fongsasmuch or rather more than any other passion which can enter into the heart of man.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Whether King Alexander of Macedony were a great drinker.

Here was some speech upon a time, as touching King Alexander the Great, to this effect: That Here was some speech upon a time, as fourning and passed the time away in devising and talking the dranke not so much, as far long at his meat, and passed and day-hooks of the faid Kines with his friends: but Philinus shewed by certaine scrowles, papers, and day-books of the said Kings house, that they who heldthat opinion knew not well what they faid, for that this particular infance was ordinarily found in thole records, That fuch a day the King (lept all day long upon his liberall drinking of wine; yea, and otherwhiles it appeareth, that he slept the morrow after likewife; which is the reason, that he was not so forward in venereous matters, nor given much to women, though otherwise he was haify quick and couragious; great arguments of an inward heat of body: and it is to be seen upon record, That his sless weekled from it, and breathed a passing sweet fmell ; infomuch as his shirts and other cloaths were full of an aromaticall sent and savour, as if they had been perfumed; which feemeth also to be an argument and figue of heat. For we fee, that those be the hottest and driest countries which bring forth Cynamon and Frankincense, according as Theophrestus saith, That a sweet odour proceedeth of perfect concoction and digestion of humours; namely, when by naturall heat all superfluous moisture is quite chaled and expelled. And by all likelihood this was the principall cause, that Callishenes grew into disgrace, and lost the Kings favour; for that he was unwilling to sup with him, in regard that he would impose upon him to drinke so much. For it is reported, that upon a time the great boule or goblet, surnamed, Alexanders boule, having passed round about the table throughout, untillit came to Callishenes, hierefused it, and put it back: [aying withall, I will not drinke in Alexander for to have need of Escalapius. And thus much was faid then concerning King Alexanders much wine-bibbing,

Moreover, King Mithridates, he who warred against the Romans, among other games or prise which he exhibited, ordained one for those who could drinke best and eate most; and by mens saying himselse performed them both so well, that he won the prize in the one and the other: for he ong innerence and drinke more than any man Iving in his time: by occasion whereof he was commonly furnamed Dion fu, that is to fay, Bacchus, But as touching the reason of this furname, we say it is an opinion rashly received: for when he was a very infant lying in the cradle, the lightning caught the swadling cloaths, and setthem on fire, but never touched or hurt his body, save only that there remained a little marke of the fire upon his forehead, which not with handing the haire did cover that it was not greatly seen, so long as he was a child: againe, when he was a man grown, it chanced that the lightning pierced into the bed-chamber where he lay affeep; and for his own person it was notfomuch as inged therewith; but it blatted a quiver of atrows that hung at his bed-fide, went through it, and burnt the arrows within; which (as the foothfayers and wifemen out of their learning did interpret) fignified, that one day he should be puissant in archers and light armed men. But most men assisting, that he got his surname of B. seehus, or Diomfus in regard of the resemblance and liken see of such accidents of lightning and blasting as many times betall.

After these words passed they entred into a speech as touching great drinkers; among whom was reckoned also one Heraclides, alamous wreftler, or champion, whom the men of Ahexadrian our fathers drive pecafantly called little Hercules. This good fellow when hercould not meet with a companion able to set foot to his, and drinks with him continually; used to invite some to breake their fast with him in a morning; others to beare him company at dinner; some he would bid to Supper; and intreat others last of all to sit with him at his collation or banquet after supper: now when the first were gone, came in the second immediately; then you should have the third succeed them in place: and no looner were they departed, but in the fourth crue, without any inter-reption: and he himtelic face it out fill, and making no intermittion, was able, to hold out with all, and beare those foure repasts and resections one after another. Among those who were familiarly acquainted with Drufun tonto the Emperour Tiberius, a Phylician there was, who in drinking would challenge and defie all the world : but observed it was by some that spied and looked neare unto him, That to prevent drunkennesse. he used to take alwaies five or six bitter Almonds before every cup that he drunke: and when he was once debarred of them, and not suffered to to do, he was not able to beare his drinke, nor resist the least headinesse and strength thereof. And verily some there be

The First Book.

And hardly thorow their eares the way can find, Their eyes do see far off confusedly, But neare at land, they all be very blind.

If then it befo, that the fenses of aged persons, and the instruments serving thereto, are not willingly obeilant to their proper objects, unleffe the fame be frong and vehement; what should the cause be, that in reading they cannot endure the reverberation of the light from letters, if they be near? But letting the book farther offfrom their eyes, they do by that meanes enfeeble (as it were) that light; for that it is spread and diffipate in the aire, like as the strength of wine when it is tempered with water ? To this probleme some answered thus; That they remove books and letters far from their eye-light; not because they would make the said light more mild or lesse radiant; but contratheir eye includes they are destrous to catch, and gather more splendors, and to fill the meane intervall (which is between the eye and the letter) with lightsome and shining aire. Others accorded with those who hold that the eyes do send out of them certaine raies; for by reason that as well from the one eye as the other a pyramidall beame doth iffue, the point whereof is the fight of the eye, and the baits doth comprehend the object that is een; probable it is, that both these pyramides go forward apart one from the other a good space and distance, but after they be a great way off, and come to encounter one another, and be confounded together, they make but one entire light; and this is the reason that albeit the eyes are twaine, yet every thing that we're appeareth one; and not two's for that (in truth the meeting and shining together of those two pyramides in common, do make of two lights but one. This being presupposed and fet down, old men approaching neare to letters, comprehend the fame more feebly, in regard that the pyramidall beames of their eyes are not yet joyned and met together, but each of them reach to the objects apart; but if they be faring not yet 100 ned and met together out each of the most experied by much like to them, there off, to that the faid pyramides may be intermingled, they fee more perfectly; much like to them, who with both hands can claipe and hold that, which they are not able to do with one alone.

Then my brother Lamprias opposed himselfe against all this; and as one wito had not read the book of Hieronymue but even upon the pregnancy and quicknede of his wit feemed or render affective reason 1 namely, That we see by the meanes of Certaine images arising from the objects of visiting to the reason 1 namely. ble things, which at the first be big, and for that cause trouble the fight of old folk, when they regard them neare and hard by, being indeed but hard and flow of, motion: but when the faid images be advanced and ipread farther into the aire, and have gained some good distance, the grosse and Best of them breake and fall down; but the more fubtile portions reach as far as to the eyes without any paine or offence unto them, and do infinuate and eccommodate themselves equally and imoothly into their concavities: so that the eyes being lesse troubled, apprehend and receive them better. And even so it is with the odours of flowers, which are very sweet to smell unto a good way off i whereas if a man come over-neare thro them, they yee'd nothing to kind and plea-fant a fent: the reason is, because that together with the savour there goeth from the flower much earthly matter, groffe, and thick, which corrupteth and marreth the fragrant sweetnesse of the o-down in the imelied to very neare; but in case the same be a pretty way off, that terrestriall evaporation is dispersed round about, and so falleth away, but the pure and not part thereof, continueth behind, and pierceth forward still, by reason of the subrilly that it bath, untill it be presented unto the nostrils. But we, receiving and admitting the principle of Plao, affirme and hold, That there passeth from the eyes an illuminate spirit, which intermingleth it selfe with the clearenesse and light that is about the bodies of visible objects; by which meanes there ariseth an united composition from them twaine, according in every point one with another, but concorporate they be by meafure and proportion; for neither the one nor the other ought to perish, a; being surmounted by his the and proportion; for neither the one not the ones ought to perint, as computmounted opinis fellow but of twaine contempered together in just proportion, there is made one puisance and meane faculty between, Seeing then, that the thing which passen the order the eye-fight of those persons who be far steprin yeares, be it some fluxion, lightione spirit, or bright beame, (call it what you will) is inthem weake and seeble, there cannot be a mixture and composition of it with the shining aire abroad, but rather an extinction and suffocation, unlesse they remove the letters a pretty way off from their eyes. and by that means temper and resolve the exceeding bright nesse of the light. so as the same hit not upon their fight, so long as it is too radiant and resplendant, bur measured and proportioned to the feeblenesse of their eyes. This also is the cause of that which befalleth to those living creatures which fee best in the darke, and feed themselves by night; for their eye-fight being naturally weake is offusate and darkened by the great light of the day; for that such weak raies proceeding from so tender a source or sountaine will not well fort and agree with so strong and forcible light; but their eyes do send forth beames inflicient and proportionable, to be mingled with a light moredim and duskith like as the light of a star in the night leason appeareth best: and thus being incorporate with it it, it is cooperative to the performance of sense.

who say, that these Almonds have an agherive property to bite, to cleanse and scoure the flesh, in such fort, as that they will take away the spots and freckles of the visage; by reason of which quality, when they be taken afore drinke, with their bitternelle they fret the pores of the skin, and leave the impression of a certaine bitting behind them, by meanes whereof, there ensueth a certaine revulfion downward from the head of those vapours which flie upthither, and so evaporate away through the faid pores. But for mine own part, I am of this opinion rather, that their bitterneffe hath a vertue to dry up and spend humours: which is the reason that of all vapours the bitter is most unpleafant and difagreeable to the tatle: for that indeed as Plato faith, confuming moisture (as it doth) by means of the drinefle which it hath, it doth unnaturally bind & draw in the little veins of the tongue, means of the offinene which is harry a dorn unmanning onto a cutaw in the rate veins of the topigue, which of themselves be soft, and spungeous: after the same minner men use to restraine such wounds or ulcers which be moift with medicines, or falves composed of bitter drugs, according as the Poer Hom er tellifieth in these verses:

A bitter root he bruis'd with hands, Andlaid upon the fore, To take the anguish cleane away, That it might ake no more: And loe, applied when it was, All paines were foon allaid, The running ulcer dried anon, And flux of blowd was staid.

He said well and truly of that which is in taste bitter: That it hath a vertue and property to dry, And it should feem also, that the powders which women strew upon their bodies for to represse diaphoreticall and extraordinary sweets, be by nature bitter and astringent; so forcible is their bitterneffe to bind and restraine; which being so, great reason there is, (I say) that bitter Almonds should have power to withfland the strength of meere wine, considering they dry the body within, and will not permit the veines to be full, upon the tention and commotion whereof (they fay) drunkennesse doth proceed: and for evident proofe of this, there may be a good argument gathered from that which befalleth foxes; who having eaten bitter Almonds, if they drinke not presently upon them, dietherewith, by reason that all their humours suddenly are spent and consumed.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

What is the canse that old folke take greater delight in pure and strong wine than others.

Here arose a question about oldpersons, what the reasons might be, that they loved better to drink wine with water, or at the least wise delayed but a little? Some alledged the habit of their bodies, being cold, and hard to be fer into an hear; in regard whereof, the firength of wine was meet and agreeable to their temperature: a reason very common and ready at hand; but surely, neither fufficient for to be the cause of such an effect, nor yet simply true; for the same happeth to their othersences, as being hard to be moved and affected; yea, and nothing easie to be stirred, for to apprehend the qualities thereto belonging, unlesse the same be passing strong and vehement; whereof the true cause indeed is this: that their temperature being weake, dull, and seeble, loveth to be put in mind by knocking upon; and this is the caule, that for their tafte they delight in fuch fa-pours as be biting; their finelling likewise stanpeth even foto odours that be strong, for affected it is with more pleature in such as be not rempered nor delayed; as for the sense of couching, they seels no great paine of nicers and fores; and if it happen that they be wounded, their hurt and harmeis not fo great: the same befalleth to their hearing, for their eares be in manner dease: and hereupon it is that Musicians as they grow in yeares and waxe aged, straine and raise their voice in singing so much the higher and louder, as if they stirred up the organs of hearing by the vehement force of the found; for look what is feele to the edge and temper of iron for cutting; the fame is spirit to the body, for fene and feeling; and when it begins to flack, faile, and decay, the fenfe likewife and the infirmments thereof become dull, heavy, and earthly, having need of fome fach quick thing to prick it in good earnest as strong wine is.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

How it comes to passe, that oldfolk read better afar off than neare at hand.

A Gaing those reasons which we devised and alledged upon the subject matter and point in hand, it seemed that there might be opposed to the eye-sight; for that elder persons, for to read any thing the better, remove the letters farther from their eyes; and in truth cannot well read neare at hand: which the Poet Efenjus feemeth covertly to imply, and shew unto us in these verses: Know him thou canst not, if neare he stand to thee,

A good old scribe thou maiest much sooner be,

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that cloaths be better washed in fresh water than that of the sea?

Heon the Grammatian, upon a time when we were feafted by Metrius Florus, demanded of Themsfloder the Philotophes, how it came to paffe that Chrysppus having made mention in many places of thange politions and paradoxes, which feemed to go against all reason; as for example: That fall fish, or powdred fish, if it be watered or washed in fea-water, becommeth more iweet: also fleeces of wooll are leffe pliable, if they be plucked forcibly, than if they be gently handneed: and needs on normal methods are the states of the st more ituno whom Themilaclei aniwered, That Chrysippus proposed them by the way only, and is other: Unto whom Themilaclei aniwered, That Chrysippus proposed them by the way only, and is it were for example sake to advertise and admonith us; for that we are ready to believe, even with out all reason, any thing that carrieth with it somesmall likelihood and probability, and contratiwile to discredit that which at the first fight seemeth unlikely: But what reason I pray you (quoth he) my good friend have you to fearch and enquire into these matters? For if you be to contemplative and inquifitive in finding out the causes of naturall things, you need not to go far from that which belongeth to your profession: but tell me why Homer bringeth in Nansican, washing her cloaths in the river, and not in the fea which was so neare unto her; notwithstanding that salt sea waterbeing hotter, more transparant, and abiterive than fresh water of the river, seemeth by all agreements are rance better for to wash withaul? As touching this proble (quoth Theon) long since hath Ariffishe resolved it referring all to the terrestricty of the leas for that in sea water there is mingled much earthrenoved it, reterms and the which cautesh it to be fo falt, by reason whereof it beareth them up better who swim therein's allo it carrieth a greater and heavier burden than fresh waters, the which yeeldeth and giveth way, as it is more subtile, lighter, and seebler, as being more simple and pure in which regard it vent way, as a same and the penetrative faculty it foureth and cleanfeth away all flaines and flois petereth fooner, and by this penetrative faculty it foureth and cleanfeth away all flaines and flois better than fea-water and thinke you not that this reason of Ariffule carrieth great apparence of reuth? Yes verily, (quoth 1) there is apparence and probability indeed thereof, but no truth at all for this I fee ordinarily that the manner is to increasing the water with assess or gravell stones; or if there benone to be had, even with very dust, as if the roughnesse of terrestrial substance were nr there behind to be had a true and the same and behalf the same and is penetrant and piercing; for this acrimony doth unbind and open the small pores, and so draweth forth the ordure outwardly; whereas contrativite, that which is groffe and thick is nevergood and meet forto wath withall, but rather it maketh foots and staines: now is the sea futty and oylelous, which may be a principall cause why it is not good to wash withall: and, that sea-water is unctious, Arifforle himielfe beareth witnesse; tor even salt it selfe hath a certaine fattinesse andun-Ruofity init; by reason whereof it causeth those lamps to burne more clearely wherein it is put: yea, and sea-water if it be sprinkled or dropped upon the slame, will likewise be of alight stream burn with all; neither is there any water that burneth so much as that of the sea; and in this regard I am of opinion, that it is of all other water hottest: howbeit there may be another reason yeelded: for considering that the end and confummation of washing, is to drysthose things we hold most near and cleane which are drieft; and therefore the moifture that doth wash must go away together with the ordure; like as the root of Ellebore is fent out of the body with the melancholike humour : as for the humidity which is sweet and fresh by reason of the lightnesse thereof, the sun draweth it up very quickly; whereas the faltnesse of the sea-water sticketh fast to the small pores, and by reason of the asperity thereof is hard to be dried. Then Theon: This that you say (quoth he) is nothing but very falle; for Ariffatle in the same book affirmeth, that those who wash in the sea are fooner dry than they that wash in fresh water, if they stand in the sun, He saith so indeed (quoth I) but I thought that you would sooner beleeve Homer, who holdeth the contrary. For Uly fer after he had inffered shipwrack met with Lady Nansicaa:

All terrible and fearefull to be feen For that in fea all plunged he had been. Yea, and himselse said unto her women and waiting maidens: Retire afide and stand you far from me, Faire damofels, untill fuch time you fee, That I have washt from off my shoulders twaine The filth of feathat now my thin doth staine.
And when he had thus said, he went down into the river, And there anon he scowr'd cleane away The falt sea-fome, upon his head that lay.

In which place, the Poet hath marvellous well observed and expressed that which ordinarily hapneth in such a case: for that when they who come forth of the seastand drying them in the sun; his heat doth presently diffipare the most subtile and lightest substance of the humidity, and then, that which is most foule and filthy remained behind, slicketh to, is baked and felred to the skin, in manner of a falt crust, untill it be washed off with fresh and potable water.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that at Athens they never judged nor pronounced the danne of the tribe Aeantis to be the laft?

T the folemn feast which Serapion made for the victory of the daunce, which the tribe or linage Acantis obteined, by his leading and conduct: to which teat we were bidden, as being of that tribe; for that the people had endued us with the priviledge and right of bourgeofie in the same; much talkthere was occasioned by the great emulation and tirile which had been for the honour of that prefent daunce: and indeed followed it was with much yeal and heat of affection, by reason that king Philopappus himselfe in peacon, was a most honourable and magnificent president hereofshaving defraied the charges belonging to the daunces of every tribe; who being present also with us, invited guests to this stately supper (as he was a prince no less courteous and full of humanity, than fludious and defirous of knowledge) had both the proposing and also hearing of many antiquities. Now there was propounded and pur to discourse, such a matand an internal and an analysis of the control of t the reit, that their daunce was never adjudged to the last place. That writer (quoti the king) is not sufficient to authorize a history; but supposing that this were true, let us make it the subject matter of our discourse at this present, and learch the cause thereof. But admit (quoth our friend Mile) that this were a falle tale. What then? (quoth king Philopappus) there were no great mar-Demogratus; who feeding one day (as it should be m) upon a cutumber, when he perceived the jul e and liquor thereof to be very lweet, and to tast of hony; demanded of his maid-fervant who attended upon him, where the bought it: who named a certein garden: whereupon he role from the board, and would needs have her to bring him thither, and to shew him the very place where it grew: but the wen h wondring at her master, and asking him the reason what he meant to be gone in furth halt: Why (quoth he)I mult needs find out the cause of this extraordinary sweetness, and made it I shail, when I have well viewed and considered the place: hereat the maiden smiling : fit you ttill good Sir (quoth she) and let this thing trouble your head no farther; for the truth is this: I chanced before I was aware, to put this cucunmber into a vessell that had hony in it. Then Democritus feeming to be offended and displeased with her : Thou angers me to the heart with thy prittle-prattle, I will (I tell thee) go forward in this my intended purpole, and fearch into the cause hereof, as if this sweetness were naturall and came of the cucumber it selfe; and even so we will not pretend this readiness and facility of Neanthes in delivering some matters in the dible, as an evalion or excuse, to avoid this present disputation: for it none other good will come of our discourse, yet I am sure it will serve well to whet and exercise our witsche while. Then all the company at once with one accord, fell to praise the laid tribe Acanis, relating and collecting what comendable acts foever and glorious feats of armes had been performed by that tribe. And here they failed not to rehearle the famous battel of Marathon, which is a State belonging to the tribe Acuti. The forgat not to alledge likewife, how Harnadus and Aribotists were Rantides, born in Aphidae, a town of that tribe, Alio Glassias the oratour affirmed, that the Tight wing or point of that battel of Marathon, was affigued to them of that tribe, proving the same by the Elegies or veries which the poet Acfebylus had composed in the praise of their good service, having him lese in person sought valiantly in the said conflict. Moreover, he shewed that Callimachus the high marshall of the field, being one of that linage, both bare himselse right bravely that day, and was one of the principall authors (after captain Militiades) of that fought field, gave his voice with him, and perswaded to strike this battel. Unto this all egation of Glaucias, I whether the Arthur was president of the councell at Ashen; as also that the same tribe at the tribe Acids was president of the councell at Ashen; as also that the same tribe in the battel of Platea carried away the praise and prize for their brave service above the rest : and hereupon it is, that this tribe of Acantis folemnizeth every year a stately sacrifice, for that victory, as being commanded and appointed to to do by the oracle of Apollo, upon the mount Citharon, and * Sacriff and the same performed by nympths or maidens * Sphagitides: for the celebration of which solemni- cers. ty, the city furnisheth them with beasts and other things need full for the same sacrifice. But yet you see (quoth I) that all the rest of the tribes may as well alledge for themselves many valiant acts by them at hieved; and namely Leantis; from which my felfe am descended, which in glorious renown, giveth place to none whatfoever. Confider therefore my masters, whether it be not very like and more probable, that this was attributed unto it, for to appeale and comfort that worthy person who gave the name unto this tribe; I meane Ajax the son of Telamon, who had not the patien eto endure the overthrow in judgement, and lois of Achilles armour, but was fo far inflamed with envy, emulation, and wrath, that he spared nothing, nor cared for the ruine of all: to the end therefore that he might not fall into another fit of fury, and be implacable, thought good it was to eate him of the thing which might of all things offend and vexe him most, in that distavour and dilgra e to wit: That the tribe which be teth his name, should never be thrust down into the lowest and last place.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

What be the things whereof Xenophon faith: That men love better to be asked and to be scoffed at for, when they fit at the board, than otherwise no?

The Pre-

F those things (O Soffins Senecio) which are provided to furnish and set out featisand banquets, some are to be ranged as altogether necessary; namely, bread, wine, viands, meats, both flesh and fish, benches, stools, formes, and tables; others be but acccessaries and may be spared, devised only for pleasure, and not upon any urgent necessity; as plaies, shewes, and pattimes brought in, either to be heard or seen; some pleasant buffon or merry selfer to makefolk laugh, such an one as Philip in Kallais his house, which disports men are delighted in otherwhiles, if they be presented, and if they be not, they are not greatly missed, nor much cared for, neither is the feast thought desective for want thereof. The same may be said of table-talk: for one kind there is which modest and civill men do embrace and enterteine, in regard of their proper use fitting and agreeable for meals and meat indeed; another for they admit, and allow, as conteining some gentle speculation, and the same beseemeth rather the time imployed in hearing mulick, of flute, hautboies, lute and viall. And of both thefe, our first book conteined certain miscellane examples one with the other; as namely, of the first fort were these questions: whether it be good and commendable, to treat and dispute of philosophicall matters at the table or no? Also, whether it be better, that themaster of the feast himselse place his guests, at the board, or permitthem to fit at their own discretion? Of the second kind be these; whereupon arose this common laying: That love teacheth musick or poetry; as also the question concerning the tribe Acantes and such like. For mine own part, I would call the former Sympotica, as properly belonging to a least; the other by the generall name Sympoliaca, as beseeming rather a banquet after the feat is done: howbeit fet down they are by me pell-mell, and not diffinelly, but according as every one of them came into my mind and remembrance; neithermust the readers marvell if I collect and gather certaine speeches for to dedicate unto you, which have been haply held heretofore by others, or by our own felfe: for albeit our learning is not alwayes a calling to remembrance, yet oftentimes it falleth out, that to remember & to learne, concurre and meet together in one subject matter. Moreover, having digested in every booke ten questions, the first of this second is one, that Xenophon a disciple of Socrates, hath in some fort proposed unto us, when he writeth: That Gobryas being upon a time at supper with Cyrus, as he praised many other fashions of the Persians, so he commended them especially in this: That they demanded one of another such questions, wherewith they flood better pleased than if they had not been asked at all!: and between whiles, let flie such pleasant scoffs and jests as that the parties so scoffed at, liked thereof better, than otherwise if they had been let alone. For if it be so, that other men, even with their praises many times offend us. why should we not greatly admire the seemly grace and witty conceit of those, whose scotts and jests yeeld pleasure and contentment to those who seem to be mocked therewith? This is the reason why Soparer having one day invited us to a feast at Paire, moved this talke and said: Gladly would I know what kind of questions and interrogatories, they were? of that nature, & what the manner of them was? For no small part it is (quoth he) of our entercourse and naturall communication one with another, to have the dexterity & skill, both to know and also to observe the decency and congruity in such pleasant demands and facete jests. Nay, (quoth I again) a great matter it is; but mark, if Xenophon himselfe was well in the Symposium or banquet of Socrates, as in those of the Persians, giveth not us to understand what was the order thereof; and it you think good that we enter into this discourse, and that I should adde some-what of mine own. First and formost this is mine opinion: That men are well enough pleased to be asked those questions, to which they are able eafily to answer, and namely, of such things as they have best skill and experience of : for i one should demand of them, matters that they know not, either they be offended and grieved if they can fay nothing unto them (like as thole who are called upon to pay debts which they are not able to discharge for it they bring out cross, impertinent, and untoward reasons, they are much troubled, difmaied, and perplexed: whereas if their answers be not only ready and easie, but also witty and exquisite, to much the more pleasant and agreeable it is to the answerers : now those Icount witty and exquisite, which carry somewhat with them, that the common multirude knoweth not, or which few men have heard of; such as be the points of astrology or logicke, especially if they be well seen therein, and have as it were the habit of them: for every man is well pleased and appaied, not only in practifing and spending his time, as Euripides laith:

Whereby he may quit him fowell, That even himse fe he may excell?

but also in reasoning and discoursing of that wherein he hath best skill and knowledge. Former take great contentment when they be asked queltions of that which they have an inlight in, and knowing so much by themselves as they do, loth they be to have their cunning hidden, and to be thought of others ignorant therein: therefore those who have been great travellers, and failed in many voiages, cannot be better pleased than when others enquire of them as touching faire countries, strange seas, the manners, fashions, and customes of barbarous nations; and you bring them to bed (as they fay) when you put them to discourse of such matters; as being most willing to describe and draw upon a rable the coasts places, straights, and gulfes by which, and through which they have passed, reputing it to be no small fruit of all their travels, and an easement of the pains which they have endured: in one word, looke what loever we of our selves are wont, without the demand and intreaty of others to recount and relate willingly; the fame are we defirous that men should ask us questions of, and howfoever we seem to do pleasure to the company, yet indeed we have much adoe to hold, and with great paine forbeare to utter the same. This is a very malady incident to failers and feamen above all other. As for those that be of a more modelt and civill nature, they are defirous to be asked those things, which they are willing enough to utter, but that they be abashed, and in reverent regard of them that be present, pass over in silence those exploits which they have performed happily and with great honour : and therefore good old Neftor in Homer did very wifely, who knowing well the ambitious humour and defire of glory which was in Myffes, spake unto him :

Ulysses, flower of noble chivalry, Renownedknight, and all the Greeks glory, To tellus now, I pray (good fir) begin, How ye both twain d d those great horses win.

For unwilling men are to hear those who praise themselves or recount their own worthy acts, if therebeno one or other of the company that is urgent with them to to do, or unless they be in manner forced unto it; and therefore they are glad, when they be asked concerning the ambassages wherein they have been imployed; of their acts during the time of their government of State, especially, if they have performed some great and honourable service therein: and withall, perceive that it is not for envy nor malice, that such demands bemade: for otherwise, such as be envious or malicious, weepe at those reports, and be ready to put them by, not willing to give place unto any narrations, nor to minister occasion or matter of talke, that may turne to the honourand commendation of him that delivereth the fame. Moreover, this is another meanes to gratifie those who are to answer; namely, to move question of such things as they wot well enough, that their enemies and ill-willers are loth to hear. And verily, My fer faid to Alcinous in this wife:

A mind you have, to hear metell my wofull mifery; That I might still sigh, grone and waile for my hard destiny.

Even so Oedipus in Sophocles answered thus to the company of the Chorus: A woe it is (my friend) to raise and wake

A grief that long bath flept and rest doth

But contrariwise, Euripides wrote after this fort:

How sweet is it to one for to remember The pain now past, which sometime he did suffer!

True

True it is, but not to those who still wander, and (being to sed in troublesome seas) do yet meet with new misfortunes and calamities. But to return again to our former purpose: we ought to beware how we dem & ill newes: for men are grieved at the heart, to make report either how they have been call and condemned in any fuite, or that they have buried their children, as also, how infortunate they have been in their traffique either by fea or land: contrariwife, they are all well pleafed to rehearle and repeat often times (if they be asked the question) how they have had good audience given them from the publike place of making orations, and obteined whatfoever they there, demanded; how they have been faluted and honourably entreated by some king and potentate; and how, when other pailengers and travellers with them, have been plunged into dangers of tempelt or theeres, they onely escaped the perill: and for that in the bare relation, they seem (as it were) to enjoy the thing itselfesthey cannot be satisfied with the discourse and remembrance thereof. Also men rejoyce and take delight, when they be asked as touching their friends, who are fortunate and do prosper in the world, or of their own children that profit well in learning and good literature, or have fped well in pleading causes, or otherwise are of credit in the court and with princes: Semblably, they be very well content and pleased, to be moved for to relate, and so are more willing to make report of the losses or shamefull disgraces of their enemies and ill-willers, whomeither they have overthrown at the bar and caused to be condemned, or who otherwise are fallen into any dilaftrons calamity; for of themselves, loath they are, unless they be required thereto, to recount such things, left they might be reputed malicious, and glad to hear of other mens harmes. A hunter loveth very well, to have speech and question moved unto him as touching hounds; so doth a champion, and one that delighteth in bodily exercises, to be trained to talke of gymnasticall pastimes and feats of activity, like as an amorous lover, of such persons as be fair and beautifull, a devout and religious man discourseth ordinarily of dreams and visions that he seeth, and what good fuccess he hath had in his affaires, by observing the direction of oracles, the presages of augustic and offes, by doing factifice, and generally, by the grace and especiall favour of the gods: and firefibe well pleafed for to be asked questions as concerning these matters. As for old folke, you shall do them a high pleasure, if you put them to it, for to make any discourse whatsoever; for although the narration concern them nothing at all, nor be to any purpole, yet if one ask them questions, he tickleth them in the right veine, and scratcheth them (as they say) where it itcheth. This appeareth by these verses out of Homer.

O Neftor, fonne of Neleus, tell me in vertic,
How Agamemon, elder fonne of Atteus, did die?
Where was his younger brother then, fir Menclaus high?
Lives he or no, in Achea, at Argos city bright?

Here you see Telemachue asketh him many questions at once, giving him occasion and matter of much speech, not as some do, who restraining old solke to answer to the point onely which is necessary, and driving them within a narrow compass, becave them of that which is their greatest pleasure. In sum, they that would rather please and delight, than displease and trouble, propose such questions, the answers whereunto, draw with them, not the blame and reproofe, but the praise and commendation: not the hatred and spight, but the amityand good will of the hearers. And thus much may serve for interrogatories and demands,

As touching scots and merry jests, he that knoweth not how to use and handle them with dex-terity, good discretion and skill, according to time and place convenient, I would advise him altogether to forbear them. For like as if men be in a flippery or ticklish ground, they that touch them never so little in running by, are able to overturne and lay them along; even so at the table, when we are drinking, in danger we be upon every small occasion in the world offered (by a word not well placed, or untowardly delivered) to fall into choler; yea, and many times, more moved we are with a scoffor pleasant gibe, than with a reproachfull taunt and meer stander; for that ordinarily it is seen, that a reproachfull word proceedeth from a violent fit & sudden passion of anger, even against his will that giveth it; but we take more to the heart, a mock or scornfull flout, asconming from a prepented malice, and a voluntary mind fet upon mischief, without any necessity at all enforcing thereto; and to be brief, we are in generall more offended with those that can give a dry frump in good fadness, than fuch as cast forth words at random, And this we hold for certain, that every one of such frumps biteth fore, and teemeth to be an artificiall kind of reproach devised and thought upon a purpose before-hand: as for example, if one call another salt fish-monger, by that word he gives him openly a plain reproach; but if he fay, we remember well, that you are wont to wipe or faufte your note upon your fleeve, he mocks him covertly, and calls him as much by craft. The like frump it was, that Cicero used to one Ottavim, who supposed to be an Affrican born: for when he feemed to excuse himselfe that he heard not what Cicero spake: and that is a great wonder (quoth Cicero again) confidering that you have a hole bored through your ear, And Melanthing being flouted and made a mocking flock by a comedy-maker: You have (quoth he) given me a reward that I never deserved, and paid me that which you owed me not: such gibes therefore and mocks as these, do prick worse, and much like to arrowes with barded heads, slicke longer by them who are thus flouted; and for their wittness more delight those who are present, than for any other pleasure else, seem to win credit unto him that useth them. For to speak a truth a coff or mock is nothing else but a covert and distinuted reproach for some fault, according to Theophraftus fo as he that standeth by and heareth it, can make construction thereof, and guess how to adde more unto it, as knowing and believing all the rest behind to be true. For no doubt he that laugheth heartily as if he were tickled, when he heareth the answer of Theocritas to one, who being named for a common stripper of men out of their garments, as they went late in the streets, afked him if he went forth to supper? Yes mary do I (quoth he) but I mean to lie there all night: such an one (I ay) feemeth to confirme the opinion of the torefaid crime, for which the party was fulpected; infomuch as he that mocketh and scoffeth impertinently and without grace, possesseth the standers by and hearers with malice, as if they infulted over the party mocked, and were abbetters themselves, as being glad that he is thus derided or reproached, But inthat noble city Lacedamon, among their good disciplines in times past there taught, men learned also to jest at others without bitine, and not to count themselves nipped, when themselves were jested with: and if peradventure aman shewed himselic discontented with some broad jest, and could not bear it well, the other party presently gave over and was quiet. How then can it chuse but be anhard matter, to finde that kinde of fcoff or taunt which may content and please the party mocked? confidering that it is a point of no imall art, nor meane experience and dexterity to be ablefor to discerne and judge, what it is that in the feat of mockery which is not offenfive. Howbeit to open a little the means thereto: First and formost it seemeth, that as these jests touch and sting them most who know themselves to be guilty of those vices for which they be mocked: so the same frumps if they note men for such faults of which they be most cleer, must needs in some fort be pleasant and acceptable unto them upon whom they be discharged. Thus Xenophon jesting pleasantly with that foule and ilsavoured fellow above all others, all hairy, and as rough as a bear; faid: He was the minion and love of San banlas. You may call to mind also Quintus a good friend of ours, who when he lay fick in bed, complained that his hands were cold: But you brought them warme enough not long fince (quoth Aufidius Modeltus.) when you returned out of the province: which Quippe being banded upon him an honest and upright Prator, ministred occasion of mirth, contentment, and laughter; the same if it had light upon a proconsull that had used extortion or oppression, would have been a girding and nipping reproach. This is the reason that when Socrates, challenged Critobulus the fairest young man then living to compare their beauties, jested merrily with him, but scorned and detided him not. And Alcibiades himselle was pleasantly disposed with Socrates, when he said that jealous he was of faire Agathon. And even kings & great princes verily otherwhiles joy & take pleasure when they be spoken of, as if they were poore or private persons; like as one of these pleasants or parafiticall jetters, when king Philip teemed to gird and scoff at him, returned upon him againe this word: What he, know you not who I am, do not I keepe and mainteine you? For in reproaching perions with such vives and detects as are not in them, they do after an oblique manner give them to understand, and do make known the vertues and perfections which they have. But here we must take heed and be sure in any wise, that such good parts they be endued withall indeed, and without all doubt; otherwise that which is spoken to the contrary, buzzeth in their heads, & breedeth a doubtfull suspicion in themselves for he that saith unto a rich and great monied man, that he will be his broker, and help him to some usurers of whom he may take up mony at interest; or unto a sober person, who drinketh nothing but water, that he is a drunkard, or hath taken his own too liberally; or he that calleth a liberall man, well known to spend magnificently, and ready to pleature all men, a base mechanicall Kymbix, and a pinching peny-father; or he who threatneth a famous advocate or councellor at the barre, who hath a great name for law and eloquence in all courts of plea, and befides for policy and government is in high authority, that he will bring him to a non-luit. or overthrow him judicially, he (I fay) ministreth matter of good spirit and laughter unto the party whome he seemeth so to challenge or menace. After this manner king Cyrus became very loving and gracious, by his fingular curtefie, in that he would feem to provoke his familiars for to performe those feats, wherein he knew himlelse inferior to them :and when Ismenius the tamous musician plaied one day upon his flute, during the time of sacrifice, but fo, as for all his mufick there oppeared no good prognosticks and fignes, in the beaff facrificed, restifying that the gods were propice and well pleased; another mercenary minstrell, taking the instruments in his hand, kept a foolish and ridiculous tooting full untowardly; and when all the company there in pla e reproved him for it: To found an infrument (quoth he) to the contentment of the gods, is an hearenly gift: whereat Ifmeniat laughed a good, and made this answer: You take the matter amis (quoth he) and tlean contrary, for whiles I plaied, the gods tooke so great pleasure in my musick that they intended it onely and had no while to accept of the facrifice; but when thou began'st to meddle with the pipes, they received it immediately, and made hast to be ridde and delivered of thy abfurd piping. Moreover they who call fuch things as be simply good, by odi ous and opprobrious names and that in mirth, if they do the same with a good grace; please more than those who directly praise the same: like as they do nip and bite more shrewdly, who give reproaches under faire and lovely termes, as for example: such as called wicked persons, Aristides, or base cowards, Achilles: after the manner of Oedipus in Sophocles, when he laid:

Creon who had been alwayes kind And even first ber faithfull friend.

Another kinde there feemes to be of inoidal praife, opposite unto the former i namely, when femblant is made of bame and reproof: which manner of praife, Socrates often used; as for example, when he called the industrious means that Antisthenes practifed to reconcile men and make them friends, as a so to gaine good will and favour, broakage, bands-craft, entifement and allurement: as also for that the Pilosopher Crates, had a good grace with him wheresoever he went, and becaule he was alwayes welcome, honourably received, and kindly entertained into what house soever he came, he was commonly named Thyrepanaettes, as one would fay; The door opener, Furthermore, that mockery is pleafing, which goeth in manner of a complaint, and yet carrieth with it a kinde of gratitude and teankefullness, Thus Diogenes speaking of his master & teacher Antifhenes,

Who clad me in a cloake thred-bare, And made me ragged cloaths towear; Who forced me to beg my food, And houselesse for to walke abroad.

For nothing so good a grace it would have had, in case he had used these words: He who made me wife, contented, and happy. Also a certaine Laconian, who making a shew, that he blamed the warden of the publicke flouphes and halles of exercise, for giving him wood so dry, that it would not so much as smoak, said thus of him: Here is one, by whose meanes we can not be suffered to shed a tear. Semblably, if a man should call him who kept a bountifull table, and feated him every day, a tyrant and taker of men perforce, saying withall, that he would not suffer him to earlis meales at home, nor to fee fo much as once his own table in fo many yeers space: like as if one should complaine of the king, for making him, of a poor man, rich and wealthy, in theletearms: That he had laid wait for him to do him a shrewd turne in taking from him his repose and leasure, and bereaving him of his sleepe and natural rest: or as if some man having gathered plenty of good wine, turning againe upon the gods Caberri in Aeschilm, should cause them, for that they had caused him to have scant of vineger in his house, as they themselves in bourd and mirth had menaced to do. For these kindes of covert, secret and dissimuled praises, ntersather, carrying with them a greater grace and more effectuall by farre, in such fort, as they who in this wise perceive themselves to be commended, are nothing offended thereat, nor take it in ill part.

Over and besides, it behoveth him who would give a frump or scoff with a grace and dexterity, to know also the difference of a defect and impersection, from studies and recreations where omen are given: as namely, to diftinguish between avarice or a contentious humour, and the love of mulicke or of hunting: for as men cannot abide to be twir by those, so they are very well contented to be scoffed at for these; as Demonsthenes the Mitylengan plaied in this kinde pleasantly upona time: for when he went to vifit a familiar friend of his, who loved mulicke patting well, and was much addicted to play upon the harp; after that he had knocked at the door, and the other hearing that it was he willed him to come in: But first (quoth he) I would have you tie up your harp, But the parafiticall buffen of king Lysimachus contrariwise rejoyned in this fort as rudely and uncivilly; for when the king had thrown a counterfeit scorpion made of wood, upon his coat, whereat he first started and was afraid; but when he perceived once that the king was merrily disposed, and did but make sport, came upon him againe: And I will fright you, sirking, as well (quoth he;)come on and give me a talent from you. The like regard ought to behad, and the same difference made, as touching the defects or imperfections of the body, at least wife in many of them: for if men be jefted at, for that they be long noted and hawked, or otherwise have short shour notes, they will but laughthereat. Thus one of the minions of Cassander, was nothing offended with Theophrastus. when he said: I wonder at your eyes, that they fall not a singing, and make good musicke, considering your note is set and hidden within them: meaning, that he had a note so star and sunk into his head. And Cyrus feeing one with a long nose and hawked withall, willed him to marry a wife with a flat and short nose: For when (quoth he) you would match well, and make a good medley between you. But in case we jest and make game at those whose nostrils stink, or who have a firong and unfavory breath they take it not well at our hands but are displeased. On the other fide, if they be played upon for their bald-pates, they canabide it well enough, and putit up; but fay a man mock them for having but one eye or being blinde, they will not endure it. Indeed king Antigonus would jest pleasantly with himselfe for the loss of one eye; as namely, when there was presented unto him a supplication written in great capitall letters: Why(quoth he) a man may see this, if he were starke blinde, and had never an eye in his head : but Theoritus of Chios his prisoner, he put to death, for that, when one to comfort him, came and faid: That if the kings eyes once had a fight of him, he would be pardoned, and fave his life: Why then (quoth he) God have mercy uponme ; for impossible it is for me to escape death: which he said, because king Antigonus had but one eye. Leo the Bizantine, when Pafi des Objected unto him his bleered eyes, saying: Mine eyes be fore with looking upon yours: Goe to (quoth he) you twit and reproach me, for a bodily infirmity that I have, and never look your felfe upon a sonne of your own who carrieth the vengeance of God upon his shoulders: now this Passades had a sonne, who was crumpt-shouldred and bunchbacked. Likewise Archippus, who in his time bare a great sway in Athens. as being one of the orators who led the people, and ruled the State, was very angry with Melanthius, who alluding to this bunch-backe, and scoffing thereat, used these terms: That he did not stand manfully upright in the . Grace, defence of the city, but * Houped and bendedforward, as if he had suffered it likewise to leane, reele. me and finck downward. And yet some there he, who can carry their broad jests patiently, and with good moderation; as one of the minions of king Antigonus, who having craved at alent infree gift, and seeing that he was denied it, required at the kings hands, that he would allow him a strong guard to accompany him: for feare (quoth he) that I be forelaid by the way, and rifled by him, who enjoyned me to carry a talent of filver at my back. See, how men are diverfly affected in these external things, by reason of the inequalitie of their maimes, some after one fort, and some after another. Epaninondas sitting at a feast with his companions and colleagues in government, dranke wine as sharpe as vineger, and when they asked him why he did so, and whether it made for his health? I know not that (quoth he) but well I wot this, that good it is to put me in minde of my home diet. And therefore in cashing out jests and pleasant taunts, regard would behad of mens natures and dispositions, for that some have broader backs to beare fcoffs than others: and endeavour we must so to converse with men both in bourd and earnest, that wee offend no perion, but be acceptable unto all.

As for love, a paffion very divers it is, and paffing variable, as in all other things, so in jest and gibs especially too that some will take offence and be soone angry, others will be merry and laugh it out, if they be touched in that point; and therefore above all things the opportunity of the time would be well observed for like as when a fire is newly kindled and but weake at the first, the winde will put it quite out, but when it hath gotten strength & burneth forth, it maintaineth, seedeth, and augmenteth the slame: even so love, when it is a breeding, and whiles it lieth secret, and sheweth not it lelfe, quickly taketh dipleasure and offence against those that discover it; but when it is once broken forth, and is made apparent and known to all, then nonrished it is, and taketh delight to be blown (as it were) and enflamed and more with frofts and merry jefts: and that which pleateth lovers beft is this, when they be jefted with, in the presence of those whom they love, and namely in love matters, otherwise not; and if the case stand so, that they be wonderfully enamoured upon their own wedded wives, or young ladds by the way of honest and vertuous love, then they joy exceedingly, they glory and take a pride, in being scoffed at for the love of them. Herenpon Arcesilaus being upon a time in his school; when one of these professed lovers and amorous persons, chanced in communication, to give him these words: Methinks that you have said toucheth none of this company; replied thus and faid: No more then you are touched and moved; and withall, shewed him a faire & well favoured youth in the prime of his years sitting by him, Furthermore, good regard and confideration would be had, who they be that are prefent and in place, for otherwhiles, men are disposed to take a laughter at merry words which they hear among friends and familiars, who would not take it well, but be offended thereat, if the same were delivered before wife, father, or school-master, unless it were iome thing that agreed very well with their humour : as for example, if one should mock a companion of his before a Philosopher, for going bare-footed, or fitting up at his book all night long, fludying and writting: or in the presence of his father for being thrifty, and spending little; or in the hearing of his own wife, that he cannot skill of courting and loving other dames, but is altogether devoted and serviceable unto her alone: thus Tigranes in Xenophon, was mocked by Cyrus, in these tearms, What and if your wife, should hear say that you made a page of your selfe, and carried your bedding and other stuffe upon your own neck ? she shall not (quoth he) hear it, but be an eye wittness thereof, and see ir inher presence. Furthermore, when they who give out such merry taunts as these, be partakers therein, and in some fort do include themselves withall; lesse-blame worthy thy are, and nothing so much to be reproved; as for example: when a poor man glaunceth against poverty, or a new upstart and gentleman of the first head, against mean parentage, or an amorous persongirdeth at the wantonness of another lover; for it may feem thereby, that there was no meaning and intentto offend or offer wrong, but that all was merrily spoken, seeing they participate in the like desects, for otherwise it might nip very much, and go too neer to the quick. Thus one of the affranchised or freed men of the emperour, grown up on a sudden to be exceeding rich, bare himselfe very proud, and disdainful to divers Philosophers, who fat at the table and supped together with him, insulting very insolently over them, and in the end comming out with this foolish question: How it came to pass that the broth or pottage made of heanes, whether they were black or white, looked green alike? Aridices one of the Philosophers there in place, asked him presently again, what the reason was, that the wales or marks of stripes and lashes, were all red indifferently, whether the whippes were made of white or black leather thongs? at which reply, the other was fo dashed, and disquieted, that he arole from the table in a petting chase and would not tarry. But Amphias of Tarfis! (supposed to be no better than a gardiness some) having by way of from scoffed at one of the familiar friends of the lord deputie there, for his mean birth, taking himselse immediatly with the manner: but why say I so? for wee (quoth he) are come of no better feeds; made the party and all the company to laugh heartily. Semblably, there was a minitrell, or professed musician, who kindly and with a grace, repressed the presumptuous curiofitie and unskilfullness of king Philip, who forgat himselfe so much that he would needs read a lecture as it were unto ministrell, how he should finger and strike; finding fault with him in certaine accords of musick : Ah, God forbid, (quoth he) my good liege lord that it should go so hard with your grace, as to be more skilfull in this artthan my selfe; for thus whiles he seemed to mock himselfe, he told the king of his fault without offence: and this seemeth to be a device that comicall poets otherwhiles practile, to allay the bittergall of their quibs and taunts, namely, tof off at themselves, as Ariftophanes used to make sport with his own bald pate: and Cratinus noted himselfe, that he loved wine to well, in that comedie which he entituled Pytine, that is to iay, abottle or flaggon of wine: but above all, this regard and confideration would be had, that all such scoffs and metry jests, come from a man ex tempore, and readily, either by way of answer to a present demand, or occasioned upon some other sudden scoff, and in no wife to seem far setched, as 'a thing premeditate and fludied on before: for like as men beare and endure with more patience, the anger and debates among themselves, arising now & then at the table, whiles they be in the midle of their cups; but if another flranger should come in place, and offer abuse to any of the guests, and fo trouble the company, he should be reputed an enemie, and for very hatred they would thrust him out of doors by head and shoulders; even so, we can finde in our hearts, cally to pardon a fcoff, a frump or broad jest; if it proceed from some matter, at the present delivery, or seem to come naturally, unforced and without all art; but in case it be not occasioned presently, nor respective to the purpole, but drawn (as one would fay) violently by the haire of the head from elsewhere; then it resembleth some ambush fore-laied afar off, for to wrong and do injurie to one person or other; like to that jeft of Timagenes, which he discharged upon the husband of a woman, who was wont ordinarily to call up her gorge, in this manner:

With musick bad you do begin, Thus " vomiting to bring her in.

As also the demand proposed unto the philosopher Athenodorus, wherein the love of parents to their children, be * musicall. For furely, such unseasonable cuts and taunts as these, not accomsiddy or modate to time and place, nor fitted to the present occasion, do bewray a malicious minde, and a deliberate purpose, to offer wrong and abuse: and therefore such persons as delight in these biting with two girds, many times for a word; which is the lightest thing in the world, as Place faith, have paied a a most heavy and grievous price; whereas contrariwise, they that know to place their words in due time, in meet place, and aptly to the purpole, do verifie the testimony of the same Plato, who faith: That it is an affured figne of a mans good bringing up, and the point of liberall nurture and instruction, to know how to jest with a decent grace, and without the offence of any person.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Why men be more hungry, and eat better in Autumne, than in any other quarter of the year?

N the borough Eleufine, after the ceremonies of facred mysteries were performed, when as the folemnity (celebrated with fo frequent concourse of people.) was at the highest, we were feasted by Glausias, the orator in his house; where when others had made an end of supper, Kenocles his brother, began after his manner, to cavill and fcoff at my brother Lamprim, that is of, twitting him with his large feeding, and indeed thirting in his teeth and reproaching him with his large feeding. the voracity of the Becotians, who are taken to be good trencher men: whereupon, I in the defence of my brother, and to be revenged of Xemocles) tooke occasion out of the doctrine of Epicarus, and said unto him: What (good fir) all men do not define and determine the utmost point and perfection of pleasure, to be indolence or the privation of paine, as your good mafter Epicarus doth: and befides, my brother Lamprias, who honoureth and efteemeth more the walking galleries of the Peripareticks, and the school of the Stoicks, called Liceum, than hedoth the garden of Epicurus, must of necessir and in effect, beare witnesse to Ariforle, who affirmeth That there is no man, but he eateth more in Autumne, than in any other season of the year: and a reason he giveth thereof, although it be now out of my head. So much the better (quoth Glaucius) for we our felves will see if we can finde it out after supper is done. Now when the tables were taken away, Glaucias and Xenocles both, imputed the cause thereof to the fundry fruits of that feafon, and that after a divers fort. For one faid, that new fruits do make the belly foluble, and so by evacuation of the body, engender always fresh apperites them to meat. The other, to wit, Xenocles, affirmed, that these fruits (for the most part) carry with them a certaine piercing and mordicant quality, yet pleasant withall, whereby they provoke and quicken the stomack to appetite, more than lany viands or sauces whatsoever; insomuch as those who be fickly, and have lost their stomacks, recover the same many times, by eating some of those fruits new gathered. But Lamprias alledged, that our familiar and natural heat, by which we are nourished in Summer time, is dispersed, and becommeth more feeble and refolved: but contrariwile, upon the entrance of Autumne, it gathereth to it selfe inwardly againe, and is fortified by the means of the cold ambient aire, which knitteth, constreineth, and closerh up the pores of the body. Then I (because it should not be thought that I would be one to participate in this conference without contributing somewhat of mine own, when my course came to speak) declared, that in Summer time, by reason of the excessive hear of the weather, we are more thirty, and in regard of the same heat and drought; take in more most fure and liquid nourithment : Now therefore nature (quoth I) by reason of the change of the aire and the seaton, feeking (as her manner is) for the contrary, carleth us to be more hungry in Autumne, than at other times and for the temperature of the body, tendereth junto it as much drie food, as it had taken moilture in summer times and yet a man daffnor well say that the came of this effect dependeth nothing at all of the viands which we ear confifting much of new and fresh fruits, not only thick gruels and pottage, but also of pulle, wheat bread and flesh, reared the same year, which being more lavory than those of the years palt, do by consequence provoke those that use to seed upon them, for to can better obe or right out in ound the carries and tath let tren remain midroken or in iden e in Hermitelinkorrige

whether was before The her of the eggs ?

land creatures, as live day the becale checkers Hislong time I abiteined from earing eggs; by reason of a certeine dream which I had be ing denrous to makethaverspringe in affegge, which is made in an heart, by occasion of a vision which hath evidently appeared into me many times in my sleepe. And theremon, when I was one day and fealt which soften Sence made unto us, the company conceved an opinion or furpicion of are, that there were entred into my head, the lantihes and in pertitions of Orphelu and Prehipperusy and that I abhorred to eat an egge, like as many do for the retite heart and the braine of a living creature, for that I believed it to be the brint file and fountain of generation: infomuth as Alexander the Epiteirean, by way of a jeft, and to move laughter, alleder ed thele veries and observed month faurit q inicity Technique on to make of mileans, our night, this are not on the control in situation in the control in

As who would say, that the Epicurdans by this word and use, that is to say, beans, meant anight. tically and coverty, eggs, because that the breeding of young, or conception; in Greeke, is called more, as it there were no kilifterenes at all, 'but' they thought it'all one to eat eggs and the living cheatures which lay them. 'Now it' I had alledged my dream and them, for my defence, as the very cause of mine abstincace, ceres, have assert would have seemed more abstincace, ceres, have assert would have seemed more abstincace. the dreame in felfe, especially, no this Epicarean and therefore I food not greatly upon excuring of my leste unpother isaid Mexico day playing upon the somerrity, but suffered him to feed and main-teine, that opinion conceived of may not unrely, a pleasant man he was, honest, clviss, and well lear-ned. Howbein, he cooke occasion hereupon, to set on foot that doubtful queltion of the egge and the bird, which had bused and amuzed the heads so much of great naturallists, and fearchers into the causes of naturall works, and mamely to know, whether of the twain was before : Whereat Sylla our familiar friend faid: That with this little question of the Hen and the egge, as with a small levery, icrew, or fuchilite engine, we finaked the great frame and weighty labricked the generation of the whole world, and therfore willed him to force and proceed no farther, to feel thereof. But when Alexander laughed at it, and made no more reskoning of it, than of a ridiculous queltion of no importance not consequence at all depending thereof my some inlaw Firmus began in this wife: I must here borrow (quoth he) the indivisible elements of Epicarus, and make use those motes or atomy of his ; for if it be true which he supposeth and laieth for a ground; That small principles should afford beginning to great bodies; it soundeth by all likelshood to great reason, that the egge was before the hen: for as far forth as by our senses we are able to judge is more limple, whereas the hen is a body mixt and compounded; and to speake in generality, the principle or element is ever fielt che seed is a principle, and the egge full of seed, and less than the chick or living creature that is hatched of it! for like as the progels and proceeding unto vertue is of a middle nature, between the first disposition and the finall habit and persection thereof. even so it should seem, that the egge is a certaine progress and advancement forward of nature, tending to make a living creature of the feed disposed thereto: moreover, as in a beast or such a living creature it is commonly faid and received, that the atteries and veines be formed first slemblably, good reason there is to hold that the egge was before the bird, as the continent before the thing conreined within a for so it is with very arts, which make the first draught of their works grofly without forme and fashion; but asterwards give distinct figure and shape to every part therof, according to that which Polycleius the famous imager was wont to fay: That their workemanship in poetry was then most difficult and hard, when the clay and the finger naile met together: that is to fay, when the worke was at the point to be finished : and therefore it standeth well to good reason, that the matter yeelding and obeying but slowly unto nature at the beginning, when the moveth and frameth by little and little produceth at the first, rude lumps and masses, not as yet brought into shape and fashion, such as eggs be; but as the same grow to receive the impression of some forme there is afterwards wrought out and framed a living creature within: for like as there is ingendered first a grub, which in time growing hard by reason of driness, cleaveth and openeth in the end, and putteth forth another little winged flie, which we call Nympha, before it is a perfect bee; after the same minner, the eggehere is the first subsilent matter of generation; for necessary it is, that in every change and transmutation, that must precede and have a beginning first which is to be altered & turned into another: fee you not how cankers & caterpillers are bred in trees, and wormes in wood, either by the putrefaction, or concoction of humidity and will any man deny that the faid moisture went before; and that by order of nature; that which ingendereth is more ancient than that which is ingendered for as Plato faith. The matter in all things that breed, ferveth in flead of mother or nurle; and that is to be counted the matter, whereof the thing is compoled and confilteth which is bred. And now for that which remaineth (quoth he, and therewith he laughed J I will fing unto those that be skilfull and of understanding, one holy and facred sentence. taken out of the deepe fecrets of Orphem, which not only importeth thus much, that the egge was before the hen, but allo attributeth and adjudgeth unto it, the right of eldership and priority of all things in the world : as for the reft, let them remain unspoken of in silence (as Herodotas faith) for that they be exceeding divine and mysticall; this only I will speak by the way: That the world conteining as it doth, to many forts and fundry kinds of living creatures, there is not in manner one I dare well lay, exempt from being ingendered of an egge, for the egge bringeth forth birds and foules that flie ; fishes an infinite number that swim ; land creatures, as lizards ; such as live both on land and water, as crokodiles; those that be two footed, as the bird; such as are footless, as the ferpent; and last of all, them which have many feet, as the unwinged locust. Noowithout great reason therefore is it consecrated to the sacred ceremonies and mysteries of Bacchus, as representing that nature which produceth and comprehendeth in it lelte all things.

When Firmus had discoursed in this wife, Senecio opposed himselfe and said: That the last similitude and compartion which he brought, was that, which first and principally made against him:
For you mark not O Firmus (quoth he) how ere you were aware, you opened the world like a gate, as the proveto faith, even upon your lelie; for that the world was before all other things, as being most perfect, and reason would, that whatsoever is perfect, should precede the unperfect; the entire and found go before that which is wanting and defective; and the whole before the part, for that there can be no parcell, but the whole thereof went before; for no man night to speak thus: The feeds man, or the eggs hen; but contrariwise we say: The mans feed, and the hensegge, as if both generative feed and egge did fucceed and follow them, taking their own generation in them fifth, and afterwards paying again (as it were a debt unto nature) a fucceffive generation from them for need they have of that which is proper and familiar unto them, and thereupon are endued with a naturall defire and inclination to produce such another thingas that was from whence they came: and hereupon it is, that feed is thus defined, to be a geniture or thing bred, having need and defire of new generation. Now there is nothing that either standeth in need or hath an appetite to that which is not, or hath no being: and we may plainly see, that eggs have their totall effence and subfrance from that compact knot & composition which is gathered within the body of a living creaeture & faileth herein only, that it hath not such organs, instruments, and vessels as they have; which is the reason that you shall never finde written in any history, that an egge was engendered immediarly of the earth; for even the poets themselves do say: Than the egge out of which forange Cafter and Pollar, fell from heaven; whereas the earth even at this day producethmany complex and perfect creatures; as for example, mice in Aegrpt, and in many other places, serpents froggs, and grashoppers, by reason that the principle and pullance generative, is insused and inserted into it from without. In Sicily during the time of the Servile war, much carnage there was & a great quantity of bloud feed and spilt upon the earth, many dead bodies corrupted and putrified above the ground, lying upburied; by occasion whereof, an infinite number of locusts were engendered, which being spred over the face of the whole island, spoiled and destroyed all the corne in the countrey: all these creatures therefore are bred and sed of the earth; and of their nourishment they reeld a generall superfluity, apt to ingender the same kind, and that is called, seed; and for to be disharged thereof, by means of a certain mutuall pleasure, the male and the female match and couple together; and so some according to their nature, breed and lay eggs; others bring forth young ones alive; whereby it is evidently seen, that the primitive generation came first and immediatly from the earth, but afterwards, by a certain conjunction of with another, in a second fort, they breed their young. Infumme to fay that the egge was before the hen, is as much as if the matrice was before the woman; for looke what relation there is between the faid matrice and the egge, the femblable hath the egge unto the chicken that is ingendered and hatched within it. So that, to demand how birds were made when there were no eggs, is all one, as to aske how men and women were created, before the naturall parts and generall members of the one fex and the other were made? And verily the members for the most part, have their subsistence and being together with the whole; but the powers and faculties come after those members; the functions succeed the faculties, and confequently, the effects or complements follow upon the faid functions and operation: now the accomplished work or prefection of that generative faculty in the natural parts, is the feed or the egge: fo that we must of necessity coolels, that they be, after the generation of the whole, Confider moreover, that, as it is not possible that there should be concoction of meats or any nourishment, before the living creatur be fully made and compleat, no more can therebe any feed or egge; for that both the one and the other, is made by certain concoctions and alrerations: neither is it seen, how before the full persection of a living creature, thereshouldbe any thing that hath the nature of the superfluity or excrement of nutrition; and yet I must needs fay, that naturall feed otherwise, in some fort, may go for the principle and beginning of life; whereas the egge in no proportion answereth to such a principle, for that it hath not a subsistence first, nor any reason or nature of the whole, because it is imperiedt. And hereupon it is, that we never fay, that a living creature had any being or subsilience, without an elementary beginning: but we affirm, that there was a principle of generation, to wit, the power or faculty generative, by which the matter was traansmuted, and wherein there was imprinted a generall temperature; and that the egge afterwards, is as it were a certaine supergeneration, much like unto the bloud and milk of a living creature, after nourishment and concocion for never shall you see an egge engendred of mud; for that an eggehath a generation and concretion within the body only of a living creature; whereas there be an innumerable fort of creatures procreated and bred of mud and within mud. And to feeke no further for allegation of other examples to prove this, there be taken every day an infinite number of eeles, and yet never faw any man one eele, either milter or spawner, or that had any row init. And more than that, if one let out all the water forth out of the poole, and cleanie it from all mud and mire, yet after the water is returned thither again into the place, there will be eeles foone ingendred. And therefore we may conclude necessarily, that whattoever in generation hath need of another, can not chuse but be after it; and that which otherwise may be of it sette, and without the other, must of necessity precede and go before in generation: for this is that priority whereof I speak. To prove this, mark how birds do build and make their nests before they lay eggs; women alio provide cradles, clouts, beds, and swading-cloths for their little babes, before they cry out, or be delivered; and yet you will not fay (I trow) that either the nest was before the egge, or the swadling-cloth before the infant, For (as Plato faith) the earth doth not imitate a woman, but a woman the earth; and consequently, all other semals. And very like it is, that the first procreation out of the earth, was performed intire, and accomplished by the absolute vertue and perfection of the Creator, without need of fuch inflruments, veffels, or secondines, which nature deviseth now and frameth in parents, by reason of their imbecillity and weakness.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether Wrestling were of all the exercises and games of prize, most ancient or no? TE made a feast in the honour of Sofictes the Coronean, for joy of the victory which he ob-Valued at the Pythick games over all other Poets. And when the time drew neer at hand, wherein the Gymnick masteries and seats of vanity, were to be performed; the greatest talk was at the table, as touching the wreftlers; for that many of them reforted thither, and those the most reno ned champions of all Greece. In our company was Lyfimachus, one of the agents or procuratours of the high commissioners, called Amphietyones, who moved speech, and said, how not long before, he heard a Grammarian fay: That wreftling was the most ancient combat of all thole exercises that were named Gymnick, for that they were performed by men naked; and he added moreover, That the very name thereof in Greek, imported no less; for mann, alluderh neer unto which is as much as [of old] or [in times palt,] And it may feem (quoth he) that ordinarily, the things that be moderne and newly deviced, borrow the names imposed upon those that be of more antiquity: for so we say that and, that is to say, the fluit or hautboies, is turned, borrowing the tearm of vanish, which is a pilatery or stringed instrument: and we calleven at this day ανλήματα, i.e. the playing upon the pipe or hauthoies, by the name of κερύματα, that is to fay firlking with the fingers, which no doubt is a tearme fetched from the harp or lute. And even to, the very place whre they do exercise, who performe all sears and activity naked is named makauseg of maken, that is to lay, wrestling; which (no doubt) was a denomination given to itat the first, and time out of mind, who loever it be retained still, and extendeth to other exercifes invented fince, and taken up along after. Then began I, and faid: That, this argument and testimony, was not sufficient to conclude thereupon: For admit (quest I) that Palastra was derived of mann, which fignifieth wreftling, yet it was not because of all others it was most ancient, but for that it is the only exercise that requireth cley, called #in (9), dust also and eeroma, which is a composition of oile and wax, wherewith wrestlers be anointed. For surely, in these places, called Palastra, there is practised neither running arace, nor fill-fight or combat with buffets, but only wreitling, called mann, and Pancration, wherein they go to it with hand and foot, yea, and by the very teeth and all: for that in these two exercises, the champions lie along other-whiles, and wallow in the dust and mire, named whas. And evident it is, that Pancration is a mixt exercise of wrefiling and fift-fight, Again: What likelyhood or reason is there (quoth I) that wreftling, which of all combats is most witty and artificiall, should likewise be of greatest antiquity? for need and necessity produceth that first, which is simple, plaine, and without art; performed rather by fine force and maine violence, than by rule and method. When I had thus delivered my conceit. Soficles seconding my words: True it is (quoth he) that you say, and the better to confirme your opinion; it seemeth unto me, that make is derived of the verbe manesters, that is to say, to overthrow or lay one along by crast and deceit. Nay rather (quoth Philinus) it tooke the name of managers, that is to fay, the flat palme of the hand, because this part especially of both the hands is most employed by them that wrestle; like as those, who go to buffets, use their two fifts or hands clutched together; wherupon that maner of fight is call'd πύγμη, that (gnifieth, a fift) and the other, whan of manuels, that is to fay, the broad palme of the hand, How beit, foraimm, has the poets use this verbe manulum, for superdiary and manuface that is, to firew and sprinckle dult, which we see wrestlers for to practice more than any other champions, it may be very well, that the word manu, was derived from manulum, Consider yet moreover (quoth he)how the curriers or runners in a race, do all that lies in them, to leave their concurrents a grear way behind, we had as a before them as possibly they cambibole allo that fight at buffers, though other whiles they be very delifious to buckle and close together, yet the wardens and judges of the games will proper them once to carch hold: but we see that wrestlers only do class about, and imbrace one another with their armes; and the most part of site if thiving one against another, whether concurred by taking hold either directly or indirectly, by tripping, by coping and tugging, do all bring them together, and enterlace them: so that it is not unlike, that by reason they approach so as they do, and be neered one to another, their wrestling was first called manu, of when, which significan neer at hand.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that Homet among the combats of prizes setteth alwayes in the first place. The fight at buffets; in the second, wrestling; and less of all, running the race?

Hen these words had passed to and fro, and after that we had commended Philings. Lysimachus began again, saying: And which of all the games of prize should a man fay was first performed? The race or carriere, as at the Olympique solemnities: for here at the Pythique games, the manner is to bring incertaine champions atevery severall game or play: first boies to wrettle, and after them men-wrettlers also; then those that performe filt-fight, one after another; and likewise the champions called Paner wingte: but there. after that children have atchieved all their combats, the men grown were called in', Mary, this I would have you to confider well (quoth he) whether Homer hath not done very expresly to shew the order which was observed in his time? for alwayes in his poems the fight with fift among all the Gymnick combats, standeth first; wrestling second; and the running of a course last: Hereat Crates the Theffalian, wondring (asif he had heen amazed) O Heroules (quoth he) what a number of things are we ignorant of! but I befeech you, that it you have readily under your handany of his veries, you would not think much to call them to our remembrance, and recite them: Why (quoth Timon then) it is well known in manner to all the world, and none there is but his ears relound again with this that in the honourable funerals of Patraclus, the same order of combats was precifely observed; and the poet keeping the same order fill, and never missing it, hath brought in Achilles speaking unto good Nefter in this maner:

This gift of meer gratuitee:
For now with fift thou maif not fight:
To wrestle still thou hast na might:
Thou canst no more the javelin launce,
Nor in the race thy selfe advance,

And anon he inferreth the aged grey-beard, answering with a long traine of words, as the manner is of these old solke, after this lore:

The time was when at buffet, fight, the prize I wen in field, And with my fift made Clitomede for Ocnops fon, to yeeld: Ancaus the Pless onien in wrefiling gave me place, And Iphiclus by foot-manship, I over-rain in race.

Afterwards in another place he speaketh of Usyses, challenging the Phæcians to combat in this wise

At buffett dry with good hard clusched fist,

At wrestling, or at running, if you list.

But of Alcinous making a kinde of excuse, and in a fort condemning himselfe, in these words:

At buffets hard we sight not well,

Ne yet in wrestling do excell: But swift of foot, and light we are, And run a course with you we dare.

Thus you may fee his order, he changeth not upon any occasion or occurrence presented, neither rashly, and as it came into his head, now in one fort, and then in another; but sollowing from point to point as it were by a certeine rule and prescript, what was the use in those dayes, and what was done then; he keepeth himselfe to the same method, according as they likewise observe still in the said ancient order. After that my brother had sinished his speech, I said: That in mite advice he had spoken very well and truly to the point; but yet for all that, I could not conceive the reason of the said order; and some other were there present, who thought it unlikely, and were not perswaded that in case of combat and atchieving seats of activity for victory, either fighting with fifts, or wreftling, should go before running; and therefore they requested meto search farther into thematter, and to fetch the reason thereof from the very original: whereupon I fet in hand presently, and extempore, spake to this effect: That I thought all these combats to be the very representations and exercises of warfare; for proofe whereof, the custome was and is at this day, after that thelecombats be performed, to bring into the place a foot man in compleat harnels, and armed at all pieces, as it were to witnesse, that this is the end whereunto tend all these exercises of the body, the contentions also and emulations, for to gain the prize, and the priviledges granted to the victors when they returned with triumph to thole Cities where they were born; namely, to make some breach in the walls, and to throw down some part thereof: the mystery and meaning wher of is thus much; that the walls of a City serve in small sead, if there be no men in it who are able to fight, & know how to win the victory, In Lacedemon they that once had gained the prize at these facred and crowned games, by a special priviledge of honour, were allowed a certain place in the battel, to be ranged neer unto the Kings person, and there to fight: and of all living creatures, there is none but the horse onely that can obtain the crown in such games; for that he alone of all beasts, is by nature framed, and by discipline trained to accompany men in battels, and with them to fight: now if this betrue, and to the purpose: We observe moreover (quoth I) that the first and principal work of those who fight in the field, is to strike the enemy, and to ward his blows; the second is, when they be come to clofe and to grapple with hand-gripes, to thrust and assay how to overturne and lay one another understoot: which by report was the vantage, that our countrey-men being wellpractifed in the feat of wreftling, had over the Spartans, at the battel of Lenttres, whereby they overthrew them, and bare them to the ground this also was the cause that Aschylus the Poet in one place, speaking of a valiant warriour, nameth him: A wrestler stout, and tried in field,

To fight it out with sword and shield.

And Sophocles in one of his Tragedies speaking likewise of the Trojans, reporteth thus much of them in these teams:

They love great horses for to sit, as valiant men at arms; as when some at both ends they bend, and draw with strength of arms; They sight so close, they catch such hold, and gripe sast with bands twain, That in their wressling, all their shields resourced and ring again.

The third is this, when all is done; either to flie and run away apace, if they be vanquished, or else to follow hard in chase, if they be conquerors. By good right therefore, the fight with fifts goeth first: wrestling solloweth in the second place: and running cometh in the last: for that bufferting representes the charging of the enemy, and the avoiding of his recharge: wrestling may be compared with the violent buckling and conflict pell-mell in the medly; and by running they learn how to pursue, or to escape by good sootmanship.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Why she Pine, Sapine, or Pitch tree, and fuch other asyeeld Rosin, wiknot abide to be graffed in the scutchion, or by way of voculation.

Solarus feafting us upon a time within his Orchards, which were well watered, and environed Sall about with the river Cephifus, shewed unto us trees carrying arms and branches of sindry forts, after a very strange manner, and allby the means of a kind of grassing in the bud, called inory station: for there saw we olive boughs growing our of Lentisk or Mastick rrees; Pomgranars our of Myrtles; Oakes there were which put forth fair Pirries or Pear trees; and Plane trees that admitted and adopted Apple treess Fig trees also which were grassed with Mulberty, impa, and Cions; other mixtures there were besides of wild plants, so tamedand made gentle, that they bare fruit: whereupon some other of the guests began to jest and be merry with Sockarus saying. That he nourished certain kinds of beasts, more monstrous then the sabulous Sphinges or Chimaztaes of the Poets. But Crasson proposed this question: What the cause might be, that those trees onely which bee Oylous and full of Rosin, admit not any such mixtures and compositions? For never shall you see Pine tree that beareth the Nuts, Cyptes tree, Pitch tree, or Sapine, to maintain or feed the grass of a tree different in kind. Then Philo, there is (quoth he) one maxime or principle held among the leanned, and the same confirmed by the experience of husbandmen: That oyl is an enemy to all leanned, and the same confirmed by the experience of husbandmen: That oyl is an enemy to all leanned, and the same confirmed by the experience of husbandmen: That oyl is an enemy to all leanned, and the same confirmed by the experience of husbandmen: That oyl is an enemy to all leanned, and the same confirmed by the experience of husbandmen: That oyl is an enemy to all leanned, are dealed way to kill what tree sover a man will, then to rub or besmeare it with oyl; like as Bees also by that means are soon destroyed? So it is therefore, that all those trees which have been named, are of a farty substance, and have a soft and undisous nature, indicates which have been named, are of a fa

554 torch staves made of them, an oylous humor, which shineth again, because they are so fatty and unguinous: This is the reason why they will not joyn and be concorporate with other trees, no more then oyl it selfe be mingled with other liquors. When Philohad done with his speech, Crato added thus much moreover: That in his opinion, the nature of their rinde or bark, made somewhat for the said matter: for the same being thin and dry withal, yeeldeth neither asure seat and focket as it were to the imps or buds with their eyes to rest in, nor means to get sap and nutriment for to incorporate them-like as also those plants which have barks very tender, moith & soft, wherby the graffs may be clasped, united, and soddered with those parts that be under the saidbark. Then Sociarus himielle faid. That who foever made their reasons was in the right, and not deceived in his opinion: to thinkit necessary that the thing which is to receive another nature, should be pliable and easie to follow every way: to the end, that fuffering it felfe to be tamed and overcome, it might become of like nature, and turn the own proper nutriment, into that which is fet and graffed in it. Thus you lee, how before we fow or plant, we care and turn the earth, making it gentle, foft, and supple, that being in this manner wrought to our hand, and made tractable, it may be more willing to apply it selfe, for to embrace in her bosome whatsoever is either sowen or planted: for contrariwife, a ground which is rough, flubborn, and tough, hardly will admit alteration: thefetrees therefore confisting of a light kind of wood, because they are unapt to be changed and overcome, will admit no concorporation with others : and moreover (quoth he) evident it is, that the flock in respect of that which is set and graffed into it, ought to have the nature of a ground which is rilled; now it is well known, that the earth must be of a female constitution, apt to conceive and bears which is the caufe that we make choice of those trees for our stocks to graff upon, which are most fruitful; like as we chuse good milch women that have plenty of milk in their brests, for to be nurfes for other children besides their own, who we put unto them but we see plainly, that the Cypress tree, the Sapine, and all fuch like, be either barren altogether, or else bear very little fruit : and like eres, the sapine, and an unit who are exceeding corpulent, groffe and fat, are for the most part unable as men and women both who are exceeding corpulent, groffe and fat, are for the most part unable either to get or bear children; for spending all their nourishment as they do in feeding the body, either consert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees implying all the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, these trees imploying all the substance the substance they convert no superfluity thereof into genital seed; even so, the substance that substance the substance the substance that substance the substance that substance the substance that substance the substance the substance that substance the subst of their nurture to fatten, as it were, themselves, grow indeed to be very thick and great; but either they bear no fruit at all, or if they do, the same is very small, and long ere it come to maturity and perfection: no marvel therefore that a stranger will not breed or grow there, whereas the own natural iffue thriveth but badly.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Of the stay-ship-fish, Echeneis.

Haremonianus the Trallien, upon a time when divers and fundry final fifthes of all forts were fet before us, shewed unto us one with a longhead, and the same sharp pointed, and told us that it resembled very much the stay-ship-fish, called thereupon in Greek Echeneis, and he reported moreover, that he had seen the said fish, as he sailed upon the Sicilian sea, and marvelled not alittle at the natural force and property that it had, fo fensible in some fort to stay and hinder the course of a (hip under fail until such time as the Marriner who had the government of the Prow or Foredeck, espied it flicking close to the outside of the ship. Upon the relation of this strange occurrent, some there were in place at that time, who laughed at Cheremonianus; for that this tale and fiction, devided for the nonce to make folk merry, and which was incredible, went currant with him, and was taten in moneton make too meet years with the analysis of the contract was failing and was ten for good payment: again, others there were who spake very much in the defence of the hidden properties, and secret antipathies, or contracticies in nature. There you should have heard many other strange pathons and accidents; to wit, that an Elephant being enraged and stark mad, becompressed to the contraction of the methappealed immediately, upon the fight of a Ram; also, that if a man hold a branch or twig of a Beech tree close unto a Viper, and touch her therewith never so little, she will presently stay and ftir no farther: likewise that a wild Bull, how wood and surious soever he be, wil stand gently and be quiet, in case he be tied to a Fig tree; semblably, that Amber doth remove and draw unto it all things that be dry and light withal, save only the herb Basil, and what sever is besineared with Oyl; Item, that the Magnet or Lode-stone, will no more draw Iron, when it is rubbed over with Garlick: the proof and experience of which effects, is well known, but the causes thereof difficult, if not imposfible to be found out. But I for my part, said : That this was rather a shift and evasion, to avoid a direct answer unto the question propounded, then the allegation of a true cause pertinent thereto; for we dayly see that there be many events and accidents concurring, reputed for causes, and yer benone; as for example, if one should say or beleeve, that the blowming of the Withy called Chast-tree, causeth Grapes to ripen, because there is a common word in every mans mouth, or that by reason of the sungous matter seen to gather about the candle-snuffs or lamp-weeks, the air istroubled, and the skie overcast; or that the hooking inwardly of the nailes upon the fingers, is the cause, and not an accident, of the ulcer of the Lungs or some noble part within, which breedeth a confumption. Like as therefore, every one of these particulars alledged, is a consequent of divers accidents, proceeding all from the same causes; even to I am of this mind (quoth I) that one and the same caule, stayeth the ship, and draweth the little fish Echeneisto stick unto the side thereof: for io long as the ship is dry, or not overcharged with moissure loaking into it, it stands with great reason that the keeleglideth more smoothly away, by reason of the lightnesse thereof, and cutteth merrily thorow the waves, which yeeld and give way willingly unto it, all the while it is clean and void of filth; but after once (by being long drenched and loaked in the water, it hath gotten about the keele a deal of mosse, reits, kilpe, and tangle, wherewith it is overgrown and surred; then the wood of the said keele or bottom, becomet more dull, and not able to cut the waves so easily; and the water beating upon the mosse and filth there engendered, resteth there still, and passeth not to easily away. The marriners therefore, seeing this, use to cleanse the sides of the ship, and to scrape off this mosse, reits, and such like baggage, from the planks and ribs thereof, unto which it is like that the faid nih willingly cleaveth, as being a matter foft and tender: fo that we may very well think, that by reason of it, as the principal cause the ship is stayed, and that it is not a consequent or accessory of that which causeth the slownessethereof.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that the horses named Lycospades, be more couragious, and fuller of stomack then o-

Some are of opinion, that these horses Lycospades took their denomination of certain rough and hard bits, called in Greek, $\lambda uual$, by means whereof, being so stomachful otherwise, and hard to beruled, they were wont to be tamed and restrained: but my father, who was not a man to prompt and ready of speech as others be, and given to speak rashly, and without advisement, howbeir, one who had not the left skill in horiemanship, and loved always to keep the best horsesthat might be come by, said: That those hories (which being but colts) were set upon and assaulted by Wolves, and yet rescued, and escaped the danger of them, proved good mettle, and swift of pace; and thereupon were named Lycoipades. And for that many approved this reason of his, and gave testimony with him that he spake a truth, occasion was ministred thereby, to search into the cause thereof; and namely, how and by what reason such an accident as this might make horses more generous and better spirited; and verily, the most part of the company there present, were of opinion, that the faid occurrent bred cowardile in horses, rather then stomack and generosity; and so, by reason that they became timorous thereby, and apt to be frighted upon every occasion, therefore their motions were more quick and lively; like as other wild beafts also, when they chance to be entangled within net and toile : but I my felfe inferred, and faid : That it would be well and thorowly confidered, whether it were not clean contrary to that which appeared at the first fight, and which they opined: for colts become not more fwift and fleet of foot for avoiding the peril of being worried and devoured by wolves that set upon them, but rather, if they had not been nimble andfull of courage before naturally, they could never have gotten away cleer, as they did, from the wolfe: no more then Unffer proved a wife man, became he avoided the danger of that Giant Cyclops Polyphemus: but for that he was by nature prudent and wife, he found means to fave himselfe;

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the easife that the flesh of those shiep which have been wolfe-bitten, is tenderer, but their wooll more Subject to breed lice and vermin, then others?

V Pon the former discourse of horses, inferred there was a speech also, concerning sheep that had been bitten by the wolfe; for that it is a received opinion, that this biting of theirs maketh their flesh more delicate in the eating, but their wool apt to engenderlice. As for the reason that my fon in Law Patrocles yeelded, as touching the sweetnesse of their flesh, it seemed to be true; for thus he argued: That this beast by means of his biting, caused the flesh to eat more short and tender, for that his breath is to ardent and fiery hot, that it is able to resolve and digest within his stomach, the hardest bones that be; which is the reason (quoth he) that such field as the wolf hath bitten, is sooner mortified and doth putrisse more quickly then others: marry for the wooll we were not lo wel resolved as supposing that the same did not breed lice, but rather draw them forth; & let them out to be seen by a certain incitive or abstersive faculty that it hath : as also through theheat therof, wherby it openeth the potes of the skin, which property is infused into the wool of a sheep, by means of the tooth and breath of the wolfe, which altereth not only the flesh, but even the wery wooll and shag-hair of the beast which he hath worried and killed. And this reason is confirmed by experience and example; for it is well known unto us all, that hunters, butchers, and cooks, lometimes without blow knock down their beafts, and lay them along food dead and breathleffe in a moment: othersagain, hardly and with much ado are able to kill them, after many a stroak; and that which yet is more wonderful then to, some of them insule together with the ax of knife of iron, wherewith the beaft is flaine, fuch a quality that the same putrifieth presently, and knire on tony will not laft fivect one day to an end: others again, though they be not longer about the killing of a beaft then the other, yet the flesh of beafts so slain, doch not so soon corrupt, but continueth sound and tweet a good while after. And that true it is, that the variety and alteration occasioned by the ann unceragood with and killing of beafts, paffeth and extendeth as far as to their very skin, the haire, nailes, hoofs and clees; Hamer himfelfe doth testifie, who of their hides and skins is wont thus expresly to write: The hide it was of sturdy Ox, Sticked with knife, or brain'd by knocks.

For the skin of those beasts which die not for age, nor of long malady, but are killed violently, is more firm, fast, and tough; and true it is, that of those tame living creatures, which have been birten by wild beafts, the hoofs, clees, and nailes turn black, the hair sheddeth, and the skins become riveled, foon tear and fall apieces.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Whether our ancestors did better, who when they were at supper, fed every man by himselfe, and knew his own part, then we in thefe days who eat our vittuals all together, and feed in common?

Hat year wherein I was head Magistrate in my country, and barethat Provostship whereof the year rook name, most of the suppers were private repaths of facrifices, where every man had his part and portion fer out; where with some were wonderfully well pleased; but others blamed the manner thereof, as uncivil, unsociable, and illiberal, saying: That so soon as the garland or coronet of the bealt facrificed was taken off his head, and laid down, we ought to reduce our tablesto the ancient order and old accustomed fashion again: For it is not Inpose (quoth Agias) for to eat and drink simply, that we invite one another, but for to eat and drink together for company and good sellowship; whereas this parting and division of stella and other viands into portions, doth abolish all communication and society, making indeed many several suppers, and many mento sit ac fupper apart, but not one fupping with another, or fellow-guest in one messe; when every man takes agic were from the butchers stall his own joint of meat, or a piece of sless by just weight, or at a certain fize, and so sets his part before him. For is not all one I pray you, and what difference is there I would faine know, to allow each one of the guests at table his own cup by himselfe, and to fill every man his Congious or Gallon of Wine, yea, and to allow him his table apart from others? like as by report thelinage of Demophon Sometime served Orestes, and so to bid them drink without any regard or heed of others? what diversity (I say) is in this, and the manner of these our days; namely, to fer before everyman his loaf of bread, and piece of flesh, for to feed by himselfe, as it were at his own manger? Surely all the ods is, that we have no commandment to keep filence and say never a word when we are at our meat, as those had who entertained and seasted Orifer, and verily even this haply ought to provoke and bring us that are met, to the communion and participation of all things at a featt or banquet; namely, that we talk there one to another, that we bee cipation or au timings at a rear or panduct; maintry, that we need the company of another, that we be partiakers together of one fong of a mindred wenches mufick delighting us all, and one as well as another, with her playing upon a Pfaltery or pipe, and finging thereto. Moreover, that standing cup of amity and good-sellowship, which is set in the very midst of the company, for to drink out of it, one to another, and that without any limitation or restraint to certain Bounds, standeth as it were a fource and lively fountain of love and good will, and hath no other flint and measure, but the thirst and disposition of every one, to drink at his pleasure: not like to this most unjust distribution of bread and slesh to every one, which masketh it selfe with a salse colour of equality among those who are unequal: for even that, as even and equal as it feemeth and in manner all one, is too much for him that needs but a little, and too little for him, who hath need of much. Like as therefore (my good friend) he is a ridiculous and foolish leech, who to many and sundry patients, fick of diversand different diseales, exhibiteth and giveth medicines just of one weight, and exactly of the same meafure seven so were the master of a feast worthy to be laughed at, who having invited to his table fundry persons who are not hungry or thirsty alike, would entertain and serve them all indifferently after one order, measuring the equality of his distribution, by proportion arithmetical and not geometrical. Trueit is (Iconfels) that we go or fend all of us to the tavern for to buy our wine, by one and the same measure just, which is allowed and set down by the publick State; but to the table evewhen the prings his own ftomach, the which is filled not with an equal quantity of meat or drink, to all others, but with that which infliceth each one. As touching those banquets that Homer speaketh of wherein every man had his part cut out; to what purpose should we bring them hither from military discipline, and the custom of a camp, to the manner and fashion of these days? but more reason it is, that we resolve and propose unto our selves, for to imitate herein the humanity and courtese of those in old time, who highly honoured, not only those who lodged ordinarily, and made their abode with them under one roof, but also such as drunk of the same cup, eat of the same meat, and fed out of one dish with them, infomuch as they entertained and reverenced their society in all things. Away therefore (I pray you) with those short meales and slender pittances of Homer:

which in my conceit are iomewhat too feant and pinching, and as a man would fay, over hungry and thirtly, as having Kings and Princes for the matters and makers of them, who be more sparing of their puries, and looking more neerly to their expenses, then those good hoalts and keepers of ordinaries in Italy; as who being in arms and arranged in battel array, and ready to join in conflict with the enemy, could remember precifely, how many times each one of their gueds who dined or impred with them, took the cup and drank. Yet commend me to those banquets and seasts which Pindarus wrieth of, for furely they are much better; in which, as he faith:

Full oft a Prince, and per son honourable, Among them all, fat at Jome Stately table.

For why? such seasts had the communication of all things together: and verily this was the sellowship and knot indeed of true friends, whereas the other was a distraction and separation of perfons, who made lembiance to be the greatest friends, and yet could not agree and communicate together, so much as in the feeding of one dish of meat, Agias had good audience given him, and was well commended for the reasons which he alledged: and then we set one of the company to come upon him in this manner, saying: That Aguas thought it very strange and was offended that he should have an equal portion which others allowed him, carrying as hedid before him (uch a grand panth; and in truth, a great eater he was, and given exceeding much to belly-cheer: For a common a fifth * That is to (as Democritus was wont to say) hath no bone. And yet this is that (quoth 1) which especially and say, if a sin above all induceth us to the use of these portions, and not without good reason, considering that we be eaten in above all induceth us to the use of these portions, and not without good realong the first acknowledge fatal necessity by the name of poies, for according as the old Lady Joesse and it is not it is not That which uniteth Cities and great States, ripides:

And knits in league confederates. is nothing elsebut equality: and nothing in the world hath so much need thereof, as the society hath earen and communion at the table; which is grounded upon nature, and law of necessity, nothing so much; of it more and communion at the table; which is grounded upon nature, and law or necessity, nothing to instend then his the ulage whereof, is not newly taken up, nor drawn in, as needful, by opinion of others, but right: fellows, by necessary in it selfe. For at an ordinary or common repast, where folkieed together of one dish 5, the bones if one eat more then his fellows, certes, he that cannot plie his teeth fo fall, and commeth short of: lying upon him, doth maligne and repine at him for it; like as that Gally which maketh way, and fouddeth be- his trenfore others, but fpighted by those that come dragging behind. For mee thinks it is not an auspicate cheri-beginning of a feath, not agreeable to amity and good fellowship, to snatch or lurch one from an other, to have many hands in a dish at once, to crosse one another with the elbow, and to bee with hand or arme in his fellows way. Ariving a vie who should be more nimble with his fingers; but urely, all thete fashions are absurd, unseemly, and (as I may fay) dog-like, ending many times in inarling jarring, bitter taunts, revilings, and cholerick brawles, not only of the guells one with another, but also against those that furnished the boord, and the masters of the feast. But io long as these wise factices, using and rady to it, that is to say, portion and partition, had the ordering of suppers, dinners and great feasts, dispensing and setting out an equality forto maintain the fociety there, a man should never see any illiberal or mechanical diforder ; for in those dayes fuppers were called Adres ; guefts at the table Auffuhres : the Carvers ferving at the table, Auffert for that they divided, cut out, and gave to every one their dueportions. And verily, the Lacedz-monians had among them certaine distributers of flesh, whom they called 2500 areas, and those were no mean men of the vulgar fort, but principal persons of the State, incomuch as Lifander himselfe was by King Agesilaus ordained and created Kesudairus in Asia, that is to lay, an Officer for the distribution of shesh-meat in the camp there: But down went these distributions and divisions, when superfluities and costly cates crept into seasts, and were served up to the table: for they could not then (as I suppose) to handsomely cut into even portions, their pie-meats, passies, tarts, and marchpaines, and fush devices of pastry: they might not so well divide their flawnes, cultards egge-pies florentines, and dainty puddings, going under the name of xandonal, and xagu-xdux; ne yet their blamangers, jellies, chawdres, and a number of exquiitte fauces, and delicate junkers of allforts; fent up and brought to the board: but being overcome with the pleasure of fuch lickorous viands, they took to them, an abandoning of all equal diffribution of parts and portion. A good argument and sufficient proof hereof, a man may gather by that which we see yet at this day: namely, that the feafts at factifices, and some publick banquets, are made after the antique manner, and served up by even portions. to shew the simplicity and pu e feeding that was in old time; fo that I suppose, who soever would bring up again that distribution, should withal revive the ancient fragality. But some man, haply, will say: That where private propriety is in place, publick community is turned out of doors. True indeed, in case that propriety retain not equality; for it is not the possession of a mans own, and of a thing in proper; but the usurping of another mans right, or the coverous encroaching upon the common, that hath brought injustice, debate and trouble into the world: which enormities, the laws do represse by the bounds, limits and measure of that which a man holdeth as proper and his own, and thereupon they be called in Greek, vigas, of the power & authority which they have to part equally unto every one, that which was common among all. For otherwise if you admit this distribution, you have no more reason to allow that the master of the feast should deale among his guests, to every one his Coronet or chaplet of flowers, nor his own place to fit at the board. Nay, if any one peradventure, bring with him his shefriend and sweet heart, or a minstrel wench to play and sing, they must be common to him and his friends, that all our goods may be huddled pell-mell, and made w, that is to fay, one, according as Anaxagoras would have all. But if it be so, that the challenge in propriety of this or that, is no trouble nor hinderance of fociety and communion, confidering, that other matters of principal regard and greatest importance, are allowed for to becommon (I mean conference in talk, courtefies and kindnesses of drinking one to another, and mutual invitings) let us surcease and give over, thus to despile, discredit and condemn this laudable manner of portions, and the lottery in partage, which (as Epicerus faith) is the daughter of * Fortune, which giveth not the prerogative and preeminence, either to riches or credit and nobility : but going (as it hapneth) as well one way as another, cheereth up the heart of a poor and abject person, and depriveth no sort and condition whatsoever, that is, the foul: others of liberty: but by acquainting the great, wealthy and mighty person with an equality, so as he repine not and grudge thereat, reclaiming him unto temperance and moderation.

The Preamble, or Proëme.

Imanides the Poet, O Soffins Senecie, seeing upon a time a stranger at the Table, sitting still, and faying never a word, when others were merry, and drank liberally, faid unto him : my friend, you be a fool, you do wifely, but if you be a wife man, you do as foolishly for it is a great deale better for a man (as Heraclitus was wont to fay) to hide his own folly and ignorance, then to dis over the same; and that I wis is a very hard matter to do; when we are set upon a mexry pin, and drinking wine lustily : for as the Poet Homer faid very well :

Wine makes a man, were he both wife and grave, One while to fing, and otherwhilesto rave: To sport, to play, and laugh full wantenly, To leap, to dance, and foot it daintily Words to let fall, and secrets to reveale Which bester were to hold in and conceale.

In which verses, the Poet if I be not deceived, doth covertly and by the way imply a difference between liberal drinking of wine, or being fomewhat cup-fhotten, and drunkennesse indeed for to-fing, to laugh, and to dance, be ordinary matters, incident to those who have taken their liquot well, and be heat with wine, but to prate like a foole, and * blurt out that, which better had been kept in, be the effects and acts of such as have poured in too much, and be stark drunken; and therefore Plato laid: That the affections and conditions of the vulgar fort of men, be discovered far better in drinking then otherwise. And when Homer faith:

They had not yet by wine and words, Known one another at their bords, it is evident that he wist well enough of what power and force wine was: namely, to engender and multiply many words: for furely, we come not to the knowledge of men and their manners by tine Trans- eating and drinking, in case they eat and drink and lay nothing; but for that drink inducerh and drawlator feem- eth onfolkt o speak much; and much speech detecteth and layeth open many things, which otherwifewould have lien hidden: therefore by good confequence drinking together giveth a great light and knowledge one of another: and therefore we may by good right reprove Afope in this wile: What mean you good fir, to feek for those windows, through which one man might look into another, and fee into his neighbours heart? for wine fetteth the doors wide enough open unto us, and bewrayeth what we have within; not fuffering us to be fill and filent, but taking from us the mask and vifour of all diffirmulation, and shewing what we are in our colours, as if we stood inno fear at all of law, but were a great way out of the fight of our Tutors and School-mafters, that kept tear at an or naw, one were a great way one of the pass and for all those who learch after means to dif-us in awe. Wine then is enough for Elops, for Plate, and for all those who learch after means to dif-cover the secrets of mens hearts: but such as desire not in this wise to try and sit one another; but rather be willing to converie together with mirth and recreation the emen (Liay) are wont to propole questions, and entertain such discourses when they meet: whereby the ill parts and imperfections of the foule, if they have any, may be concealed and hidden; but the best gifts thereof, and ctions or the folie, it they have any, may be conceased and induces; one tipe being its thereof, and that which favoureth most of civility and endition, may appear and gather more ittength, as being conducted and trained by the guidance of learning and good literature, to the fair meddows and pleafair paftures wherein the taketh delight to walk and feed; in which regard, I have for your fake compil'd this third Decade of Banquet-Quettions and table discouries: whereof the first concerneth chaplets of flowers. THE FIRST QUESTION.

Whether it be commendable to wear upon the head, flower-garlands at the table?

THere was a folemn feast or banquet one day at Athens, which Eraton the professor in musick made, having factificed before unto the Muses: and to this feast he invited many: among that fair company, certain questions were moved, and much good talk passed as touching chapters of flowers : for by occasion that after supper was done, many such Coroners of all sorts went about, and were dealt round among the guelts: Ammonius began to scoffe and laugh at us: who instead of laugh clusters of scoffe and laugh at us: who instead of laugh clusters of scoffe and laugh at us: who instead of scoffe be girlifth gaudes, and more meet indeed for playful maidens and young women, then the aftern-blies of Philosophers and learned men: And I wonder much at this Erston, that reproving and derefting as he doth the flower-works, (as it were in long and musick, and blaming fair Agathoa who by report first brought up the Chromatick musick; and when he for out the Tragedy of the Mysians, inserted it within other plain musick) should himselse as you iee, heap upon us at this feast a number of wreathes, gurlands, and chapiets of flowers, filling the whole place with iweet imells and pleafant favours; and when he shutteth up the door of our ears, against the delights and pleasures of mulicks should in the mean while set open the windows of our eyes and nostriis, giving entrance thus another way unto them, for to pierce unto the foul, making a coroner and garland to ferre for pleature and looleneffe; which should be a matter of religion and devotion; and yet I must needs lay, that thele oyles and perfumes yeeld a fweeter ia our, and more exquitte pleafant odour, then these chaplets of flowers, that fade and wither in the hands of the gariand-makers : howbeir, for all that, they are allowed no place in Banquets and affembiles of Philotophers; being an idle pleafure, nor accompanied with any profit what loever, nor arising from any fource of natural necessity or appear tite; for like as those who come as shadows to a seast, being brought thither by some friends, who are themselves bidden guests, according to the ordinary cultome of courtene, find themselves no leffe welcome and well entreated then the reft, as Ariftodemus was, whom Socrates brought with him to a feast, which Agathon made; but if one go of himselfie presumptuously, not invited nor broughtthither by afriend; he is well worthy to have the door shutupon him; even so the pleafures of eating and drinking, which necessity hath invited, and do accompany the natural appetice, are admitted and have place among wife men: but as for others which come before they be bidden or fent for, and press to get in without any reason, only upon a disordinate lust, are to be kept ont and excluded.

At these words of Ammonius, certain young men who were not as yet acquainted with his fathions, being difinayed and abashed; began gently, and without more adoe to pluck off and pull infunder their Coronets, But I (who knew well enough that he moved this talk only by way of exercife, and because he would draw us on to debase thematter) add essed my speech unco Tryphon the Physician in this wife: Of all loves Trypton, be so good as lay down as well as we, this goodly chaplet which you have upon your head, so fragrant and flagrant, both of most beautiful red rose; or elle declare presently as you are wont to do many times amongus, the profit and commodity that this flower garland doth confer unto our drinking of wine fo freely. But here Eraton enterpofing himselfe: How is it ordained (quoth he) that we receive no pleasure free, but it bringeth alwayes one falary or other with it; and ever as we folace our felves and be merry, we are displeased and discontented, in case we enjoy not our delights with some hire or reward to check the same; as for fweet fmells or coftly oyles, and compound perfumes, there is some reason peradenture why wee should be somewhat ashamed of them: as allo for the rich purple colours we may be abashed, in regard of the affected curiofity and superfluous expence thereof: which we are to reject, as being odons de eirsul, and fraudulent robes and colours; as sometime said that barburous Scythian: but colours and odours fuch as be natural, are fimple, pure and finere not differing in that re ped from the fruits of trees which nature bringeth forth. Were it not then mee: folly to gather the juice and liquor of such smits, and in the mean time reject and condemn the fairer colours and sweet savours, that the featons of the year do yeeld, only for the delight ome aspect and pleasure that floweth (as it were) out of them, if they afford not otherwise some vertue and property which is good and profitable? It seemeth rather yet, that we should do the contrary; namely, if it be true as you Philosophers say, that nature doth nothing in vain, and for no purpose, that she hath created and produced their things, tor the pleasure only of man, as serving to no other purpose, but only for to cheer up our pirits and content our outward fenses. Mark this moreover and besides, how unto trees and plants that prosper and grow, nature hath given leaves, to save and defend their fruits; as also that under their covert, themselves (one while warmed and another while cooled and refreshed) might beable the better to endure the injuries of the air, and change of featons. As for flowers, they yeeld no commodity at all, by their tarrying upon the plant, unlesse it be this, that we have delight insmelling, and pleasure in beholding them tor a time, in that there exhale and breath from them, wonderful fiveet favours; and they discover unto us an infinite fort of tinctures and colours, by no art of man imitable. And therefore, when we strip trees of their leaves, they seem displeased and grieved thereat; they feel (as it were) the imart and pain of a wound; and there is left (by that means) a hurr and fore like an ulcer; and being thus despoiled of their natural beauty and heart, they are illfavoured to see to, and deformed: so that we ought not only (as Empedocles faith) but also we areto spare the leaves and boughs of all other trees, and not by their deformity to adorn our felves, robbing and speiling them perforce and against nature; whereas, if we gather and crop their flowers, we do them no hurt nor wrong at all. For this manner of dealing with them, resembleth vintage and gathering grapes from the vine; and if they be not plucked in due time, they shed of their own accord, allfaded and withered. Like as therefore, they be barbarous people, who clad themieves with the fells and skins of theep, in flead of making cloath of their wool, to apparel their bodies; even to me thinks, that they who twist and plait their chaplets, of leaves rather then flowers, do not use plants so well as they ought to do. Thus much I thought good to deliver unto you, in desence of those that make and sell flower garlands: for Grammarian I am not, nor much read in Poets, to alledge testimonie, out of their Poems : wherein it is to be found, that in old time, the victors who wan the prize of the facred games, were crowned all with chaplets of flowers: howbeit, thus much I will be bold to avouch out of them: That the rose garland was peculiarly deftined and appropriate to the Muses: for so I remember, I have read in one place of Sappho the Poetresse, where speaking of a great rich woman, yet altogether ignorant, unlettered, and a meer stranger to the Muses, she writeth thus:

All dead thou shalt intombed lie, And leave no name nor memory: For roles none thou could'ft come by, That flower on mountain Piery.

But now it is time to hear what testimony Tryphon will alledge out of his Physick. Then Tryphon taking in hand the matter in question: Our ancients (quoth he) in older rime, were not ignorant ofall these points : neither forgat they to treat thereof, as having great use of plants in the pracitie of Physick. For proof whereof, there remain at this day, most evident arguments: for the Tyrians offer unto Agenorides, and the Magnelians unto Chiron (who were the first that professed and practiled Phylick in thole parts) the primices and first gatherings of those herbs and roots wherewith they were wont to cure and heale their patients: and Prince Bacchus, not only for the invention of wine (a most puissant medicine, I may say to you, and a pleasant) was esteemed a sufficient Physician: but also for that he raught those who were surprised and ravished with Bacchanal fury, to Crown their heads with Ivy, and brought that plant into honour and reputation by that means: for that it hath a property in nature repugnant and contrary to the quality of Wine, repreffing and quenching the coldnesse which it hath, the predominant heat thereof, that men might take lesse harm thereby, and so withstand drunkennesse. And verily, the names of certain plants, do plainly shew the great industry and careful diligence of our forefathers in this behalfe. For the Wal-* Of xaea nut tree they called in Greek " Kaeila, for that it lendeth from it a certain beavy and somniferous vathe head or pour, which hurreth the head of those who lie under the shade and boughs thereof, whereby it causeth them to be drousie. The Dassodillikewise, seemeth to have taken the name * Narcissus, drowfines. because it benummeth the sinews, and ingendereth a heavy sleepinesse or stupesaction: which is the is the reason that Sophocles rearmed it the ancient Coronet of the great gods, meaning thereby the gods terrestrial. Moreover, it is said that the herb Rue had the denomination in Greek Thiyaror, of the vertue which it hath; by reason that with the drinesse wherewith it is endued, and the same occasioned by excessive heat, it is so astringent, that it * knitteth, bindeth, and hardneth the natural feed of man, and is a great enemy to conception and women with child. As for the * Amethyst, as well the herb as the stone of that name, they who think that both the one and the other is so called because they withstand 'drunkennesse, milcount themselves and are deceived: for in truth, both are named to of the colour : and as for the leafe of the herb, it hath no fresh and lively hew, but refembleth a 'winelesse weak wine, as one mey say, that either drinketh slat and hath lost the colour, or elle is much delayed with water. Many other plants may be alledged to this purpole, whole properties and natural vertues have imposed their names: but these examples may suffice to shew the studious industry and great experience of our ancestors: in regard whereof, they used to wear chaplets of leaves and flowers upon their heads, whiles they fat drinking wine: for firong wine, and pure of it felf, having begun to affaile the head, and to enervate or enfeeble the whole body, by feizing upon the original fountain of the nerves and fenles, to wit, the brain, doth mightily trouble and diquier a man: for the remedy of which inconvenience, the feent and imell, breathing from flowers, serveth marvellous well, for that the same doth defend and fortifie as with a Rampart, the Cafile and Citadel (as it were) of the head, against the assaults and impressions of drunkennesse. For these flowers if they be hot, gently unitop and open the Pores, and in 10 doing, make way and give vent for the heady wine to evaporate and breath out all fumolities; and contrariwife, if they be temperately cold, by closing gently the faid Pores, keep down and drive back the vapours steaming up into the brain. And of this vertue are the garlands of Violets and Roles, which by their smell and comfortable frent, represe and stay both ath and heavinesse of head. As for the flower of Pri- * 2/7000 vet, Saffron, and Baccaris, that is to fay, our Ladies gloves, or Nard Ruftick, bring them sweetly to or κύπθεον sleep, who have drunk freely: for these send from them a mild aire, breathing after a smooth and as the uniform manner ; the which doth foftly compose and lay even, the unequal diffemperatures, the French troublesome acrimonies and disorderly aspertites, arising in the bodies of those who have over-translationary the drunk themselves; whereupon there ensueth a calm, and thereby the strength of the heady wine is either dulled, or elfe rebated. Other forts of flowers there be, the odours whereof being spread and disperied about the brain, purge mildly the Pores and passages of the senies and their organs, subtiliat and discusse gently, without trouble and offence, with their moderate heat; the humours and all moist vapours, by way of rarefaction, and warm the brain comfortably, which by nature is of a cold temperature and for this cause especially those petty Garlands or Poesies of flowers which they hung in old time about their necks, they called 2000 put sa, as if one would say influmigations, and they annointed all their brest parts with the oyles that were expressed or extracted from them, Aleyus also testifieth as much, where he willeth to pour sweet oyl upon his head that had suffered somuch pain, and upon his brest all grey; for even so such odours are directed up as far as to the brain, being drawn by the sense of smelling. So it was not because they thought that the soul, which the Greeks call 30/10 was feated and kept residence within the heart, that they called these wreaths and garlands about their necks. (2000) util 25, as some would have it, for then more reason it had been to have tearmed them & houris as, but it was as I faid before, of the exhalation or evaporation upward from the region of the breit, against which they were worn pendant: neither are we to wonder, that the exhalations of flowers should have so great force; for we find it written in records, that the shadow of *Smilax especially when it is in the flower, killeth them that lie asleep under it; al- *The Yew fo from the Poppy there ariseth a certain spirit, when the juice is drawn out of it, which they call tree as I Opium, and if they take no better heed, who draw the same, it causeth them to swoon and fall to the take it. ground: there is an herb called Alysson, which who sever hold in their hands, or do but look upon it, shall presently be rid of the yex or painful hickot; and they say, it is very good also for Sheep and Goats, to keep them from all diteales, if the same be planted along their cotes and folds: the Rose, allo named in Greek Piston, was so called, for that it catteth from it an odoriferous smell, follows and allows the Rose, allo named in Greek Piston, was so called, for that it catteth from it an odoriferous smell, which is the reason that it quickly fadeth, and the beauty passeth soon away; cold it is in operation, Jus. although it carry the colour of fire, and not without good cause; for that the little heat that it hath, flieth up to the superficies of it, as being driven outwardly from within, by the native coldnesse, that

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether Ity of the own nature be cold or hot.

This speech of Tryphon we greatly praised: but Ammonius smiling: It were not meet (quoth he) to kick and source again, porto every how to be a suited and are the second of the second o to kick and spurn again, nor to overthrow so beautiful and gay a discourse as this was, embelished and adorned with as great variety as the garlands whereof it treated, and which he undertook to defend and maintain; but that I cannot tell how it is come topasse that the Ivy is enterlaced in the chaplet of flowers, and faid by the natural coldnesse that it is to have a vertue and property to extinguish and quench the forcible heat of new wine: for contrariwise, it seemeth tobe hot and ardent, and the fruit which it beareth being put into wine, and infused therein, given it power to inebriate and make drunk, yea, and to trouble and disquiet the body by the inflammation that it cauleth: by reason of which excessive heat, the very body thereof groweth naturally crooked, after the manner of wood that curbeth and warpeth with the fire; also the snow which oftentimes continueth and lieth many days upon other trees, flieth in great haste from the Ivy tree; or to speak more properly is presently gone than'd and melted, if it chance to settle upon it, and that by reason of the heat : and that which more is (as Theophrastus hath left in writing) Harpalus the Lieutenant General under Alexandr the Great, in the province of Babrlon, by expresse order and direction from the King his Master: ender oured and did what he might to set in the Kings Orchard there, certain trees and plants which came out of Greece, and fuch especially as yeelded a goodly shade, carried la geleaves and were by nature cold: for that the country about Babilon is exceeding hot and scorched with the burning heat of the Sun: but the ground would never entertainnor abide the Ivy onely: notwithstanding that Harpalus took great pains, and employed most careful diligence about it: for plant it as often as he would, it dried and died immediately; and why? hot at is of the own nature, and was planted in a mold far hotter then it selfe, which hindered it for taking root; for this is a general and perpetual rule: that allexcessive enormities, of any object, destroy the force and powers of the subject: in which regard, they defire rather their contraries; in such fort, as that a plant of cold temperature requireth an hot place to grow in; and that which is hot demandeth likewise a coldground; and this is the reason, that high mountain countries, windy, and covered with snow, bear ordinarily trees that yeeld torch-wood and pitch, as Pines, Cone trees, and fuch like: And were it not fo, my good friend Tryphon, yet this is certain, that trees, which by nature are chill and cold, shed their leaves every year: for that the small hear which they have, for very penury retireth inwardly, and leaveth the outward parts naked and delitute:whereas contrariwite, heat and unctious fattinefle, which appeareth in the Olive. Laurel and Cyprefle trees, keep themselves always green, and hold their leaves, like as the Ivy also doth for her part, And therefore good father Bacchus hath not brought into use and request the Ivy, as a pre ervative and present help against the encounter of drunkennesse, nor as an enemy to wine, who directly calleth Wine wift and urnameth himtelfe wellowai@ thereupon: but in mine opinion, like as they who love Wine, if they cannot meet with the liquor of the grape, nie a counterfeit wine, or barley broth, called Beer and Ale, or else a certain drink made of Apples, named Cydres, or else Date-Wines : even fo, he that gladly would in winter teafon wear a chaplet of vine-branches, feeing it altogether naked and bare of leaves, is glad of the Ivy that relembleth it: for the body or wood thereof is likewise writhed and crooked, and never groweth upright, but shutteth out here and there, to and fro at a venture: the foft fatty leaves also after the same manner grow disperied about the branches, without all order: and belides all this, the very berries of the Ivy growing thick and clustered together like unto green grapes, when they begin to turn, do represent the native form of the vine and yet a beit the same yeeldeth some help and remedy against drunkennesse: we say, it is by occasion of heat, in opening the pores and small passages in the body, for to let out the sumes of Wine, and fufferthem to evaporate and breath forth, or rather by her heat helpeth to concoct and digeft it, that for your fake (good Tryphon) Bacchus may fill continue a Phylician. At these words, Tryphon staved a while and made no answer, as thinking with himself, and studying how to reply upon him. But Eraton calling earnestly upon every one of us that were of the younger fort spurred us forward to aid and affift Tryphon our Advocate, and the Patron of our flower-chaplets, or esse to pluck them from our heads, and wear them no longer. And Ammonius affured us (for his part) that if any one of us would take upon him to answer he would not recharge again, nor come upon him with a rejoinder. Then Tryphon himielie moved us to fay somewhat to the question. Whereupon I began to speak and said: That it belonged not to me, but rather unto Triphon, for to prove that Ivy was cold, considering that he u id it much in Physick to cool and binde, as being an astringent medicine: but as touching that which ere-while was alledged: namely, that the Ivy berry doth inebriate, if it be fleeped in Wine : it is not found to be true: and the accident which it worketh in those who drink it in that manner, cannot well be called drunkennesse, but rather an alienation of the mind and trouble of the spirit: like to that effect which Henbane worketh, and many other plants, which mightily disquict the brain, and transport our senses and understanding. As for the tortuolity of the body and branches, it maketh nothing to the purpole and point in hand : for the works and effects against nature cannot proceed from faculties and powers natural; and pieces of wood do twine and bend crooked because fire (being neer unto them) draweth and drieth up forcibly, all the native and kindly humour: whereas the inward and natural heat, would rather ferment, entertaine and augment it. But confider better upon the matter and mark rather, whether this writhed-bunching form of the Ivy wood (as it groweth) and the basenesse, bearing stildownward and tending to the ground, be not an argument rather of weaknesse, and bewray the coldnesse of the body, being glad (asit were) to make many rests and stayes: like unto a Pilgrim, or wayfaring Traveller, who for weariness and faintnesse him down and reposeth himselie many times in his way, and ever and anon rifeth again, and beginneth to fet forward: in regard of which feeblenesse, the Ivy hath always need of some prop or other to stay it selfe by, to take hold of, to class about and to cling unto, being not able of her own power to rife. for want of natural heat, who lenature is to mount aloft, As touching Snow, that it thaweth and passeth away to soon, the cause is, the moisture and softnesse of the Ivy leaf; for so we see that water dispatcheth and dissolveth presently, the laxity and spongeous rarity thereof, being (as it is) nothing elie but a gathering and heaping of a number of small bubbles couched, and thrust together: and hereof it cometh, that in over-moist places, sobbed and soaked with water fnow melteth as foon as in places exposed to the fun. Now for that it hath leaves always upon it, and the same (as Empedocles saith) firm and fast, this proceedeth not of heat, no more then the fall and shedding of leaves every year, is occasioned by cold. And this appeareth by the Myrtle tree and the herb Adiantum, that is to fay, Maiden-hair, which being not hot plants, but cold, arealwaves leaved and green withall : and therefore fome are of opinion, that the holding of the leaves, is to be alcribed unto an equality of temperature : but Empedacles (over and befides) attributeth it to a certain proportion of the pores, thorow which the sap and nourishment doth passe and pierce equally into the leaves in such fort as it runneth sufficiently for to maintain them; which not is so in those trees which lose their leaves, by reason of the laxity or largenesse of the said pores and holes above, and the straitnesse of them beneath; whereby, as these do not sendany nourishment at all, so the other can hold and retain none, but that little which they received, they let go all at once: like as we may observe in certain Canals or Trenches, devised for to water Gardens and Orchards, if they be not proportionable and equal; for where they be well watered and have continual non-rithment, and the same incompetent proportion, there they trees hold their own, and remain firm, always green, and never die. But the sty tree, planted in Babylon, would never grow, and refused there to live. Certes, it was well done of her, and she shewed great generostry, that being (as the was) a devoted valialite to the god of Baatia, and living (as it were) at his table, she would not go out of her own country, to dwell among those Barbarians; she followed not the steps of King Alexander, who entred alliance, and made his abode with those strange and forraign nations, but avoided their acquaintance all that ever she could, and withstood that transingration from her native place; but the cause thereof, was not heat, but cold rather; because she could not endure the temperature of the air, so contrary to her own; for that which is semblable and samiliar, never killeth any thing, but receiveth, nourisheth and beareth it, like as dryground the herb Thymeshow hot severe the soil be. Now for the Province about Babylan, they say, the air in all that tract is so soultry hot, so studies, or so the specificant of the wealthier fort, cause certain bits or bags of leather to be filled with water, upon which, as upon seathers be considered to she place of the part of the cause of the wealthier fort, cause certain bits or bags of leather to be filled with water, upon which, as upon seathers and considered to the same of the cause of the wealthier fort, cause certain bits or bags of leather to be filled with water, upon which, as upon seathers of the cause of the cause of the cause of the cause of the wealthier fort, cause certain bits or bags of leather to be filled with water, upon which, as upon

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What the cause is that women hardly are made drunk; but old men very soon?

Florus one day seemed to marvel, that Aristole having in his Treatise of drunkennesse, set down this position: That old men are soon surprized and overseen with Wine, but contrariwise, women, hardly and very feldom ; rendered no reason thereof, considering that his manner otherwise. is not to propose any such difficulties, but he doth decide and clear the same. And when hee had made this overture, he moved the company to enquire into the cause thereof, and a supperit was, where familiar friends were met together. Then Sylla faid: That the one was declared by the other: for if we comprehend the cause aright, as touching women, it were no hard matter to find out a reason for old men: considering that their natures and constitutions be most opposite and contrary, in regard of moisture and drinesse, roughnesse and imoothnesse, softnesse and hardnesse : for first and formoft, inppose this of women undoubtedly, that their natural temperature is very moift, which causeth their field to be so tender, soft, smooth, slicke and shining: to say nothing of their natural purgations every month: when as therefore wine meeterh with lo great humidity, being overcome by the predominancy thereof, it loseth the edge and tincture (as it were) together with the force that it had, to as it becometh dull, every way discoloured and waterish. And verily to this purpose, somewhat may be gathered out of the words of Arifforle; for he laith. That those who make no long draught when they take their wine, nor drink leasurely, but pour it down at once (which manner of drinking they call ἀμυσίζων) are not so subject to drunkennesse as others; for that the wine maketh no long stay within their bodies, but being forcibly thrust forth, soon passeth through: and ordinarily we may observe, that women drink in this manner; and very probable it is, that their bodies by reason of continual attraction of humours downward, to the neither parts for their monthly terms, is full of many conduits and passages, as if they were divided into channels, pipes, and trenches, to draw forth the faid humours: into which the wine no foonerfalleth, but away it passeth apace, that it cannot settle nor rest upon the noble and principal parts, which if they be once troubled and possessed, drunkennesse doth ioon ensue. Contrariwise, that old men want natural humidity, their very name in Greek seemeth to imply sufficiently, for called they are viewles, not because they are peoples els ylu, that is to say, inclining and stooping downward to the earth, but because they are already in their habitude of body yeadous and yengel, that is to say, earthly; Moreover, their stiffenesse and unpliable disposition, the roughnesse also of their skin, argueth their dry nature and complexion: it standeth therefore to good reason, that when they liberally take their wine, their bodies which are rare and fpungious within, by occasion of that drinesse, quickly catcheth and sucketh up the same, and then by long staying there, it worketh up into the head, causeth the brain to beat, and breedeth heavinesse there; and like as land sloods gently glide over those fields which be folid and hard, washing them only aloft, and making no mire and dirt; but if the ground be light and hollow they enter and foke farther in : even so wine being soon caught, and drawneby the drinesse of old mens bodies, stayeth there the longer time: and were not this so, yet we may observe that the very nature of old men admitteth the same symptomes and accidents which drunkennesse maketh. Now these accidents occasioned by drunkennesse, are very apparent, to wit, the trembling and shaking of their limbs, faltering in their tongue, and speaking double, immoderate and lavish speech, pettishnesse and aptnesse to choler, forgetfulnesse and alienation of the mind and understanding the most part wherof being incident to old men, even when they are best inhealth & are most sober, a little thing God wot will set them clean out, and any small agitation whatsoever will do the deed fo that drunkennesse in an old man engendereth not new accidents, but setteth on foot and augmenteth those which be already common and ordinary with them. To conclude, there is not a more evident argument to prove and confirm the fame then this that nothing in the world resembleth an old man more, then a young man when he is drunk. THE

THE FOUNTH QUESTION.

Whether Women by their natura comp lexion be colder or hotter then men?

Hen Sylla had delivered his mind to that effect; Apollonidas an expert profession and wel seen in ranging a battel in array, seemed by his words to approve well of that which had been alledged as touching old men: but he thought, that in the discourse of women, the only cause was left out and overflipt, to wit, the coldnesse of their constitution, by means whereof, the hottest wine is quenched, and forgoeth that fiery flame which flieth upto the head, and troubleth the brains: and this was received as a very probable and fufficient reason, by all the company therein place. But Athryllatus the Phylician, a Thalian born, interjected some stay of farther learching into this cause : For that (quoth he) some are of opinion that women are not cold, but hotter then men: yea, and others there be (and that is a greater matter) who hold, that wine is not hot at all but cold. Florus wondering, and amazed hereat: This discourse and disputation (quoth he) as touching wine I refer to him there: and with that pointed at me: for that not many days before we had disputed together about that argument : But as for women (quoth Athryilatus) that they be rather hot then cold, they argue thus: First and formost, they are smooth, and not hairy on their face and body, which tellifieth their heat, which spendeth and consument the excrement and superfluity that engendereth hair. Secondly, they prove it by their abundance of blood, which feemeth to be the fountain of heat in the body: and of blood women have such store, that they are ready to be inflamed, yea, to frie and burn withal, if they have not many purgations, and those quickly returning in their course to discharge and deliver them thereof. Thirdly, they bring in the experience observed ar smerals, which sheweth evidently, that womens bodies be far hotter then mens: for they that nnerais, which ineverties expectally, that womens occurs be far noted then mens. For they that have the charge of burning and interring of dead corfes, do ordinarily put into the funeral fire one dead body of a woman to ten of men: For that one corps ([ay they]) helpeth to burn and confinme the test: by reason that a womans flesh containeth in it I wor not what unchtosity or oylous mater, which quickly taketh fire, and will burn as light as a tork, so that it ferreth in stead of dy slicks to kindle the fire, and set all a burning. Moreover, if this be admitted for a truth, that whatsoeter is more fruitful and appete for generation, is also more hor: certain it is, that young maidens be ripe betimes, readier for marriage, yea, and their flesh pricketh sooner to the act of generation, then boyes of their age; neither is this a small and feeble argument of their heat, but for a greater and more pregnant proofe thereof, mark how they endure very well any chilling cold, and the injury of winter feason for the most part of them lesse quake for cold then men do, and generally need not so many cloaths to wear.

Hereat Florus began to argue against him and said: In my conceit, these very arguments will ferre well to confute the faid opinion; for to begin with the last first, the reason why they withstand told better then men, is because every thing is lesse offended with the like : besides, their feed is not apt for generation, in regard of their coldnesse, but serveth instead of matter onely, and yeeldeth nourishment unto the natural seed of man, Moreover, women sooner give over to conceive and cease child-bearing, then men to beget children: and as for the burning of their dead bodies, they catch fire sooner I confesse, but that is by reason that commonly they be fatter then men; and who knoweth not, that fat and greafe is the coldest part of the body: which is the cause that young men, and those that use much bodily exercise, are least fat of all others; neither is their monthly ficknesse and violence of blood, a sign of the great quantity and abundance, but rather of the corrupt quality and badnesse thereof; for the crude and unconcocted part of their blood being superfluous, and finding no place to lettle and reft, nor to gather consistence within the body by reason of weaknesse, passeth away, as being heavy and troubled, altogether for default and imbetility of heat to overcome it: and this appeareth maniscally by this, that ordinarily when their monthly sick-nesses upon them, they are very chill, and shake for cold, for that the blood which then is shired and in motion, ready to be discharged out of the body, is so raw and cold. To come now unto the smoothnesse of their skin, and that is not hairy; who would ever say that this were an effect of heat? confidering that we see the horrest parts of mans body to be covered with hair? for surely all superfluities and excrements are sent out by heat, which also maketh way, boaring, as it were, holes through the skin, and opening the passages in the superficies thereof. But contrariwise wee may reason, that the sliecknesse of womens skin is occasioned by coldnesse, which doth constipate and close the pores thereof. Now that womens skin is more fast and close then mens; you may learn and understand by them (friend Athryilatus) who use to lie in bed with women, that annount elieir bodies with sweet oyls, or odoriserous compositions; for even with sleeping in the same bed with them, although they came not so neer as to touch the women, they find themselves all persumed, by reason that their own bodies which be hot, rare, and open, do draw the said oyntments or oyls in them; Well, by this means (quoth he) this question as touching women hath been debated pro & contra, by opposite arguments right manfully.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

Whether wine be naturally cold of operation?

But I would now gladly know, (quoth Florus fill) whereupon your conjecture and suspicion should arise, that wine is cold of nature? why? And do you thinke (quoth I) that this is an opinion of mine? Whole then (quoth the other?) I trememier (quoth I) that not of late, but long ago, I light upon a discourse of Aristote as couching this Probleme: and Epicarus himselfe in his Sympolium or banquet hath discussed the questionat large; the sum of which disputation (as I take it) is thus much: For he faith that wine is not simply of it lesse hot, but that it containeth in it certains atomes or indivisible motes causing heat, and others likewife that engender cold; of which fome it casteth off and loseth when it is entred into the body, others it taketh unto it, from the very body it selfe wherein it is; according as the same petry bodies be of nature and temperature, fitted and agreeable unto us; in such fort, as some when they be drunke with wine are well heat; others againe contrariwise be as cold. These reasons (replied Florm) directly bring us by Protagoras into the campe of Pyrrho, where we shall meet with nothing but incertifude, and bestill to seeke, and as wife as we were before: for plaine it is, that in speaking of oyle, milke, honey, and likewise of all other things, we shall never grow to any particular resolution of them, what nature they be of, but fill have some evasion or other, saying, That they become such and such, according as each of them is mixed and tempered one with another: But what be the arguments that your selfcalledge, to prove that wine is cold? Thus I see well (quoth I) that there be two of you at once, who presse and urge me to deliver my mind extempore, and of a sudden: the first reason then that commethinand tige me to denote my initial externiors, and of a modern title line cannot the line continuous to my head is this, which I fee ordinarily practiced by Physicians upon those who have weake stomacks; for when they are to corroborate and fortifie that part, they prescribe not any thing that is hot; but if they give them wine they have present ease and help thereby; semblably, they repressed fluxes of the belly, yea, and when the body runneth all to diaphoreticall sweats, which they effect by the meanes of wine, no lesse, nay, much more than by applying snow, confirming and strengthning thereby the habit of the body, which otherwise was ready to melt away and resolve: now if ithad a nature and faculty to hear, it were all one to apply meete wine unto the region of the heart, as fire unto fnow: furthermore, most Physicians do hold, that sleep is procured by cooling; and the most part of toporiferous medicines which provoke sleep be cold; as for example, Mandragoras and poppy Juyce: but these I must needs confesse, with great force and violence do compresse, and (as it were) congeale the braine to worke that effect; whereas wine cooling the same gently, with ease and pleasure represent and staieth the motion thereof; so that the difference only between it and the other, is but in degree, according to more and lesse. Over and besides, whatsoever is hot is also generative and apt to ingender seed; for howsoever humidity giveth it an aptitude to run and flow, it is spirit, by the means of hear, that endueth it with vigour and strength, yea, and an appetite to generation: now they that drinke much wine, especially, if it be pure of it selse, and not delaied, are more dull and flow to the act of generation, and the feed which they fow, is not effectuall, nor of any force and vigour to ingender; their medling also and conjunction with women is vaine, and doth no good at all, by reason that their seed is cold and seeble; furthermore, all the accidents and passions which cold worketh do befall unto those that be drunke; for they tremble and shake, they are heavy and dull of motion, and look pale; the spirit in their joynts and members is unquiet, and moveth ditorderly; their tongues falter, stut, and be double; last of all, their snews in the extremities of the body, are drawn up in manner of a crampe, and benummed; yea, and in many, drun-kenesse endeth in a dead passe or generall resolution of all parts; namely, after that the wine hath utterly extinguished and mortified their naturall heat. Physicians also are wont to cure these symptomes and inconveniences procured by excessive drinke and surfet, by laying the patients prefently in bed, and covering them well with cloaths, for to bring them to an heat; the next morrow they put them into the baine or hot-house, and rub them well with oyle; they nourish them with meats which do not trouble the masse of the body; and thus by this cherishing, they gently setch againe and recover the heat which wine had dissipated and driven out of the body. And forasmuch as (quoth I) in things apparent and evident to the eye, we fearth for the like faculties which lie hidden and secret, how can we doubt what drunkennesse is, and with what it may be compared? for according as I have before faid, drunken folke refemble (for all the world) old men: and thereforeit is, that great drunkards soone waxe old, many of them become bald before their time, and grow to be grey and hoary ere they be aged; all which accidents seeme to surprize a man for defect

Moreover, vineger (in some fort) resemblesh the nature and property of wine: now of all things that are powerfull to quench, there is none so repugnant and contrary to fire as vineger is; and nothing so much as it, by the excessive coldness that it hath, overcomment and represent a stame, Againe, we see how Physicians use those fruits to coole withall, which of all others be most vinous, or represent the liquor of wine; as for example, pomgranates and other orchard apples. As for honey, do they not mix the substance thereof with taine-water and snow, for to make thereof a kind of wine, by reason that the cold doth convert the sweetnesse for the affinity that is between them, into aufterity, when it is predominant and more puillant? what should I say more? have not our ancients in old time, among ferpents, dedicated the dragon? and of all plants, confectated by to Bacchus, for this caule, that they be both of a certaine cold and congealing nature? Now if any do object for proofe that wine is hot; how for them that have drunke the juyce of hemlocks the loveraigne remedy and counterpoilon of all other is to take a great draught of strong wine upon it; I will reply to the contrary, and turn the same argument upon them; namely, that wine and the juvce of hemlock mingled together is a poison incurable, and presently killeth those who drinke it, remedileffe. So that there is no more reason to prove it hot, for resisting hemlock, than cold, for helping the operation of it; or else we must say, that it is not coldnesse whereby hemlock killeth those that drinke it so presently, but rather some other hidden quality and property that it hath

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Of the convenient time for a man to know his wife carnally.

Ertaine young men, who were new fludents, and had lately tafted of the learning contained in ancient books, were ready to teare Epicurus in pieces, and inveighed mightily against himas an impudent person, for proposing and moving speech which was neither seemly nor necessary, in his symposium or banquet, as touching the time of medling with a woman; for that an ancient man, well stept in yeares as he was, should make mention and begin talke of venereous matters, and namely, at a banquet, where many young men were in place to particularize and make questionin this fort: Whether it were better for a man to have the use of his wife, before supper or after; seemed to proceed from a laicivious mind, and incontinent in the highest degree. Against which some med to proceed from a indivious initiation in the initiation of the state there were, who alledged the example of * Xenophon, who after his fupper or banquet brought his phain the guest's (not on foot, but on horfe-back, riding a gallop away home) to lie with their wives. But end of his Zoprast the physician, who was very well feen and convertant in the books of Epicarus, laid, That was the convertant of the convertant of the physician is the physician. Symptime they had not read diligently and with advisement, his book called Symptime, they had not read diligently and with advisement, his book called Symptime, to fay, The orbangue. For the rook northis nurftion Coinoth he) to treat of at the hesinning, as a rheame or banquet: For he took not this question (quoth he) to treat of at the beginning, as a theame or banquet: For he took not this quention (quotinie) to treat or at the beginning, as a theame or subject matter expressly chosen and of purpose, whereto all their talke should be directed, and in nothing else to be determined and ended: but having saused those young ment or ise from the table for to walk after supper, he entred into a discourse, for to induce them to continence and temperance, and to withdraw them from dissolute slut of the field, as being at all times, a thing danterness and to withdraw them from dissolute slut of the field, as being at all times, a thing danterness and to withdraw them from dissolute slut of the field, as being at all times, a thing danterness and to withdraw them from dissolute slut of the field. temperance, and to without maintain unifolders, but yet more hurfull unto thole who die irupgerous, and ready to plunge a maninto milchiele, but yet more hurfull unto thole who die irupon a full Homacke, after they have eat and drunke well, and made good cheereat fome great feat, on a full Homacke, after they have eat and drunke well, and made good cheereat fome great feat,
And if (quoth Zopprus) he had taken for the principall full before, the discourse of this point, is it pertinent and beseeming a Philosopher, not to treat and consider at all of the time and houseproperand meet for men to embrace their espoused wives? or much better so to do in due season and with discretion? and isit(I pray you) not discommendable to dispute thereof elsewhere and at other times? and altogether dishonest to handle that question at the table, or at a feast? for mine own part, I think cleane contrary; namely, that we may with good reason reprove and blame a Philosopher, who openly in the day time should dispute in publike schooles, of this matter, before all commers, and in the hearing of all forts of people; but at the table where there is a standing sup set before sa miliars and friends, and where other whiles it is expedient to vary and change our talk, which otherwife would be but lukewarme or starkecold for all the wine, how can it be unseemly or dishonest, either to speake or heare ought that is wholsome and good for men, as touching the lawfull company with their wives in the ferret of marriage? for mine own part, I protest unto you, I could with with all my heart, that those Partitions of Zeno, had been couched in some book entituled, A banquet or ple: sant Treatise, rather than bestowed (as they are) in a composition so grave and serious, as are the books of policy and government of State. The young men at their words were cut over the thumbs; and being abashed, held their tongues, and ate them down quietly. Now when others of the company requelted Zopirus to rehearle the words and reasons of Epicurus, as touching this point. I am not able (quoth he) in particular, to decipher, and precifely to fet them down as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them; but I suppose the Philosopher seared those violent concussions and modern as he delivered them. tions, which are felt in the time of that conjunction; for that our bodies by that meanes be wonderfully flirred and disquieted, in regard especially of the wine, which being of it selfestirring and causing much turbu ent agitation, it fetteth the body ordinarily out of quiet repose: if then the full masse thereof being in such an agitation, meet not with a setted calme and rest by sleep, but runneth on fill headlong to other toublesome motions, caused by the sports of Venus, so that the cords and ligaments, which are wont to hold our bodies entire, and maintain them firme and ftrong, be flacked and loosed, great danger there is, that the foundation being thus shaken the whole edifice will fall to the ground: for furely at fuch a time, the very genitall feed is not fo apt and ready to passe away with ease, being so pent and constipate (as it is) by reason of repletion; so that it must be serched away perforce, all troubled and confused. In which regard (quoth Epicurus) a manisto go about this businesse, when the body is at quiet and well setled; namely, after that the concoction and digestion both of our food is persectly sinished, which all that time runneth to and fro, and willingly avoideth all such disquietnesse; untill (I say) the body have need of new nourishment, And for to confirme this opinion of Epicurus, a man may adjoyne a reason out of Physick, namely, That the opportunity of the morrow-morning, when the concection is thorowly performed is most fale and fure; whereas to struggle and meddle with a woman immediately after supper is never without danger: for who can tell(before the meat be well concocted) whether after the panting agitation by the act of Venus, there will not enfue another crudity and indigestion, so as a double inconvenience and surfet upon surfet may follow thereupon? Then Olympicus taking his turne to speake and opine: As for me, I am (quoth he) infinitely well pleased with that sentence of Climas the Pythagorean; who being demanded the question, when the time was best to embrace a woman? Mary (quoth he) when thou art minded to do thy telfe most harme: For, that is ancient, which Zopyrus faid even now of the fit time, and carrieth some reason with it : and as for the other, it hath (1 fee well) many and fundry difficulties and inconveniences, and is altogether unleafonable for this purpole. Like as therefore, Thales the wife, being importuned by his mother (who pressed hard uponhim) to marry; prettily put her off, hifting and avoiding her cunningly with words: for at the first time, when she was in hand with him, he laid unto her: Mother, it is too soon, and it is not yet time: afterwards, when he had paffed the flower of his age, and that the fet upon him the fecond time, and was very inflant: Alas mother, it is now too late, and the time is path; even so, it were good for every man to carry and governe himselse in these amatorious games of Venus that when he goes to bed at night, he lay to himfelfe it is not yet time : and when he rileth in the morning, Now there is no time left. Hereupon Sociarus: These be indeed (quoth he)Olympicus, the parts of champions, and require such as would enter combate for to win a prize at the facred games : these matters (I tay) altrogether, are for those to performe who can drinke wine freely, and make a game of it, yea, and eate flesh as lustily: but surely, this speech of yours little besitteth this time and place for here are a fort of fresh and lusty young men newly married,

By whom, wot well the work; in some degree,

Of love and Venus, must performed be. Neither is dame Venus as yet retired and fled altogether from us, for we fill in chanting hymnes unto the gods, pray devoutly other whiles unto her, in this wife:

O Venus, lady deere and goddeffe faires

Hold back old age, keep from us hoary haire.

But let us consider now (if youthinke it good) whether Epicarus hath done well and decently, as he ought to do, in taking away Venus from the night season; or whether he hath not rather offended against all right and reason in so doing; considering the mander, a man well seen in love-matters, faith, That she is acquainted with her above all other gods and goddesses: for in mine opinion, well ordained was this vaile and shade of darkenesse to cover those that are minded to performe these acts, and in some ort to hide the pleasure from them, and nor to come unto this game by daylight, thereby to chair from out of their cye-fight all shame, and to give meanes unto lastivious wantonnesse, for to be bold and confident; and finally, to imprint the memory of the act fo lively, that it may remaine long after in the mind for to kindle and revive fill new lutts and flefhly defires: For the eye-fight (as Plato faith) passeth most swiftly thorow the fleshly affections of the body into us, that is to lay, into our foule, and evermore awakeneth and raileth tresh and new concupicence, representing with great force and vehemency, the images of pleasure, and putting us in mind to pur-sue the same; whereas contrariwse, the night taking away the greatest part of such acts as be most furious, hilleth nature afleep, and bringeth her (as it were) to be, in fuch fort, as it doth not exorbi-tate or breake forth by meanes of the fight into lafcivious loofeneffe. But over and befides all this, what reason or sense is there in this, that a married man, returning all jolly, fresh and merry, from a festivall supper, and peradventure with a gay chapler of flowers upon his head, yea, and periumed with fiveet and odoriferous oyles, should come home, go to bed; turne his back into his wite; pull the cloaths about him round, and so lie to sleep all night; and the morrow after, in broad day light, and in the midft of houshold occasions and other affaires, send for his wife out of the nursery or: womens roome, for to come unto him about such a matter; or in the morning turne unto her and imbrace her in his armes at fuch a time as the cock treads his hens? for the even-tide (my good friend Olympicus) is the end and repose of all our day-labours past, and the morning is the beginning of new travels. Of the evening god Bacchus is the superintendent and president, who is surnamed Lyfins of Liber, for that he treeth us from all paines taking; and accompanied he is in this prefidency of his with the Mules, to wit, faire Terpfichore, who loveth dances, and pleasant Thaties, who delighter hin feasts and banquets; whereas the morning rifeth betimes by the breake of day to do service unto Minerva, surnamed Ergane, the work-mistris or patronelle of artizans; to Mercury. likewife, the master of Merchants and occupiers: and therefore upon the evening attend longs, mulick, minstrelsie, plaies, dances, weddings, Mafques, mummeries, feafts, and banquets, Noise of hant boies, flutes, and cornet's.

In the morning a man shall heare nothing but the thumping sounds of the smiths hammer and fledges, beating and knocking upon the anvill the grashing noise of saws, the morrow-watch of Publicans, Customers, and Toll-gatherers, crying after those that come in or go forth; the ajournments of lerjeants and criers, calling for apparance in the court before the judges; publications of edicts and proclamations; fummons to attend and be ready to make court, and to dodity unto some Prince, Выь 2

Of Venusthen there is notalke, The Raves of Bacchus do not walke With Ivy dight : the game some sport Of gallant youths is all-a mort: For why? as day grows on apace, Cares and troubles come in place.

Moreover, you shall never read, that the Poet Homer reporteth of any worthy Prince and demigod, that in the day-time he lay either with wife or concubine; only he faith, that Paris, when he fled out of the battell, went and couched himselfe in the bosome and lap of his Helena; giving us shereby to understand, that it is not the part of an honest minded husband, but the act of a furious and wanton-given adulterer, to follow such pleasures in the day-time. Neither dothit follow (as Epicurus faith) that the body takes more harme by performing this duty of marriage after supper than in the morning, unleffe a man be so drunke or over-charged with meats, that his beliy is ready to crack; for certainly, in such a case it were very hurtfull and dangerous indeed: but if one have taken his meate and drinke sufficiently, be well in health, and in some measure cheerefull; if his body be apt and able, his mind well disposed thereto; if he interpose some reasonable time between, and then fall to clip and embrace his wife; he shall not thereby incur any great agitation that night, nor feare the heavy load and repletion of meat; neither will this action worke any damage or coole him too much, ne yet disquiet and remove out of their place the atomies (as Epicurus saith,) but if he compose himselfe afterwards to sleep and repose, he shall soone supply againe that which was voided, and replenish the vessels with a new afflux of spirits, which were emptied by the laid evacuation. But of all things, especiall heed would be taken not to play at this game of Venus in the day time; for feare left the body and mind both, being troubled already with the cares and travels of fundry affaires, be by this meanes more exaiperate and inflamed, confidering that nature hath not a fufficient and competent time between to repoie and refresh her selfe: for all men (my good friend) have not that great leasure which Epicarus had, neither are they provided for their whole life-time, of that reft and tranquillity, which he faid, that he got by good letters and the fludy of Philosophy: nay, there is not one in manner, but every day he finds himselfe amused and employed about many affaires and businesses of this life which hold him occupied; to which it were neither good nor expedient for a man to expose his body so resolved, enseebled, and weakened with the surious exploit of concupicence. Leaving him therefore to his foolish opinion of the gods, that being immortall and happy they have no care of our affaires, nor buse themselves therewith, let us obey the laws manners, and customes of our own countrey, as every honest man ought to do; namely, to be furein the morning to go into the temple and to lay our hands upon the facrifice if haply a little before we have done such a deed. For in truth, well it were, that interpoling the night and our fleep bet ween, after a sufficient time and competent space, we should come to present our selves pure and cleane, as if we were risen new men with the new day, and purposing to lead a new life, as Democritus was wont to fay.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that Must or new wine doth not inebriate or make folke drunke?

"He manner was in Athens to give the affay, and to take new wines the eleventh day of the month [February] which day they named Pithagia: and verily in old time they observed this ceremony, to powre out the first drawing thereof unto the gods before they dranke of it, making their prayers devoutly, that the use of this medicinable drinke might be wholsome and healthfull, not noisome nor hurifull unto them. But in our Country this month is called Hessurheus, the fixth day of which month the manner was to pierce their vessell first, and taste new wines after they had sacrificed to good Farsune, and good Demon, and that the westerne wind Zephyrus had done blowing; for of all winds this is wither most troubleth, disquieteth, and turneth wine; and looke what wine may escape this season, great hope there is that it will hold and continue good all the yeare after : according to which cultome my father upon a time facrificed as his manner was ; and after supper finding that his wine was good and commendable, he proposed this question unto certaine. young men that were fludents with me in Philosophy: How it come to passe that new wine would not make a man drunke: the thing feemed at the first unto many a very strange and incredible paradox: But Agins faid, That this new iweet wine was every way offensive unto the flomacke, and quickly glutted it; by reason whereof a man could hardly drinke so much of Must as were sufficient to overturne his braines : for that the appetite is quickly dulled and wearied for the small pleasure that it taketh, so soon as it feeleth no more thirft. Now that there is a difference between iweet and pleasant, the Poet Homer knew, well enough, and gave us so much to understand, when he faid:

With cheefe and honey that is sweet: With pleafint wine, a drinke most meet.

For in truth wine at the first is to be counted sweet, but in the end it becommeth pleasant, namely, after it hath age, and by the meanes of working, ebullition and concoction, passed to a certaine harshuesse and austerity. But Aristenatus of Nicasaid, That he well-remembred how he had read in a certaine place in some books: That Must mingled with wine stateth and represent drunkennesse; he added moreover, and faid, That there were Physicians who ordained for them that had overdrunke themselves, to take when they went to bed a piece of bread dipped in honey, and to eate it; If then it be so, that sweet things do mitigate and dull the force of wine : good reason it is, that new wineshould not inebriate, untill the sweetnesse thereof be turned into pleasantnesse. We approved greatly the discourse of these two young men, for that they fell not upon triviall and common reason, but had devised new: for these be they that are alledged by every man, and ready at hand, to wit, the heavinesse of Must or new wine as Aristotle faith, which maketh the belly soluble, and so it breaketh thorow the quantity of flatulent and muddy pirits that abide therein. together with the watery lubflance, of which the ventofities directly get forth, as expelled by force; but the aquosity by the own nature enseebleth the strength of the wine: like as contrariwise age augmenteth the power thereof, for that the watry substance is now gone; by reason whereof, as the quantity of wine is diminished, so the quality and vertue is encreased.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What the reason is, that they who be throughly drunke are lesse brain-sick than those who are but in the way of drunkenneffe.

Eeing then (quoth my father) that we have begun already to disquiet the ghost of Aristotle, it Thall not be amiffe to try what we can fay of our felves, as touching those whom we can directed egass, that is to fay, who are well heat with wine, but not yet flarke drunke; for howfoever Ariffoele was ordin rily very qui k and subtile in resolving such questions, yet in mine opinion he hath not sufficiently and exactly delivered the reason thereof; for as far as I can gather out of his words (he faith) That the discourse of reason in a man which is tober, judgeth aright and according to the truth of things as they be: contrariwife, his fenie and understanding who is cleane gone, and as they fay dead drunke, is done and oppressed altogether: as for the apprehension and imagination of him who hath taken his wine well, and is but halfe drunk, is yet found, mary his reason and judgement is troubled already and crackt: and therefore such judge indeed but they judge amisse, for that they follow their phantafies only: but what thinke you of this? For mine own part (quoth I) when I consider with my selse his reason, it seemeth sufficiently to have rendred a cause of this effect; but if you would have us to fearch farther into the thing, and devile some special new matter: Marke first, whether this difference which he maketh between them, ought not to be referred to the body: for in these that have well drunke there is nothing but the discourse of reason only troubled; because the body being not yet thorowly drenched and drowned in wine is able to do service unto the will and appetite; but if it be once off the hooks, (as they fay) or utterly oppressed, it for faketh and betraieth the appetites, and breaketh day with the affections, being so far shaken and out of joynt, that it can lerve no more, nor execute the will: whereas the other having the body fill at command and ready to exorbitate together with the will, and to fin with it for company are more feen and discovered, not for that they be more foolish, and have lesse use of reason, but because they have greater meanes to shew their folly. But if we should reason from another principle, and go another way to worke (quoth I) he that will confider well the force of wine shallfind no let, but that in regard of the quantity, it altereth and becommeth divers, much like unto the fire, which if it be moderate, hardeneth and baketh the tile or por of clay; but in case it be very strong, and the heat excessive; it melteth and dissolveth the same: and on the other side, the spring or summer featon at the beginning breadeth feavers, and fetteth them on fire, which in the progresse and midst thereof being grown to their heights decline and cease altogether. What should hinder then, but the mind and underitadding which naturally is disquieted and troubled with wine, after it is once off the wheeles, and cleane overturned by the excellive quantity thereof should come into the order *againe, and be ferled as it was before? Much like therefore as El'ebore beginneth his operation to purge, by over-turning the flormack, and disquicting the whole masse of the body; and it is to given in a teste dosse or quantity than it should be; well it may trouble, but purge it will not: allo as we see that the we see some who take medicines for to provoke sleep, under the just and full quantity which is manay in the state of the purchase prescribed, instead of sleep and repose find themselves more vexed and tormented than before; selfesbee. and others againe, if they take more, fleep foundly: even to it standers to good reason, that the brain-ficknesse of him who is halfe drunke, after it is grown once to the highest strength and vigour, dorh diminish and decay; to which purpose, new wine serveth very well, and helpeth much: for being powred into the body with great abundance, it burneth and consumeth that spice of madnesse which troubleth the mind and use of reason; much after the manner of that dolefull fong, together with the heavy found of hauthoies in the funerals of dead folke, which at the first moveth compassion, and settern the eyes a weeping, but after it hath drawn the soule so to pitty and compassion, it proceedeth farther, and by little and little it spendeth and riddeth away all fenie of dolon and forrow; femblably a man shall observe, that after the wine bath mightily troubled, disquieted the vigorous and couragious part of the soule, men quickly come to themselves, and their minds besetled in such sort as they become quiet, and take their repose when wine and drunkennesse hath passed as far as it can.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the meaning of the common proverbe: Drinke either five or three, but not foure?

When I had thus faid, Arifton crying out aloud, as his manner was: I fee well now (quoth he) that there is opened a re-entrance, and returne againe of measures into feaths and banquets, by vertue of the most just and popular decree: which measures by means of (I wot not what) Jober lealon, as by a tyrant have been this long time banished from thence: for like as they who proteffe a canonicall harmony in founding of the harpe do hold and fay, That the proportion Hemiolios or Seiquiakerall, produceth the lymphony or musicall accord Diapenta, of the duple proportion arifeth that Diapaion: but as for the mulick or accord called Diatesfaron, which of all others is most obscure and dull, it consistent in the proportion Epitritos; even so, they that make profession is kill in the harmonies of Baschus have observed, that three symphonies or accords there are between wineard water, namely, Diapenta, Diatrion, and Diatesfaron, singing and saying after this manner: Drinke five, or three, but not foure; for the fifth standeth upon the proportion Hemiolios, or Sesquialterall, towit, when three parts or measures of water be mingled with two of wine; and the third contains the duple proportion; namely, when two parts of water be put to one of wine; but the fourth answered to the proportion of three parts of water powred into one of wine; and verily this measure or proportion Epitritos may fit some grave and wise Seintours sitting in Patliament; of the Archontes in the Councill Chamber Prytaneum for to dispatch weighty affaires of great consequence: and it may beseeme well enough some Logicians that pull up their brows when they are busie in reducing, unfolding, and altering their Syllogismes; for surely it is a mixture or temperature fober and weak enough: as for the other twain, that medly which carrieth the proportion of two for one bringeth in that turbulent tone of the Acrothoraces before-laid; to wit, of fuch as are somewhat cup-shotten and halfe drunke:

Which stirs the strings and cords of secret heart,

That moved should not be, but rest apart. For it neither suffereth a man to be fully sober, nor yet to drench himselfe so deep in wine, that he be altogether witheffe and past his sence: but the other standing upon the proportion of two to three, is of all other the most mulical accord, causing a man to sleep peaceably, and to forget all cares resembling that good and sertile corne-field which Hesiedus speaketh of,

That doth from man all cares and curses drive,

And children caufe to reft to feed, and thrive,
It appealeth and filleth all proud, violent, and disordered passions arising within our heart, inducing in theftead of them a peaceable calme and tranquillity. These speeches of Ariston no manthere would crosse or contradict; for that it was well known he spake merrily; but I willed him to take the cup in hand, and as if he held the harpe or lute, to tune and fet the same to that accord and confonance which he to highly praifed, and thought to good. Then came a boy clote unto him, and powred out firong wine; which he refused, saying, (and that with a laughter) That his musick confifted in reason and speculation, and not in the practice of the instrument. But my father added thus much moreover to that which had been faid: That as he thought the ancient Poets also had to great reason seigned; that whereas Jupiter had two nurses nurses, to wit, Ida and Adrastia; Juno ones namely, Eubeca: Apollo likewile twaine, that is to fay, Alethia and Corythalia; Baschus hadmany more; for he was fuckled and nurfed by many nymphs, because this god for footh had need of more measures of water, signified by the nymphs to make himmore tame, gentle, wirty, and wise,

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the reasont hat any killed stell will be naught and corrupt sooner under the raies of the moones than in the fun?

E Nibyd:mus of Sunium, feaftest us upon a time at his house, and set before us a wild bore, of such bignesse that all we at the table wondred thereat; but he told us that there was another brought vnto him far greater; mary naught it was, and corrupted in the carriage by the beams of the moonshine: whereof he made great doubt and question how it should come to passe; for that he could not conceive nor fee any reason, but that the sun should rather corrupt flesh, being as it were, far hotter than the moone. Then Satyrus: This is not the thing (quoth he) whereat a manshould marvell much in this cale; but rather at that which hunters practice; for when they have strucken down either a wild bore, or a stag, and are to send it far into the City, they use to drive a spike or great naile of brasse into the body, as a preservative against putters attended in. Now when supper was done. Embydemm, calling to mind his former question, was in hand with all againe, and set it now on foot : And then Maschion the physician shewed unto them, that the purritaction of flesh was a kind of eliquation and running all to moisture; for that corruption bringeth it unto a certainchumidity, so as whatsoever is sappy or corrupted, becommeth more most than it was before: Now it is well known (quoth he) that all heat which is mild and gentle, doth stir, dilate, and spread the humours in the siesh but contrariwise, if the same be ardent, siery, and burning, it doth attenuate and reftraine them: by which appeareth evidently the cause of that which is in question; for the moone gently warming bodies, doth by consequence moisten the same; whereas the sun by his extreame heat catcheth up and confumeth rather that humidity which was in them a unto which Archilochus the Poet alludeth like a naturall Philosopher when he said:

I hope, the dog star Sitius, In siery heat so furious With raies most ardent will them smite, And numbers of them dry up quite.

And Homer more plainly spake of Hettor, over whose body lying along dead: Apollo (quoth he) displaced and spred a darke and shadowy cloud: For feare lest that the scorching beames,

Of Sun aloft in skie, Should on his corps have power the flesh

And nerves to parch and dry. Contrariwile, that the moon casteth weaker and more seebler raies; the Poet Ion sheweth, saying

The grapes do find no help by thee, Toripen on the vine,

And never change their col:ur black,

That they might make good mine.
These words thus passed: And then all the rest (quoth I) is very well faid, and I approve thereof; but that all the matter should lie in the quantity of hear, more or lesse considering the season, I see not how it should fland; for this we find that the fun doth heat leffe in winter, and corrupteth more in fummer: whereas we should secontrary effects, if putrefactions were occasioned by the imbelility of heat; but now it is far otherwise, for the more that the suns heat is augmented, the sooner doth it putrifie and corrupt any flesh killed; and therefore we may well inler, that it is not for default of hear, nor by any imbecillity thereof; that the moon causeth dead bodies to putrifie, but we are to refer that effect to some ferret property of the influence proceeding from her: for that all kinds of heat have but one quality, and the fame differing only in degree, according to more or leffe: that the very fire also hath many divers faculties, and those not resembling one another, appeareth by daily and ordinary experiences: for gold-fmiths melt and worke their gold with the flame of light straw and chaffe: Phylicians do gently warme (as it were) in Calneo those drugs, and medicines which they are to boile together most all with a fire made of vine cottings; for the melting, working, blowing, and forming of glasse, it seemeth that a fire made of Tamorix is more meet than of any other matter what soever, the heat caused by olive-tree wood serveth well in dry stomps or hot-ho 1fes, and disposeth mens bodies to sweat; but the same is most hursfull to baines and baths; for if it be burned under a furnace, it hurteth the boord-floores and feelings; it marreth also the very foundations and ground-works: whereupon it commeth, that Ædiles for the State, such as have any skill and understanding, when they let to ferme the publike paines unto Publicans and Farmegs, except ordinarily olive-tree wood, forbidding expressly, those that rent them at their hands, not to use the fame; as also not to cast into the furnace or fire with which they give an heat unto them the feed of tame: as allo not to clatinot the timateon in which will which matters, ingender head-ach and heaviness or that the, smooth sand sinces which articles from such matters, ingender head-ach and heaviness of the braine, together with a dizzinesse and swimming in the head, in as many as wash or bath in them. And therefore, no marvell it is, that there should be such a difference between theat of the sun and of the moone; coinsidering that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other hands of the moone; coinsidering that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other hands of the moone; coinsidering that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other hands of the moone; coinsidering that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other hands of the moone; coinsidering that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other hands of the moone; coinsidering that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other hands of the moone; coinsidering that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other hands of the moone; coinsidering that the other hands of the moone is the moone of the moone of the moone is the moone of the moone is the moone of the moone ther by her power dissolveth humours, and in tome bodies (by that meanes) cauteth theumes : and therefore discreet and carefull nurses take great heed how they expose their sucking babes against the raies of the moone, for that fuch infants (being full of moisture, like to tappy green wood) will (as it were) warpe, twine, and cast at one side by that meanes. And an ordinary thing it is to be seen; that wholoever fleep in the moon-finite, be hardly awakened, as if their fenies were flupefied, be-nummed and aftonied: for furely, the humours (being diffolved and dllated by the influence of the moone) do make bodies heavy. Moreover, it is faid, that the * full-moone (by telaxing and refolving humours in this wife)helpeth women in travell of child-bearing, to gafie deliverance. Where- ulmos, upon, in my judgement, Dians, which is nothing elfe but the verymoone, is called fachis or III-thris, as having a speciall hand in the birth of children; which Timorbeia directly testification these moon, as veries:

Thorow azere skie, with stars befet, By moon that giveth speed Of child birth, and doth ease the paine Of women, in their need,

Moreover, the moone shewerth her power most evidently even in those bodies, which have neither fense nor lively breath; for carpenters reject the timber of trees fallen in the full moone, as being iofe and tender, subject also to the worme and putrifaction, and that quickly, by reason of excessive moisture; husbandmen likewise, make haste to gather up their wheat and other graine from the threshing sloore, in the ware of the moone, and toward the end of the month, that being hardned thus with drineste, the heap in the garner may keep the better from being susty, and continue the longer; whereas corn which is inned and laid up at the full of the moone, by reason of the softnesse and over-much moisture, or all other, doth most crack and burst, It is commonly faid also, that if a leaven be laid in the full-moone, the patte will rife and take leaven better; for although it have but a little leaven, and leffe in quantity than ordinary, yet it faileth not by the that prefet thereof (by means of rarefaction) to make the whole masse and lumpe of dow to swell and be leavened.

To returne now unto flesh that is caught, and beginneth to putrifie, it is occasioned by nothing elie but this, that the ipirit which maintaineth and knitteth the same fast, turneth into moilture, and fo by that meanes it becommeth over-tender, loose, and apt to run to water: an accident, which we may observe in the very aire, which resolveth more in the full of the moone, than at any other time, yea, and yeeldeth greater store of dews: which the Poet Aleman signifiesth anigmatically and covertly unto us, when he faith in one place, that dew is the daughter of the aire and the moone; for thele be his words:

What things on earth, the dew as nurse doth feed, Whom Jupiter and moone betwixt them breed.

Thusevident testimonies we have from all parts, that the light of the moone is waterish, and hath a certaine property to liquifie, and by consequence, to corrupt and putrifie.

As for the brazen spike or naile above mentioned, if it be true (as some hold & say) that being driven into the body, it preserveth the fiesh for a time from rottenhead and putrifaction: it seemeth to work this effect by a certaine at trictive quality and vertue that it hath; for the flower of braffe called Verde-gris, Phylicians do use in their astringent medicines and by report, those that frequent mines. out of which braffe-ore is digged find much help thereby for bleared and rheumatick eyes; yea, and some thereby have recovered the haire of their eye-lids, after they were shed and fallen off: for the fmall scales or fine powder in manner of flowre, which commeth and falleth from the brasse-stone Chalcit is, getting closely into the eye-lids, stayeth the rheume, and represent the flux of weeping and watery eyes: and thereupon it is said that the Poet Honer hath given these attributes and entributes unto brasse, calling it wirese and outgoing the Ariffeste saith, that the wounds inside the Honeruted unites unto braine, canning it surgess and response. Scriberts in interest with brazen heads, by fwords also made of braile, a reledeepanfull, and be fooner as from the healed, than thole which are given by the family weapons of iron and steele; for that brasse has a factor with braile has a weapons of beautiful to the braile has a factor with the family weapons of leave behind them immediately in the chiefs have we up and wounds. Moreover, that aftringent things becontrary unto those that purifie; and that prefetyable; tives or healing matters, have an oppoint faculty to inch as cause corruption, it is very plaine and tenahana Grammin, evident; so that the reasonis manifel of the faid operation: unless they some one will alledge, set sends; that the brazen spike or naile in piercing thorow the stefly, draweth unto it the humours thereofcosses that the things of the stefly of the st be it force, wounds. Moreover, that aftringent things becontrary unto those that putrifie; and that preservafidering that there is evermore a flux in that part which is hurt and wronged. Over and besides, it is faid, that there appeareth a wates some marke or ipot, black, and blew, about that very place of the fielh, bewraying (as it were) some mortification; a probable argument, that all the rest remaineth found and entire, when the corruption runneth and floweth thither as it doth.

The Fourth Book

Of Sympofiaques or Banquet-questions.

Olybius in times past (O Soffius Senecio) gave unto Scipio Africanus this good advertisement : Never to depart out of the market or common place, where Citizens daily affembled about their affaires, untill he had gotten one new friend or other, more than he had before. Where you must understand this name of friend, nor precisely as the Stoicks do, nor after the subtile acceptation of the word, according to curious Sophisters; namely, for him that continueth firme, fast for ever, and immurable; but after a civil and vulgar manner for a well willer, as Dicaarchus meant, when he faid, That we ought to make all men our well-willers, but honeit men only our friends: for furely, this true friendship and amity cannot be gotten and purchased, but in long time, and by vertue; whereas that good-will of civil persons may begained by affaires and dealings one with another, by conference and converting, and other whiles, by playing and gaming together; namely, when opportunity of time and placemeeteth therewith, which helpeth not a little to the winning of humane affection and favour among men. But confider now, whether that lesson and precept of Polybins may be fitted, not only to the market and common place atorelaid. but also to a feaft or banquet; namely. That a man ought never to tile from the table, nor to depart from the company met at a feast before he know that he hath acquired the loce and good affection of some one of those there assembled; and so much the rather, because men repaire ordinary to the publike place of the City about other negotiations and bufineffe; but to a feast wife and discreet persons come as much to get new friends, as to do pleasure unto those whom they have already: and therefore, as it were, a baie, abinrd, and illiberall part to feeme to carry away from a feast or banquet any thing whatsoe er; so to go from thence with more friends than he brought thither at his entran e, is a delectable, honest and horiourable thing: like as on the contrary ide, he that is negligent and carelelle in this behalfe, 'maketh that meeting and fellowship unpleasant and unprofitable unto himselfe, and so he goes his way as one that had supped with his belly, and not with his mind and spirit; for he that comment as a guest to supper among others, commeth not only to take hispart with them, of bread, wine; meats, and junkers, but to com-municate allo in their discourses in their learning, yea, and their pleasant currefie, tending all in the end to good will and amity. For wreltlers to catch and take falt hold one of another, had need of dust strewed upon their hands; but wine at the table, especially when it is accompanied with good talke, is that which giveth meanes to lay hold upon friends, and to knit them together. For speech doth transfule and derive by discourse and communication, as it were, by conduits and * hopes, pipes, currefie and humanity, from the body to the mind; for otherwife dispersed it is, and wan rather dreth allower the body, and doth no other good at all, but only fill and saisse the same. And like diresposing. as marble taketh from iron red-hot the fluxible moilture by cooling it, and maketh that formeffe to become hard and fliffe, whereby it is more apt to retaine the impression of any forme received? even so honest discourse and talke at the table, fifthereth not the guests that are eating and drinking together, to run endlong still, and be carried away with the strength of wine; but stayeth them, and canfeth effect mirth and joility (proceeding from their liberall drinking) to be well reinpered, levely, well befeeming, yea, and apt to be realed (as it were) with the figure of amity and friendthip, if a man know with dexterity, how to handle and mannage men, when they are thus made lost and tender, yea, and capable of any impression; through kind heat, by the meanes of wine and good!

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Whether the food confifting of fundry forts of Wands be easier of digestion than the simple?

THe first question then of this fourth Decade of Table-discourses, shall be concerning diversi-Try of meats: for by occasion of the solemine feast * Etaphebalia, for the celebration whereof, * That is to we went to the City Hyampolie. Philos the Physician invited us, who (as it should seem) had made 1213. The great preparation of good cheere to entertaine us magnificently; and feeing with Philinus a young Stag killad his son feeding heartily upon dry bread without calling for any other meat to it, tooke occasion ling. to breake out into this admiration: O Hercules, now furely here is the common Proverbe verified

They fought in place all f !l of stone, But from the earth could lift up none.

And therewith he leapt forth and ran into the kirchin to fetch fome good victuals for them: and after he had flaied a pretty while away, he came againe and brought nothing with him but a few dry figs and fome cheele; which when I faw, This is (quoth I) the ordinary fashion of those, who having made provision of rare and exquisite things, which also be costly and sumptuous, do neglect those which be good and necessary, whereof afterwards, they find a mille and want. I never remembred

Or Zma. (quoth Philon) that our Philinus here seemeth to seed after the manner of * Softratus, who never (by report) did eate or drinke any thing, all his lifetime, but only milke: but as for him, very like it is. that upon some change of mind be began this manner of diet, and that he had not alwaies lived so, but this Philinus here, like another Chirm, feedeth his soul like as Achilles was brought up from his very infancy) with fuch meats as have no bloud in them, that is to fay, of the fruits of the earth. And think you not, that by this certainedemonstration, he verifieth that which is written of the grashoppers; namely, that they live of the aire and dew ? I never thought upon a supper (quoth Philinus) or a feath of an hundred beafts killed for factifice, as they were when Aristomenes feathed his friends; for otherwise, I would have come from home well provided before hand of simple viands, which be wholfome and healthfull, as prefervatives hanging about our necks, againft thefe immpruous, furfe-tous and feaverous feafls for that I have heard many times Physiciaus fay, That simple viands are easier of digettion than variety of meats, like as they be also readier at hand, and sooner provided, Then Marcion directing his speech unto Philo: This Philinus here (quoth he) mars all your provifion of good cheere, trighting as he doth your guests, and (what lies in him) withdrawing them from eating thereof: but if you will request me, Lihall aniwer in your behalfe, I will pawn my selicatio and be their warrant, yea, and prove unto them afterwards, that the diversity of meats is more easie to be concocted and digefted than their simplicity and uniformity, to the end that they may in the meane time be the bolder and better affured to fall unto their victuals, and make merry with that plentifull farethat you have ordained for us: Then Philoentreated Marcion to do.

Now after that we had supped, we called upon Philings to set in hand with the accusation of this multiplicity of fundry and divers viands: Why (quoth he againe) I am not the author of this postion; neither is it I that have faid to; but this good hoft of ours Philohere, who evermore telleth us: First and formost, that those beasts which feed upon a simple kind of meat, and the same alwaies one, live more healthy than men; whereas they that bekept up and crammed in coupes, cages, mews, and battons, or otherwife trapk-fed and fatted, are in greater danger to fall into difeafes, and more subject to crudities, for that their meat is set before them mingled, compounded, and in some fort delicately condited. Secondly, there was never yet any Physician so bold and venturous in making new experiments, who durft offer unto his patient fick of an ague any meat or nourishment for compounded of divers forts; but ordained there is for them alwaies the simplest that can be had, and least smelling of the kitchin and cooks crasta, as that which is most easie to be concoched in the flomack: for intruth our meats shoul dinffer alteration, and be wrought by the natural faculties within us : and like as the colours which are most simple do strike the deepest die, and give the best tincture; and among oyles that which hath, no fent at all taketh best the aromatical drugs and odors of the periumes, and fooner turneth or changeth than any other; even to the simplest nourishment is that which most easily is altered and concocted by the vertue digestive: whereas if there be many and fundry qualities, and those of a contrary operation, they corrupt sooness, for that they fight and run one against the other, and so hinder concoction; much like as in a City, the consused multitude of many nations hudled together from all parts hardly will ever grow to any agreement, and consistence well united and accordant; for that each party leaneth to their own rites, firseth to draw all to their own commodity, and followeth their private affections against others, hardly on never agreeing and traming well with frangers. Moreover, we may have a most evident and infallible argument of this by the familiar example of wine, for nothing there is that so doth inebriate, as variety and change of wines; and it feemeth that drunkennesse is nothing else but the indigestion of wine : and therefore our great projested drinkers avoid all that ever they can, mixt and brewed wines; yet, and they that are the brewers and minglers thereof, do it as fecretly as it is possible; like to those that lie in ambush : for surely every change brings with it inequality, and a kind of extaller putting all out of frame; which is the cause likewise that Musicians are very war, ry how they flir or firike many firings together, and yet there is no other harme at all to be supected but the mixture and variety. This I dare be hold to affirme, that a man will iooner beleeve and consent to a thing where contrary reasons be alledged; than make good concection, and digeflion of divers and fundry faculties; but because I would not be thought to speake in jest, leaving these proofes, I will come to the reasons of Philo: for we have heard him oftentimes lay, That it is the quality of the meat that causeth difficulty of digestion; and that the mixture of many things is permitious, and engendreth strange accidents: and therefore we ought to take knowledge by experience, what is friendly and agreeable to nature, that we mayuse the same, and rest contented therein; and if peradventure there be nothing of the own nature hard to be concocted, but that it is the quantity alone that troubleth and hurteth our stomack, and there corrupteth, so much the rather, in mine advice, we ought to forbeare divers forts of viands, wherewith, Philoes cooke exercifing his art cleane contrary to his mafters, hath even now empoyioned and bewitched us, by divertifying our appetite, and by novelties and change, not suffering it to be weary, and to refule any thing, feeding it ftill with one thing after another, and causing it by this variety to passe the bonds of contentment in reason; much like unto the softer-sather of Lady Hypsipyle:

Who being fet in meddow gay, Flower after flower did crop away: And yet his mind so childish was, And in defire fo far did pass, That booty none would him content. Untill the flowers most part off went.

In this case therefore it were good withall to remember the wise instruction of Socrates, who giveth us counsell to take heed and beware of those viands which draw men on to eate, when they are not hungry, wherein his meaning was this and none other; that we should avoid and seare the diversity and plurality of meats: for this is it that causeth us to exceed the bounds of suffilance, farther than needfull is, and retaineth our pleasure in things that content the eye and the eare, in venereous matters, in plaies, games, and all kinds of fport, being continually refreshed and renewed still with a singularity and superfluity that hath many heads: whereas in simple and uniforme pleafures the attractive delight never exceedeth the necessity of nature. To be short, of this mind I am: That a man would better endure a Musician, who commended a confusion of many strings discordant; or a master of wrestlers who praised the annointing of bodies for exercise with sweet oyles and perfumed oyntments; than a Physician who recommended this multiplicity and variety of viands; for furely fuch alterations and changes from one dish to another, must needs force and drive us out of the right way to health.

After that Philinus had thus said: I am of this mind (quoth Marcion) that not only they who disjoyne and sever profit from honesty, incur the malediction of Socrates, but also those who difftinguish pleasure and health asunder, as if pleasure (forfooth) were repugnant, or an enemy unto it, and not tather a friend and companion thereof: for seldome and even against our wils (quoth he) do we make any use of paine, as being an instrument too boisterous and violent, whereas no man, would he never so faine, can chase pleasures away, and banish them, but they will present themfelves alwaies in our feeding, in fleeping, in washing, bathing, sweating, and annointing our bodiess they entertaine, foster, and cherish him that is over-travelled and weary, putting away quite by a certainefamiliar property, agreeable unto nature, what soever is strange and offensive: for what manner of paine, what want, what poison is there, how strong soever it be, that riddeth or dispatcheth a malady fo foon or fo presently as the bath in due time; or wine given to those that have need, and when their heart doth faint? Our meat going down into the stomack merrily, and with pleasure diffolveth incontinently all wambles, reducing and reftoring nature again into her ownestate; as if faire weather and a calme season were come againe; whereas on the contrary side, the succours and remedies which are procured by dolorous and painfull meanes, by little and little, hardly and with much ado are brought about and effected, even with wrong and injury offered unto nature: let not Philims therefore let himselse in opposition against us, in case we do not hoise up and spread all our failes; to flie away from pleasures: but endeavour and study we rather to draw delight and health tögether, for to make a marriage between them, for which we have more reason than some Philosophers, to march pleasure with honesty. For first and formost (Philinus) me thinks in the very entrance of your discourse, that you are greatly deceived; setting down this supposall for a ground: That brute beafts feed more simply than men, and in that regard live more healthfully; for neither the one flor the other is true: and as for the sometine, disproved plainly it is by the testimony of the goats, of whom the Poet Eupolic writeth, who highly commend and praise their pasture, as being mingled, and confilling of the variety of all plants and herbs: who fing and fay in this man-

We feed in plenty every where Upon the plants which earth doth beare; The stately Firre we barke and brouse The Holme likewife with mighty boughs; The tender crops of Arbute tree Which beares a fruit like Strawbery , Do yeeld us food, and many moe Which both on hills and dales do grow; As namely freet tree Trifoly On which we love to eate daily; The Juniper with fragrant Smell, The Yough ay green and leav'd as well; Wild Olives and fruitfull Lentisk, Which yeelds the wholfome gum Maftick, Ash, Fig-tree, Oakes that high dogrow, Ivy, Lings which creep as low ; Whins, Tamarix, Gorfe and Broome, Chafte-tree, Brambles, all and some, Mollein, Longwort, Afphodell, Ladan forub that fweet doth fmell: Beech-trees, with triangled Mast, Thyme and Sav'ry, be our repast.

tafle, juyce, lavour, fent, and vertue; and yet there be a number more besides these less to ununamed. And as for the second point, Homer resusted it by an evident experience, shewing that murrens and petitient contagions seized fift upon brute bealts: besides, their short like witnesses in side sized fift upon brute bealts: besides, their short like witnesses in sort one of them to speake of, that siveth long, unselfs haply some man will give instance of the raven and the crow, which we know and see to eate much, and to feed of all forts of vissuals. Moreover, me thinks that reasoning from the diet of sick-persons, you have not gone by a right rule to discerne the meats which be of easier or heavy digestions; for labour and exercise, yea, and to cut and chew the meat well serve much for concoction; but for all that they agree not to those who are in a feaver: surthermore, I suppose, that you sear without just octains the repugnance and contrainty of divers and stake that which is agreeable unto it; the divers nourishment transmitting many and sundry qualities into the masse and bulke of the body, distributeth unto every part that which is meet and htsor it: so as that commeth to passe which Empedaels delivered in these veries:

Sweet will to sweet, and there with loves to joyne; The bitter runs to that which bitter is; Losk what is sharp with sharp doth well combine, With falish parts full forteth not amis.

This goeth one way, and that another, each one to that which is sutable thereto, after that the mixture by the heat which is feated in the spirits is dilated and spread abroad, the like alwaies follow their own kind: for a body mingled and compounded of so many things affembled together as ours is, by all reason doth contract, entertain, and accomplish the temperature thereof by variety of matter, rather than by a simple uniformity thereof; or if it were not to, but that the concoction so called, be it which hath force to alter and change our viands; yet the same will both sooner and also better be performed in fundry and divers meats, than in that which is one and simple : for never will the like receive any paffion or alteration by the like; but contrariety and repugnancy is that which sooner turneth and changeth the qualities being enseebled by the mixture of their contrary and if you resolve once (O Philinus) to condemne all that which is mixed and compounded; do not reprove and revile this Phila here, for entertaining only his friends at the table with fo coffly fare and variety of dainty diffies? but allo, yea, and so much the rather, whensoever he compoundeth and mixeth those royall confections, and those cordiall electuaries that be counter-possons, which Erafistratus was wont to call: The very hands of the gods; condemne them (I fay) of vanity, curiofity, and abfurdity, who confound and mixe together minerals, herbs, theriacall trochifts, made of the parts of venemous serpents, for the composition of their treacles; yea, and in one word, what loever land or sea affordeth: for by your advice good it were for to abandon all these mixtures, and reduce all physick to plaine prisans, thin barley water, cucumber seeds, all simple, or at the most to oyle and water mingled together: yea, but this plurality and diversity of viands, doth by your faying ravish, transport and enchant our appetite, as it were, besides it selfe, insomuch as it hath no more mastery of it selfe: I answermy good friend: That the same draweth after it purity and neatnesse; it maketh a good stomack; it causeth a sweet breath; and in one word, procureth cheerefulnesse in us, and a disposition both to eate more, and to drinke better: for otherwife why take we not course bran instead of the fine flower of meale to thicken our pots? or why dresse we not and prepare * cives and golden thistles, as well as we do the tender crops and heads of garden (perage? why reject we not this odoriferous, fragrant, and delicate wine of ours, to drinke some savage and hedge drinke; as cyder made of apples, even out of the tub which resounds with the consort and musick of gnats and slies round about? for you will say (I am sure) that an healthfull diet is not the flying and avoiding of pleasure altogether; but rather a moderation and temperature of pleasures, making use of that appetite which is obedient to profit: for like as Pilots and Masters of ships have many devices and meanes to escape a blusterous and violent wind when it is aloft, but when the same is allaied and down, there is no man able to raise and set it up againe; even so to withstand the appetite, and to represse the same when it doth exceed, is not so hard and difficult a matter; but to ftir up, to provoke, and corroborate the same when it is lost, and decayed before due time; or to give an edge unto it, being dull, and faint, is a maftery indeed, and a piece of work/my friend, I may fay unto you not fo eafily done: whereby it appeares, that the nurture of divers viands is better than the simple food, and that which by reason is alwaies of one sort, doth foone satisfie and give one enough, by how much more easie it is to stay nature, when she is too fpeedy and halty, than to fet her forward, being weary and drawing behind: and whereas some haply there be, who say, that repletion and sulnesse is more to be seared and avoided than inanition and emptinesse, that is not true; but rather the contrary: indeed, if repletion and surfet grow to corruption, or to some malady, it is hurtfull; but emptinesse (if it bring and breed none other harme else) is of it selse adverse and contrary to nature. Let these reasons therefore be opposed, as it were, dissonant and sounding of a contrary string, against those which you (Philinus) have philosophically discoursed: as for others of you here, that for saving money, and to spare cost, *xvurvor, thick to falt and *cummin; you are ignorant for want of experience, that variety is more pleaiant, and the more delectable that a thing is the more agreeable it is to the appetite, (provided alwaies that you shun excesse and gormandile) for surely it cleaveth quickly to the body which is defirous of it, going, as one would say before, and ready to meet it halfe way for to receive it, having the eye-fight to prepare the way: whereas contrariwite, that which is lothlome or nor pleating to the appetite, floateth and wandereth up and down in the body, and findeth no entertainment in inch fort, as either nature rejectes it quite, or if the receive it, the same goes against her heart, and the doth it for pure need, and want of other instenance now when I speak of diversity & variety and the doth it for pure need, and want of other instenance now when I speak of diversity & variety of viands, note thus much and remember, that I mean not these curious works of pastrysthese equition sands, note that it is not the curious works of pastrysthese equitions for the same of Abusinese, Candult, and Carrez: which are but superstudies toyes and vanisties i for otherwise Plate himselfe allowed variety of meats at the arbit, to these generous and noble Gentlemen his Citizens, whom he describeth in his Common-walls to the same of the s

and restricted to

What is the resson of this opinion to generally received, that Musbrownes be engendered of thunder? and that hasfe is ho lie alleep are not thought to be smitten with leghtning?

A a certain tupper, where we were in the City Elie, Agentachus fer before us Mushromes of an exceeding biguestes when the company seemed to wonder, one who was there present, smiled and said! Certes; their may be seem well the great thunders that we have lately had within there few days; by which words he feemed pleasantly to ft off at this vulgat opinion: That Mushfomes should breed of thunder. Now some were there, who said: That thunder caused the earth to think and open, thing the means of the air, as it were a wedge to cleave it, and withal, that they who leek for Mushromes, by those crevices guesse where they are to be found, whereupon arose this common opinion; That they were engendered of thunder, and not shewed thereby; as if a man fhould imagine that a showre of rainbreedeth spales, and not rather cause them to creep forth and be seen abroad. But Agemachus seemed then in good earnest to confirm the said received opinion, by experience, praying the company, not to conclude by and by that a thing was incredible, because it was strange and wonderful: For (quoth he) there be many other effects of thunder, lightning, and other meteors, or celetial impressions right admirable; whereof it were very hard, if not altogether impossible, to comprehend the causes and the reasons. For this ridiculous round root called the Bulb, which maketh us to good sport, and is grown into a by-word, little though it be, escapeth not by that means from thunder, but becatife it bath a property clean contrary unto it; like peth not by that means from thunder, but becatife it bath a property clean contrary unto it; like as the figured allogand the skin of the Seale, or Sea calle, and of the beaft Hyana, with whole skinnes, mariners and lailers are wont to cloath the ends of their croffe laile-yards, whereupon they hang their failes:gardeners also and good husbandmen, call those showers that fall with thunder, and so that is to fay, good to water their grounds, and forthey think them to be. In summe, it were great simplicity and meet folly to wonder hereat, considering that we doe see before our eyes, things moreadmirable then this, and indeed of all other, most intredibles namely, our of most clouds, fire to flash, and from the same (soft as they be) so great cracks and horrible claps of thunder Well, I am (quoth he) in these matters somewhat talkative and full of words, because I would follicite and move you to be more willing to learch linto the eause, for that I mean not to deale hardly otherwise with you, and seem to presse you every one to lay down your part toward the payment for these my great Mushromes. Why (quoth I) Agendachus himselse seemeth in some sort to have pointed with his very singer to the reason hereos: for I assure you, at this present I cannot think of any one, more probable then this: namely, that together with the thunder, there falleth downmany times a certain genital water, apt to ingender: and the cause thereof, is heat mingled a-mong: for, that pure, light, and piercing substance of the fire, being now converted into lightning, is gone and passed away: but the more weighty, grosse, and statulent part remaining behind, enwrapped within the cloud, altereth and taketh quite the coldnesse away, and drinketh up the moisture, making it moreflatuous and windy, in such fort, as by this means especially, these rains gently and mildly enter and pierce into plants, trees, and herbs, upon which they fall, caufing them within a while to thrive in bigness, and insufing within them a particular temperature and a peculiar difference of juice. As we may observe otherwise, that the dew maketh the grasse to be better seasoned (as it were) and fitter to content the appetite of sheep and other cattel: yea, and those clouds upon which that reflexion is made, which wee call the rain-bow, fill thole trees and wood upon which they fall, with a passing sweet and pleasant odour : whereof the Priests of our country be not ignorant, but acknowledge as much, calling the same Irisifcepta, as if the rain-bow did rest or settleupon them. Much more probable it is, that when these waters and rains together with their ventosities and heats, occasioned by thunders and lightnings, come to pierce deep into the earth, it turneth and rolleth round, and by that means are ingendered therein such like nodosities and knobs, fost and apt to crumble, which we call Mushromes: like as inour bodies there breed and arise certaine flatuous tumors, named Kirnels or Glandules, formed by occasion of I wot not what bloody humors and heats with a for a Mushrome seemeth not to be a plant, neither without rain & moissure doth it breed; having no root at all, nor any spront springing from it it is wholly entire of it self round about, and holding upon nothing, as having the confidance onely of the earth which hath been a little altered and changed. And if you think this reason to be but flender, I say unto you more, that the most part of those accidents which follow upon thunder and lightning, are of the like fore; and therefore it is especially, that in these effects there is thought to be a sertain divinity. Then Days them the Orator who was in the company: Truth it is (quoth he) that you say, for not only the tulgar fort of simple and ignorant people are of that opinion, but some also of the Philosophers and vulgar for on manye and garaged by experience, that the lightning which of late fell upon our tor mine own part I know as much by selection things; for it emptied our fellers of wine, and never did house, wrought many strange and wonderful things; for it emptied our fellers of wine, and never did noue, wrought many transfer wherein it was; and whereas there Jay a man alleep, it flew over him, hurt time of the earthen veffels wherein it was; nurt unto the cattled view, without any harm at all to his person, or deeping to mich as his yea; and Bashed upon him, without any harm at all to his person, or deeping to mich as his cloaths but having a belt or pouch, wherein were certain pieces of brasse money, it melred and defacted them all fo confusedly, that a man could not know by the form or impression, one from another theman went thereupon to a certain Pythagorian Philosopher, who as hap was so journed there, and tneman went tneteupon to reason might be thereof, and what it did prelage? But the Philosopher, when he had cleared and affoiled his mind of scrupulous fear and religion, willed him to ponder when he had cleared and anonce his himselfe, and to pray unto the gods. I hear day allo, that not and confider of the matter apart by himselfe, and to pray unto the gods. I hear day allo, that not long fince there was a fouldier at Rome, who keeping the Centinel, upon one of the Temples of the City, chanced to have a flash of lightning to fall very neer unto him, which did him no hurr in the city, chanced to have a name or neground to have the first and other in the world in his body, but only burne the latchets of his floors: and whereas there were, retraine small boxes and cruets of filver within wooden cales, the filver within was found all included into a maffe noxes and cruets or niver within woods had no injury stalls, the continued full entire and found. But their in the bottom, and the wood had no injury stalls, the continued full entire and found. But their things a man may chuse whether he will beleeve or no Howbeit, this patient all other mixeles, which unings a man may amount marion makes, that the dead bodies of those who have been killed we all (Huppoie) do know very well; namely, that the dead bodies of those who have been killed we au (1 uppote) on know we ground and puttife not: for many thereby who will neither burn or, bylightning, continue above ground and puttife not: for many thereby who will neither burn or, enterer facts cories, but caft a trench or bank about, and fo let them lie as within a rampart: fo as entere facts cories, but caft a trench or bank about, and fo let them lie as within a rampart: fo as further dead bodies are to be feen always above ground uncorrupt: convincing Grance in Eurpider, further burners are to be feen always above ground uncorrupt: of untruth, who speaking of Phaethon faid thus:

Beloved mine, basfee where dead he lies,

In vale below, and therewish patrifers.

And hereupon it is (as I take it) that primitone taketh the name in Greek 3500, for the refemblance And nereupon it is the triple yeeld that have been imitten with lightning: which no doubthave a fierry and piercing frent, and this may be the reason likewise in my concert, that dogs and towes a fierry and piercing frent, and this may be the reason likewise in my concert, that dogs and towes of the aire forbear to touch any dead bodies, which in this fort are fricken from Heaven. Thus far forth have I laid the first flone for a ground-work of this cause, as also of the Bay-tree: Now let us entreat him here to finish and make out the rest, for that he is well acquainted with Mushromes, lest haply that befal unto us which sometimes to the Painter Andraerdes did; for when hee painted the Gulie Scylla, he portrayed more naturally and to the life, the fishes all about, then any thing elfe belides: whereby men judged that he shewed more affection therein, then cunning of his art, for that naturally he loved to feed upon good fishes: and even so some one might say: that we have discoursed so much of Mushromes, the breeding and generation whereof is so doubtful, as you fee for the pleasure and delight that we take in eating of them, Considering now that in these points our discourse seemed to carry some probability, and that every man was persuaded well enough that the cause and reason thereof was clear; and withalmy selfe began to speak and advise, that it was now time as the manner was in Comedies, to fee up those engins devised for to counterfeit thunder fo to inferre a disputation at the table of lightning; to which motion all the company condescended, but passing over all other points, very destrous and earnest they were to hear a discourse as touching this one: What the reason might be that men asleep be never smitten or blasted with lightning. Now albeit, I saw well enough, that I should gaine no great praise, in touching a cause, whereof the reason was common, yet I began to set to it and said: That the fire of light-ning was fine and subtile, as that which took the original and beginning from a most pure, liquid, and facred substance, which if there had been in it any moisture, or terrestriall großenesse mingled among, the Celerity of motion is such, that it would have purged and cast it forth: Nothing is mitten with lightning (quoth Democritus) that cannot reful the fire from Heaven: and there ore folide bodies, as iron, braffe, filver, and gold, be corrupted and melted therewith, by reason that they hold out, and withstand it: contratiwise, such as beerare, sull of holes, spungious, soft, and laxe, lightning quickly pierceth through, and doth them no harm; as for example, cloathes, or garments, and drie wood; for such as is greene will burne, because the moisture within maketh resistance, and so catcheth fire withal. If then it be true, that those who lie asleep be never fricken dead with thunder and lightning, furely weemust search here for the cause, and nevergofarther; for the bodies of men awake, are stronger, more firme and compact, yea, and able to make more refistance, as having all their parts full of spirits, by which ruling, turning, and welding the natural senses and holding them together, as it were, with an engine, the living creature becommeth strong, fast, knit, and unisome: whereas in sleep it is slack, loose, rate, unequal, foft, and as it were all resolved, by reason that the pores be open, for that the spirit hath forfaken and abandoned them; which is the cause likewise that voices, odours, and savours, palle through them, unheard, and in imelled : for why? that which should refift, and in refistance fuffer and take impression, meeteth not with those objects, that are presented unto it, and least of all, when they pierce with such swiftnesse and subtility, as the fire of lightning doth; for that which of it felfe is leffe firm and firong for to refift offenfive things, nature doth detend, fortifie, and furnish with remedies against that which offendeth, by putting before them hard and solid munitions; but look what things be of incomparable force, and invincible, they less offend and hurt that which veeldeth, then that which maketh head and resistance: add moreover hereunto, that they who lie afleepare leffe afraid, affrighted, or aftonied, by occasion whereof and of nothing else, many have died; only (I fay) for fear of death, without any harm at all done unto them: and this is the very cause that shepherds teach their sheep to run and gather round together, into a troop when it thundreth, for that they which are dispersed and scattered asunder, for very fear take harm, and cast their young ones in time of thunder: yea, and an infinite number have been known to lie dead on the ground, by reason of thunder, without any mark or throak, wound, scorch, or burn seen upon them, whose life and soul for very fear hath flown out of their bodies, like a bird out of a cage : for according as Eurip des faith:

The very blast of some great thunder-clap, Hath many a one struck street each with a stap.

And forasmuch as otherwise the sense of hearing, is of all others most subject to suffer violent passions, and the season lirights occasioned by sounds and noises, work greatest troubles in the mind. against it, the privation of tense is a sure bulwark and rampart to a man that lieth asseep; whereas they who are awake, be many times killed with fear of the thing before it commeth: for a fright (to fay a truth) knitting, cloting, and compressing the bodyfait, giveth more strength a great deale to the stroak when it comes, for that it findeth more resistance,

THE THIRD QUESTION.

Why at a wedding or bride-supper, men use to invite more guests, then at other times?

A T the wedding of my son Autobulus (O Seffus Senece) one who came from Cheronea, was with us to solemnize the seast; and a great number there were besides of other honorable personages; which gave unto him occasion for to demand this question: What the cause might be that ordinarily we invite more guests to such a marriage supper then to any other feast? considering that even those Law-givers who impugned most, the superfluity and riot of feaths, have precisely and exprelly fet down the number of those persons, whom they would have to be biddenguests to 2 wedding: For of the ancient Philosophers (quoth he) the man that treated of this argument and the caule thereof, to wit, Hecasaus of Abdera hath written nothing in my judgement worth ought, nor to the purpose ; for thus he saith : That they who marry wives, bid many perions to their wedding, to the end that many may take knowledge and bear witnesse, that being free born, and of free condition, they take wives likewife of free birth and condition. For the Comical Poets, clean contrary, mock and laugh at those, who make proud & sumptuous seasts at their mariage, setting out the same with great pomp and magnificence, as if that were no sure bond nor link to be trusted unto, wherewith they would feem to knit wedlock; like as Menander faid to one, who willed the bridegroom to make a strong rampart all about, of Pots, Pans, and Platters;

When that is done on every fide, What is all this to your new bride?

But lest we might not feem to finde fault with others at our pleasure, for that we have nothing of our own to fay, which is the easiest matter in the world; I shewed first and formost, that there was no occasion of feasing, so publick nor so much divulged and celebrated, as marriage: for say that we facrifice unto the gods, or feast a friend for his farewel when he is to go a long voyage, or entertain a traveller and stranger that passeth by our house, or commeth of purpose to visit us, we may do all without the privity of kinsfolk and friends: but a nuptial feast (where the wedding-long and carol of Hymenaus is chanted aloud: where the torches are to be feen light burning : where the hautboyes and pipes play merrily and refound: where (as Homer faith) the very women and maidens stand wondering at their doors, to see and hear) is notoriously known and proclamed to the whole world: in regard whereof, because there is none ignorant of these espousils and feltival solemnities, men being ashamed to leave out any, invite generally, all their kinsfolk, samiliar friends and acquaintance, as whom in some fort it doth concern, and who have an interest in the thing. When we all had approved this, Theon taking in hand the question: Surely all this (quoth he) may go for currant, for it carrieth great probability therewith: but you may add moreover (if you please) thus much: That these marriage feasts are not only for friends, but also for kinsfolk and allies: for that a whole kindred, race and generation, come to have another new alliance to be incorporated into them: and that which more is, when two houses in this wife be joined together: both he who received the woman, thinketh that he ought to entertain and feast the kindred and friends of him that giveth her : and he who giveth her, likewise taketh himselse bound to do as much reciprocally, by the kinsfolk and friends of the receiver: whereby the feast and number of them who are bidden, groweth double. Now for a fruith as many marriage complements, and (to fay a truth) the most page in manner all, are performed at weddings by women, furely wherethe good wives be, great realon there is, that of necessity their husbands also should be welcome for their sakes, and so thereby the company still doth encrease. THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Alepsus a town in Eubasa, where there be baths naturally of hot waters, is a proper seat and place fitted by nature, for fundry honest pleasures, beautified with many fair houses and lodgings, in fuch fort, as it is reputed the publick Hoftelry of all Greece: and albeit there be great game there, of hunting and hawking, and wonderfulplenty as well of lowle as other veniion, yet is the market no lesse ferved from the lea, nor their tables lesse surnished with dainty fish; for that indeed along the coast the sea is very deep, and the water fair, nourishing an infinite number of excellent along the coart the lea is very deep, and the midt of Spring, then at any other feation of the year; for fifthes. This town flourisherh more in the midt of Spring, then at any other feating of the year; for much concounte there is thither at that time, who converte familiarly one with another, feating mutually, and taking the benefit of that great affluence of victuals, and abundance of all good things; where having nothing effect od of great importance, they paffe the most part of the time in devifing and discouring together of good letters and matters of learning: but when foever Calliffrains the profesior of Rhetorick is at home, hardly may a man sup any where elsebut at his house; for, a man so full of courtesse he is and hospitality, that there is no saying of him nay. Now for that willingly he nsed to bring those together who were learned and professed Scholars, his company was so much more pleatant and delectable; for many times he would seem among other ancient persons of old time, to imitate Cimon, making his whole and only pleasure, to feast many in his house, and those from all parts: but most of all, and in manner continually, he followed the example and steps of Celeus, of whom it is written, that he was the first who daily assembled to his house a number of honourable persons, and of good mark, which affembly he called Prytanium. The peeches ordinarily at these meetings in Callifrains his house, was forting well and juitable to such company: but one day above the reft, when the table flood furnished with all manner of dishes that a mans heart could wish for, it ministed matter and occasion to enquire as touching viands, whether were better, those of the Land, or those of the Sea; And when all others in manner with one accord and voice, commended them which the Land did yeeld, as being of to divers and fundry forts, yea, and those innumerable: Polycrates Calling Symmachus by name; You fir, (quoth he) who are (as one would say) a water-Animal, bred and fed within so many seas, environing round about your facred City Nicopolis, will not you maintain and defend your tutelar god Neptone?

Yes that I will (quoth Symmachus) I heartily pray and beleech you to join with me in this cause, whom I take for mine ad joint and affiftant; considering that you enjoy the benefit of the sweeter whom I take for mine ad joint and affiftant; and most pleasant coast of all the sea, Begin wethen (quoth Polycrates) our discourse with our usual cultome and manner of speech: For like as among so many Poets as there be, we give but one by way of excellency, simply the name of Poet; to wit, Homer, torthat of all others he is the principal. so there being in the world many dainty cates, and exquisite viands, yet use of speech hath carried it so, that fish alone or especially is named 400, that is to say, meat, for that indeed it is the chiefe and very beft : hereupon it comes, that we call those gluttons that love belly-cheer so well, 24064-28s, and $1.64-4s, not for that they love Beefelo well as Hercules did: who as the Poet faith:

Det, and give, so that the had fed well offeth.

Det at green nemfg; gathered fresh.

Neither do we name such an one gives over that is to say, a lover of sigs, as Plate was, or gives fellow. that is to fay, one that loveth grapes as well, like as Arceflans did; but fuch as haunt ordinarily the fish stalls, and have a quick ear, to hear the market bell, or listen to the clock, that giveth warning when the fifth market is open: And Demosshenes when he objected unto Philocoates: That with the money that he received for betraying his country, he bought Whores, and Fishes; reproached the man no doubt for his leathery and gluttony; and it is pretily faid of Ctefiphon, when as one of thele gluttons and helly gods, in the court or counsel house cried out: That he should crack and bunst in the micht: Do not fo (quoth he) my good riend in any cafe, make us not a bait here, for to be devoured of fishes: and he that made these little verses:

Thou liv'st of capers as thy meat, When as of * Sturgeon thou mass eat. What was his meaning think you? or what meaneth this common word of the people, when they speak one to another, for to be merry and make good cheer: Come, shall we to the strond or shore to day? Is it not as much as if they meant; that to sup by the water side had no fellow for geon, it was thore to day ? Is it not as mount as it may mean, that to roy yet to roy out of the fhore for ione dell. pleafure and delight, as in truth it hard not; for furely their purpose is not to go unto the short for deller pleasure and delight, as in truth it hard not in for for foreign and delight and another than the short of the same and delight another than the short of the same and delight another than the same and the the love that they have to fee the billows of the fea, or the gravel flones and landscaft up why then? because they would eat some good pease portage there, or make their meales with capers? no forfooth; for who goesthither for that purpose? but it is because they that dwell along the bank by by the water fide are provided always of iotion and flore of good fifth and the fame fieth and fweet, Moreover, sea fish carrieth an higher price beyond all reason, then other meat that commeth to the market infomuch as Cato declaming and inveighing openly before the people against the superfluity and excelle in Rome City, brake out into this speech not hyperbolically and over-teaching the truth, but as it was indeed . That a fifth at Rome was deeter fold then a fat Ox; for they fell a little barrel of fish at such an high price, as an hundred Oxen would not cost so much, at a solemne facrifice, where they go before Boares, Goats, and other beafts, yea, and the strewing of facred Meale, Certes, the belt judge of the vertue and strength of medicinable drugs and spices, is the most expert Physician; likewife no man is able fo well to judg of fong and harmonical measures, as the best and most experienced Musician; and consequently we may infer, that the meetest judg as touching the goodnesse and daintinesse of meats, is he who loveth them best : for we must not take to arbitrate and determin such a controversie and question as this, Pythagoras or Xenocrates; but rather Antagorat the Poet, Philoxenus the son of Eryxis, and Androcydes the Painter, who being tomake a Picture for to represent the Gulfe Seylla, drew even the fishes about it most emphatically with a kind of affectionate mind unto them; and in one word, more lively and naturally then all the reft, because heloved fish so well, and fed upon them with such contentment. Antagoras the Poet was upon a time in the camp of King Antigonus, who finding him very busie all untied and unbuttoned, in feething of Congers in a pan, came close unto him, and rounding him in the ear: Sirra (quoth he) thinkell thou that Homer thy Master, when hedescribed the noble acts of Agameminon, was busie about boiling of Congers: unto whom Amagoras turned again, and replying in this wife prefendly.

And think you Sir (quoth be) that when Agamennon exploited those brave seas of Armes, hee went up and downe in his camp fpying, peeping, and prying into every correct to bufily as you doe, for to fee if he could finde one feething a Conger? Thus much Polyerates: and to conclude and knit up his speech: For mine owne part (quoth he) this I thought good to say in the behalfe of fishes, induced thereto as well by the proofe of testimonies as custome and usual fpee.h.

But I (quoth Symmachus) will handle this matter soberly, and in good earnest, going more subtilly and liker a logician to work, in this manner: For it that be counted dainty and delicate which seasoneth meat, and giveth it the most pleasant taste; we must needs confesse, that simply to be the belt, which maintaineth the appetite, and giveth an edge to the stomach that continueth longest: like as therefore those Philosophers surnamed Elpistiques affirme: That there was nothing that maintained life, and held body and foul longer together then Hope, for that without hope which doth mitigate and allay all travels, it is impossible to live; even to we must needs grant and yeeld, that to keep and preserve appetite best, without which all other viands be lothsome and odious: but nothing shall you find of that property and effect, comming out of the earth; but such a thing the sea affordeth, and that is Salt, without which nothing to speak of is savory, nothing toothfome, nor to be eaten: for even our very bread is not pleasing to our taste, if there beno salt within it : which is the reason that Neptune and Ceres be alwayes worshipped together in one Temple: In fumme, falt is, as it were, the sauce of sauces, and that which seasoneth all the dainties what soe-And hereupon it was that those Worthies and Demi-god Princes, who encamped before Troy, and made profession of spary and simple diet, as religious votaries, and who cut off all curious superfluity and excesse, over and above necessary food, insomuch as they did not eat once of fish; notwithstanding they had a standing Legier, hard upon the straights of Hellespont, could not endure to be served at the table without salt: witnessing thereby, that it is the onely viand which cannot be rejected or left out: for like as colours of necessity require light: even so all those sapours and juices within meats, have need of salt, to stir up the sense of taste, and to provoke appetite, otherwise they are but flat, unpleasant to the tongue, and louthsome: for dead carrious (as Heraclitus faith) would be cast forth, rather then dung and ordine: and what is the slesh that wee eat, but a dead thing, and part of a dead carcasse? but when the strength of salt is put thereto, it is in flead of life, to give a grace and commendable tafte unto it: and this is the reason, that before other food, we take those things that be sharp and saltish, and in one word, whatsoever do stand most of falt; for fuch be allectives of the appetite, which being drawn on, and entifed as with a bait, by the means of these vantcurriers and preparatives, it commeth more fresh, and with a better edge, ready to serupon other meats, whereas, if we should begin with them first, our stomach would quickly be done and gone. I will yet fay more then fo: namely, that all the kinds of falt, ferve not onely to give a good relish to our meats, but allo draw on our drinks, and cause us to make a quarrel unto the cup. As forthat Onion which Homer talketh of, and praiseth for a special dainty to commend drink, it was more meet indeed for marriners, and rowers at the Oare, then Kings and Princes: but in truth, those meats that be powdred or corned a little with salt, for that they be savory in the mouth, give all wines a pleasant verdure to please the taste, and to go down the throat merrily: the same make any water potable and delightiome, having besides, no such rank and strong scent, as the Onion leaves behind it. That which more is, such meats do rarifie other viands, and prepare them for concoction and digettion. in such fort, as falt being eaten, imparteth unto the body the delight of a dainry viand, and the might of an wholsomemedicine.

To come now unto other meats, wherewith we are furnished from the sea: besides, that they are passing sweet, they be also of all others most harmlesse; for albeit they be of a sleshly substance, yet they lie not heavy upon the stomach, they be easily concocted and soon passe downward: witnesse hereof. our Zeno here, yea, and beleeve me Crato, who so soon as men be sick, or ill at ease, before all other directions, betake them to fish diet. Furthermore, it soundeth to good reason, that the sea breedeth and seedeth for us, living creatures more wholome then any others, by how much they be mora exercised, considering that the very air. which it doth breath & send forth, for the purity and simplicity thereof is most agreeable unto us. Well said of you (quoth Lamprias) and fulpurity and miliputery theirs somewhat I will add more out of my Philosophical learning. My Grandfather (I remember) was wont ordinarily to fay of the Jews by way of mockery, that they abstained from the eating of that flesh, which of all others deserved most justly to be eaten; even so may we fay, that man hath not fo great right and reason to feed upon any viands whatsoever, as those that come out of the lea: for, say that there were no other communion and fellowship between us and these land-creatures: yet at leastwise, thus much there is, that many of them eat of the lame food with us, draw in the same aire, wash and drink as we do, yea, and otherwhiles we are abashed, and take pity of them, when we kill them for our food, making a lamentable city as they do: and for that we have made some of them familiar unto us insomuch as they can do many things answerable to the education which they had; whereas the fifthes in the fea and rivers, are altogether firangers unto us, as being bred, nourished and living in another world: no voice of theirs, no affect of countenance, nor service at all which either they have done or cando for us, can exempt them or crave mercy at our hands, for to have their lives faved. For what use should we make of those creatures which we cannot keep alive with us? or what charitable affection can we bear toward them, the place where we live, is to them no lesse then hell: for no sooner come they into it, but dead they are immediately. THE FIFTH QUESTION.

A Free these speeches thus passed, some there were, who prepared and addressed themselves to dispute in opposition against that which had been said; but, Califfresia, breaking off and purting by all further disputation of this argument: What think you (quoth he) of that by-specify by all further disputation of this argument: What they in the grain the lews by Lampria : namely, that they in the grain the left which deferveth most justly of all others to be eaten? For my part (quoth Pelgranes) I think it passing well fpoken : but this more and befides, troubleth my head, and maketh me doubt, whether this nation, upon any honour or reverent regard of Swine, or for meer abomination and harred of the bealt, doth abstain from their flesh? as for that which themselves alledge, it resembleth Fables and devised tales : unlesse haply they have some other serious and secret reasons, which they are loth to deliver besore the face of the world. To say what I think (quoth Callistratus) I am verily perswaded, that the Swine is in some honour among them: for admit that it be a foul and ilfavoured beaft, what then? that it be filthy besides, what of that? I cannot see that it is more ugly in shape to see to, or more untoward of nature to be endured, then the Bettil, the Crocodile, or the Cat: which notwithstanding, the Egyptian Priests do honourand reverence as most holycreatures, some in one place and some in others; and as for the Hog, it is faid, they regard and honour it by way of thankf-giving, as grateful persons, acknowledging a benefit received from that beaft, in that it sheweth them the manner how to till and ear the ground, breaking up the earth, digging and rooting (as he doth) into it with his snout : and withal, what say you to this, that he hath shewed themaking of a plow-share, which some think, thereupon took the name out, as derived of the word of, that is to fay, a Swine And verily, the Egyptians at this day, such as inhabit the low-countrey and the flatsalong the river Nilus, have no need of other plow then the Swines front : for when the river is returned again withinhis bank, after he hath watered the plains and champion field fufficiently, the peafants of the country do more but follow prefently with their feed, and put in all their Hogs after it, who partly trampling with their feet, and in part turning up the fost earth with their noses, cover the feeds which the husbandmen have cast upon the ground. No marvel therefore, if there be some nations, who in this respect forbear to ear Swines flesh, considering there be other beasts, who for as small matters as these, yea, and some that be meer ridiculous and to be laughed at, have had right great honours done unto them, by barbarous nations: for it is faid, that the Egyptians make a god of the filly blind Mouse Mygale: and why so? because darknesse was before light, and is of greater antiquity: also they have an opinion, that this creature is ingendered of Mice in the fifth generation, or at the fifth time that they breed, and that in the very change of the Moon; allo, that the Liver of it doth decrease, as the Moon is in the wane, and doth decay with her light.

Moreover, they confecrate the Lyon unto the Sun, for that it is the only four-footed beaft having crooked claws, which bringeth forth whelps that can fee: also, for that the Lion is very wakeful, and fleepeth paffing little, and whiles he fleepeth, his eyes do fhine again. Moreover, they fer Lions heads gaping for the fpouts of their fountains, because (for footh) the river Nitus bringesh new waters into their fields, and corn grounds, when the Sun passeth thorow the fign Leo in the Zodiack : and as for the black Stork Ibis, which they likewise honour, they say, that when it is first hatched, the weigheth two drams, that is to fay, just as much as the heart of a young infant newly born doth poile; also that of the two legs and the bill stretched forth one from the other, and refing upon the ground, is made the true proportion of triangle with three equal fides: And why should the Egyptians be blamed and condemned for sogreat folly and absurdity, seeing that by report, the very Pythagoreans themselves adored and worshipped a white Cock; and among other fea fishes they abstained from the Barble and the nettle fish; considering also that the Magicians, who were of the lect of Zoro: fres, honored above all living creatures upon the earth the Urchin or Hedghock, but hated water-Mice; faying: That he should do best service, and most acceptable to the gods, yea, and be right bleffed and happy himselfe, who could kill the greatest number of

This giveth me occasion to think, that if the Jews had held Swine hateful, and abominable creatures, they would have killed them, like as the Magicians did the faid Mice; whereas contrariwife they are as well forbidden to kill them, as to eat them : and peradventure there is good reason, that as they honour the Asse, for that sometime in a great drought he shewed them a place wherein was a fountain of water even for they reverence the Swine, for teaching them how to fow and till the ground. And verily fome man haply might fay, that this people abit ainth likewife frum eating the Plare, fixting and abhoring the fame, as an impure and unlean bealt it is not without fome caute (quoth Lamprias, taking the word out of his mouth) that they forbeat eating of the Hare, for the relemblance that it hath to the Afe, whom they myflically do worship; for the colour of them both is all one; the ears be long and big withal; their eyes great and shining; in which respects there is a marvellous similitude between them, in such sort, that of a great and small beast, there is not to be found such a resemblance again in any other: unlesse peradventure among other similitudes, they imitate herein the Egyptians, who elteem the swiftnesse of the beast divine, yea, and the exquisite perfection of some natural jenses, admirable: for the eyes of Hares be so vigorous and indefatigable, that they will fleep open eyed, and their hearing fo quick, that the Egytians having them in such admiration therefore, when they would fignifie in their Hieroglyphick Charachers perfect hearing, do paint and pourtray Hares : as for Swines flesh, the Jews have in great abomination, for that barbatous nations do of all other dileases abnor Saint Magnus evil, or the white leproie mott, as well for that they suppose, that these maladies may be engerdered, by feeding up-on their slesh, as also because, look what person they do assall; them they do eat and consume in the end; and this we do see ordinarily, that a Swine under his belly is full of a kind of leaprosie, and covered all over with a white feurf, called Pions: which infection feemeth to proceed from some evilhabit, and inward corruption within the body, bewraying it selfe in the outside of the skin; to fay nothing of the filthinesse of this beast, both in feeding and otherwise, which must need impart some evil quality to the flesh ; for there is not another beast again, that taketh such pleasure indust and ordure, loving to wallow and welter in the most miry and stinking places that be, as it doth; unkelfe they be futh as breed and be nourished in those places: surthermore, it is faid, that the light of their eyes is so bent and fixed downward that they can see nothing on high no loor once so much as look up to the skie, uilleffe they be cast on their backs with their feet upward; so that the balls of their eyes by this means be turned quite contrary to the course of nature: and verily this beaft howsoever otherwise ordinarily it be given to cry and grunt exceeding much yet if the feet be furned upward (as is before faid) it will be filent and still ; fo much aftonied and amazed it is to fee the face of Heaven, which it is not wont to do, and so for fear of some greater harm, it is thought that it giveth over crying: Now if we may come in with Poetical fables to make up our discourse, it is faid, that fair Adonis was killed by a wild bore : and Adonis is thought to be no other then Bacchus himfelfe; which opinion may be confirmed by many ceremonial rites, in factificing both to the one and the other, which are the very same: although some hold that Adonis was the minion whom Bacchus loved, as appeareth by Phanocles the Poet, a man well seen in love-matters, in these verses:

Bacchus who took fo great delight The hills and forrests for to range: Of fair Adonis had once a sight, And him to ravish made it not strange.

Symmachus marvelling at this last speech of his above the rest: How now (quoth he) will you Lamprius indeed insert and transcribe the tutelar god of your country:

Bacchus I mean furramed Evius, Who women doth to rage incite:

And in Such Service furious,
And frontick working takes delight, among the secret ceremonies of the Hebrews? Or do you not think there is some reason that hee is the very same god whom they love. Then Meragenes: Let Lamprias alone (quoth he) as for my selse who am an Athenian. I answer and say unto you affirredly, that he and Bacchus are both one: but the most part of the arguments and conjectures which prove it, may not be uttered and taught, + see the but unto those who are professed in the absolute religion and confraterity triestrical, of sacching with a first of the triestrical professed in our country. Nowbeit, that which we are not forbidden to lifek among friends, and namely at their pames the Table, amid our cups, and when we take pleasure in the gifts and benefits of this god (if it pleases who for war feet), the company) ready I am to deliver: and when they all willed and requested him for one plan one of the time. * First and formost (quoth he) the season and whole manner of their principal and greatest feast, is all holy series to getther proper and convenient unto Bacchus; for that which they call their fast, they celebrate in militial and the convenient unto Bacchus; for that which they call their fast, they celebrate in militial and the convenient unto Bacchus; for that which they call their fast, they celebrate in militial and the convenient unto Bacchus; for that which they call their fast, they celebrate in militial and the convenient unto Bacchus; for that which they call their fast, they celebrate in militial and the convenient unto Bacchus; for that which they call their fast, they celebrate in militial and the convenient unto Bacchus; for the conve the very midft and heat of vintage, at what time as they bring tables abroad, and furnish them with a file that all kinds of fruit: they fit under tents or booths, which are made principally of vine branches and wings only ivy, wrought twiffed, and interfaced one within another; and the even or day before it, they call of business the feel of Tahanard. the feast of Tabernacles or Pavilions: within a few days after, they celebrate another feast, and the aing.

fame is not under a figure, and covertly, but openly and directly in the name of Bacchus: there is a third folemuity yet among them, named Cradephoria, of carrying vine branches, and I byr fophoria, of bearing javelins dight withiry, and in that manner enter they into their Temple, but what they do within we know not : howbeit very probable it is, that they perform there certain Bacchanaes or Rites in the honour of Biechm; for they we little Trumpets to invocate upon their god, such as the Argives have in their Bacchanale solemnity; then come others playing upon Harps and Lutes, whom they call in their language Levites, a denomination derived of Lycius, the turname of Bacchus, or rather of Evins: It feemeth also to me, that their fealts of Sabbaths is not at ogether diagreeable with Bacchus; for there be many places yet in Greece even at this day, where they call the Priests Bacchi, by the name of Sabb: who in their Bacchanales and ceremonial sports, estioons reiterate these voices, Evoi and Sabboi, as appeareth in the Oration of the Crown which Demosthenes made against Afchines; as also in the Poet Menander. And this name, Sabbat, if a man should fay, it was imposed upon this teast of designess, that is to say, of the inordinate motion and turbulent agitation of the Prielts of Bucchus, it were not altogether about d and without reason: for even they themselves tellifie no lesse: for they solemnize and honor the Sabbat with mutual seasting and inviting one another to drink wine, until they be overfeen therewith, unlesse some great occasion doe occur that hindereth them; and even then, they think yet that they must needs taste strong wine, Howbeit, fome man may haply fay, that these arguments be but bare conjectures and prejumptions, that carry with them fome little probability: but verily, that which is done among them, is a forcible and necessary proof. First and formost, their high Priest shewing himselfe abroad, and going before with a Mitre upon his head, at these feasts, argueth no lesse: who also is clad in a vesture of of Stags skin, wrought richly with Gold: arrayed bende in along robe, down to his feet, and wearing buskins: befides, there be many little bells pendant round about the border and skirt of his robe, which gingle and ring as he goeth, like as also among us: this manner of reiounding they usefull in their facrifices, and they furname the Nurses of their god, Cholcodyra: and befides, there is a Thrife or Javeler with tab ours to be feen expresly printed aloft, against the walls of their temple : all which ceremonies certainly can agree to no other god, but unto Bacchus.

Moreover, in none of all their oblations do they offer honey, for that they think it marreth and corrupteth wine when it is mingled with it: and yet this was the liquor which they used in old time, to serve God withal in their libaments: and whereof they drank until they were drunk, before that the Vinetree was known: and even at this day, those barbarous nations, who drink no wine, nie a certain drink made of Honey, correcting the exceeding (weetnefle thereof with certain tart and auftereroots refembling (in fome fort) the verdure of wine: these oblations the Greeks presentanto their gods, and those they call Nephalia and Melesponda, as one would say, Sober and confeded with honey: for that Honey hath a natural property adverse and contrary unto Wine. To conclude, that this is the same God which they worship, a man may collect by this one argument, which is of no fmall force: namely, that among many punishments which they have, this is the most shameful and ignominious, when they are forbidden to drink wine who are punished even so long as it pleafeth him to fet down, who is the judge, and hath power to impose the penalty: and those who are thus punished,

The end of this discourse is wanting, as also the discussing and deciding of the other five questions proposed in the forefront of this fourth book.

The Proëme.

Hat your opinion is at this present (O Soffins Sinecio) as touching the pleasures of the foul and body, I wotnot;

For that now many a mountain high; And shady forrest stand between; The roaring feas likewife do lie, So as to part us, bars they been.

for you feemed not greatly, long agoe, to approve and allow their fentence, who hold: That there is nothing properly and particularly delightiome, nothing at all that it defireth, or joyeth in, of it felfe, but that it liveth only according to the life of the body, laughing (as it were) and sporting with it in the pleasant affections thereof; and contrariwise, mourning at the heavy passions afflicting it: as if the toule were no other thing, but a very matter apt to take the impression of sundry forms, or a mirror to receive the images and refemblances of those objects which are pre ented unto the flesh and body: for as by many reasons, a man may easily resute the blind and illiberal falsity of this opinion; so by this especially, that after the table is taken away, and supper done, men of learning and knowledge incontinently tall into discourse and devise together (as it were) at a basiquet, delight-ing and folacing one another with pleasant talk, whetein the body hath no part at all, unlesse it be very little and afar of: which experience beareth witnesse, that this is the provision of dainty cates, and delicate pleasures laid up peculiarly for the soul; and that these be the only delights indeed of the minde, wherers those other be but bastards and strangers infected with the society of the body: like as therefore nurses whiles they give paps and panades unto their little babes, have some small pleafure infecding them, by tafting the same in their own mouths before; but after they have filled their infants bellies, and brought them asleep, so as they cry no more, then they go themselves to their own refection, meet for them, they eat and drink and make good cheer; even so the soul doth participate with the defires and appetites of the body, in manner of a nurse attending upon it, serving it, and framing her selfe in some sort to do it pleasure, and satisfie the necessities thereof: but after that the body is sufficiently served, layed at rest and repose, then being delivered of her obsequious fervice and bufineffe about the body, the betaketh her felfe from thenceforward unto her own pleafures and delights: making her repair, and taking her tolace in discourses of learning in good letters, insciences and histories, and inseeking to hear somewhat, and know more still of that which is singular. What should a man say any more of this? considering and seeing as he doth, that even base mechanical and unlettered fellows, after tupper, ordinarily withdraw their minds, and employ the same upon other pleasures and recreations, far removed from the body, proposing dark riddles, enigmatical questions, and intricate propositions of names comprised under notes of certaine numbers, hardly to be affoiled or gueffed at? and after all this, come in banquets, which make way unto players, jesters, counterfeit pleasants, giving room to Menander, and the actors of his Comedies! all which sports and passimes are not devised for to ease and take away any pain of the body, no yet to procure some gentle motion and kind contentment in the fiesh; but only for that the speculative and fludious part of the mind, which naturally is in every one of us, doth demand and call for some particular pleasure and recreation of her own, when we are once discharged of the businesse and of fices whereabout we are employed for the body.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

What is the cause that willingly we hear and see those who counterfeit them that be angry, or sorrowful 5 but love not to hear or fee the parties themselves in those passions?

OF fuch matters there passed many discourses, when you were present with us at Athensat what time as the comedian Actor Strate flourished; for he was then in 10 great name and reputation that there was no talk but of him. But one time above the rest, we were invited and feasted by Boethun the Epicurean, and with us there supped many more of that leet : now after supper the fresh remembrance of the Comedy which we had feen acted, gave occasion unto us, being students and lovers of learning, to fall into a discourie and question about the cause, why we cannot abide but are greatly discontented, to hear the voices of those who are angry torrowful, timorous, or affrighted? and contrariwife, what the reason is, that they who counteriest these passions. and represent their words, their gestures and behaviour, do much delight and please us? And verily, all in manner there in place, opened the same, and were in one song; for they gave this reason and said: Inafmuch as he who counterfeiteth those pastimes, is better then he who suffereth them indeed : and in regard that he who is not affected himselfe, excelleth the other: we knowing so much, take pleasure and are delighted: but I, a beit, that I let foot (as mensay) in the dance of another, said thus much: That we being naturally framed for to discourse by reason, and to love things that savour of wit, and beartificially done, affect and efteem those who have a desterity therein, if a thing succeed accordingly: for like as the Bee delighting in sweetnesse, syeth from flower to flower, seeking bufily where the may find any matter that will afford substance for honey: even so a man by nature ingenious, studious also of arts, and elegancy, is wont to cherish, love, and embrace every action, and work, where he knoweth there was wit and understanding employed in the finishing of it: if then one come and prefent unto a young child, a little loaf of bread indeed, and with al tender unto him a pretty puppy or bulkin, or heighfer made of paste or dough; you shall see that he will run ra-ther to these counterfeit devices, then to the other; and even so it is also in other things; for if one offer him a piece of filver in the masse unwrought; and another tender unto him a little beast, or a cup made of filver, he will much sooner make choice of that which he seeth to have some artificial workmanship joined with it, and to savour of wit and cunning: and therefore it is, that children at this age take more delight, both to hear fuch covert speeches as shew one thing and mean another: as also those playes and pastimes which have some witty matters contrived, or ambiguous difficulties interlaced therein: for that which is smoothly polished and curiously wrought, draweth and alties interfaced therein: for that which is innociny pointed and curiously wrought, drawth and allureth unto it mans nature of the own accord, as being proper unto it, and familiar, although it bee not taught to embrace it. For a function as therefore, he who is angry or grieved in good earnest, fleweth nothing else but common and ordinary passions: but in representing and counterfeiting of the same, there is a certain desterity and subtility of wit to be seen, especially if it speed well and take effect: therefore we delight to behold the one, and are displeased to see the other. For the proof hereof, mark how we are affected, semblably in other objects, shews, and sights, presented unto us: for with griefe and forrow of heart we look upon those who are either dying or lie grievoully fick: contrariwife, with joy we behold, yea, and admire either Philotetes painted in a table: or Queen Jocasta pottrayed in brasse: upon whose visage it is said, that the workman tempered a little silver with the braffe, to the end that this mixture of mettals together, might represent naturally, and to the life indeed, the face and colour of one ready to faint, and yeeld up the ghost: And this (quoth I) my masters, (to you I speak who are Epicureans) is an evident argument on the Cyrenaiques side against you: to prove that in passimes and sports, presented to the eye and the eare, the pleasure consistent not in seeing or hearing, but in the understanding for an odious and unpleasant thing it is, to hear a a Hen keep a creaking or cackling, and a Crow untowardly and untunably crying, and yet he that can well and naturally counterfeit either the cackling of an Hen, or the crying of the Crow, ne that can well and naturally counteriest estimating of an Hen, of the crying of the Crow, pleafer hand contented us wonderfull well: femblably, to look upon those who are in Ptifick or Consumption, is but a lovelesse fight: and yet we joy and take delight to see the pictures or images of such persons: for that our understanding is pleased and contented with the imitation and resemblance of them, as a thing proper and peculiar unto it: for otherwise, what joy and contentment have men, or what outward occasion have they so much to admire and wonder at Parmenons Sow? infomuch as it is grown to be a common by-word: This Parmenon was by report, one that counterfeited passing well, the grunting of an Hog: for which his singular grace and gift therein, his concurrents upon an envious humour, would needs assay to doe as much in despight of him: but men being-already forestalled with a prejudicate opinion of him, would say thus: Well done; but nothing to Parmenons Hog: and therefore, one of them having gotten a little Porket indeed under his aim, made it for to Iqueak and crys but the people hearing the noise of a swine indeed: All this (laythey) is nothing to Parmenous Hog; whereupon the party let the faid live hog run among them all, for to convince them of their corrupt judgement, carried away with an opinion, and not grounded upon truth and reason. Whereby it appeareth evidently, that one and the same motion of the sense, doth not affect the mind alike, when there is not an opinion, that the action was performed wittily and with artificial dexterity.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

That there was in old time a game of prize for Poets.

T the folemnity of the Pythick games, there was fome question and talk upon a time, about the A cutting off, and putting down of certain playes and pastimes, foisted in, to the others that were ancient and of the first institution: for whereas at the first, there were but three only that played their prizes; to wit, the Pythian player of flute or pipe, the harper, and the finger to the harp: after they had once admitted the actor of the tragedies, no fooner was this gate (as one would fay) fet open, but they were not able to refift and keep out an infinite number of other playes and sports, that rushed and thrust themselves in after him: by occasion whereof, there was much variety and a freequent concourse at this solemnity, which I must needs say, was no unpleasant sight to behold: but furely it retained not the ancient gravity and dignity beseeming the Muses indeed: for by this means, the Judges and Umpires were much troubled; besides there grew many quarrels and enmities, which could not otherwise be for where there are so many contending for the prize, there cannot chuse but be a number of male-contents, that missed the garland. But among all others, it was thought good by the judges, to semon and banish from the solemnity, a number of those who penned Orations, and all the fort of Poets stage came thither to verifie for the best game; which they did not (I affure you) for any hatted mid-learning and good letters, bittled that they who prelent themselves to these learned compare, be greinarily the most notable periods of all others; the judges beforefuld, reverenced their, and in Jonne Jort, pitted their case, effecting them all worthy men, and well defer, ing of good letters, however, no able all to gain the victory. We therefore, being at this equicil, laboured to dehort those who went about to change and after fetled cultimers, and who blamed in any of these largedgames, multiplicity and variety, as if they found fault with many firings in an inframents, or a coploit of voices in vocal muscle. Now, in impeting when we were in Persua his holls, who was the predicent and governour of the faid folentity, and courteoully had invited vis, the question was revived and fee on foot a fresh and we took upon us to defend the cause of the Mules, the wing that Poetry was no modern protestion, not entrad but, lately among the combats of facted games, but that of atteint time it had won the vietbing, and gamed the Crown. There were in the company, some who thought by these words of mine, that I mean to allege old columnities, and for cite that and trivial examples for proofe of the cause is to mut, the innerals of least on the lately in one, and it is not a manufacture. Chalcidian, it which, Homer, and It sticks make mention: but cashing by and resolution all these evidences to much to sled and divided alled by by Graintmanning, and namely, the inneral obsequies and honous one to Privotics in Homes, where they fore, being at this council, laboured to dehort those who went about to change and alter setled culmarians, and namely the funeral oblequies and honours done to Parroclus in Homer, where they marians, and namety, che unertai opiequies and nonous done to Patrocia; in Homby; where they read not shapes, that ist of my, Lancers of Datts, but shapes, that is to say, makers of Orations and clongent Orators, asist Achilles had proposed rewards and prizes for Orations; leaving [1 say) their matters. I affirmed: That when Aciffur celebrated the funerals for his Father Petra, he exhibited a combat of Poets for the bell game, wherein Sipila went away with the victory. Hereat many and another than the proposed in the same shapes of the sam thond up, and oppoint themselves against me, demanding a real caution army hands for to make good that which I had a verred, for that it seemed up to them a very stringe narration and incredible but as good hap was, I called to remembrance, that I had sead to much in the Chronicle of Libia; compiled by Acelander, where the story is put down: And this book (quoth I) is not in every mans complied by Acel Maray, which welly, that the most of you have been careful to perule those records which Ademost the Arhenian, a dilegent writer and a learned Antiquary, who hath not been idle and sleepy in feeking out the antiquities and singularities of Greece, hath set down in writing, as concerning the treatures of the City Delphoi: For there you thall find written, that in the treatury of the Styonians, there was a golden books given and dedicated by Ariflomachis the Destretle of Erribrea, after the had obtained the victory, and gotten the garland at the folemning of the fillmink games: Neither, have you any reason (quoth 1) to esteem Olympia, and the games thereof, with such admiration above the rest, as if it were another faral destiny immurable, and which cannot be changed nor admitalteration in the playes there exhibited as for the Pythian folemnity three or four extraordinary games it had, respective unto good letters and the Muses, adjoined and admitted to the reft: the Gymnick exercises and combats performed by men naked, as they were at first ordained, so they continued for the most part still, and hold on at this day; but at the Olympian games, all, fave only running in the race, were taken up afterwards, and counted as accessories: likewise, there have been many of them which at first were instituted, since put down and abolished; namely, xdhan, that is to fay, an exercise and seat of activity, when the concurrent mounted on horseback, in the midst of his course leapeth down to the ground, taketh his horse by the bridle, and runneth on foot with him a full gallop: as also another, called antion, which was a course with a chariot drawn by two mules: moreover, there is taken away now, the Coronet ordained for children that atchieved the victory in Pentathlus, that is to fay, five feveral feats : to be short, much innovation, change and altering there bath been in this festival solemnity, from the first institution; but I fear me, that you will call upon me again for new pledges and cautions, to prove and justifie my words, if I should say, that in old time at Pife, there were combats of sword-sencers, fighting at the sharp to the utterance, man to man, where they that were vanquished or yeelded themselves died for it; and if my memory failed me that I could not bring out mine author, and name him unto you; I doubt, you would laugh and make a game of mee, as if I had overdrunk my felte, and taken one cup to many.

THE THIRD QUESTION,

What is the cause that the Pitch tree is held consecrated unto Neptune and Bacchus: and that in the be- for the pine ginning the victors at the Ishmian games were crowned with a garland of Pine tree branches, but af - the word terwards with a chaplet of smallage or parsley, and now of late, with the foresaid Pitch tree?

There was a question propounded upon a time: Why the manner was to crowne those with in a pine or Pitch recebranches, who gained the prize at the Isthmick games? For so it was, that if all this be understood during the said section 1, Lucanius the High Priest made a supper at Corinth, at his own the piant houle, and feasted us: where Praxiteles the Geometrician, a great discourier cold us a Poetical tale, and namely; that the body of Melicerta was found cast up, and driven upon the body of a Pinetree, by the sea at a full tide; for that there was a place not far from Megara, named Cates Dromos, that is to fay, the race of the fair Lady swhereas the Megarians do report; that Dame Inc carrying heryong babe within her arms, ran and caft her felfe headlong into the fea: But it is a common received opinion (quoth he) that the Pine is appropriate for the making of Coronets, in the honour of Neptane: whereuponwhen as Lucanius the High Priest added moreover and faid: That the faid tree being conferrated unto Bacchies, it was no marvel nor abfurdity if it were dedicated also to the honour of Melicerta. Occasion was takento search into the cause; wherefore the ancients in old time theld the faid tree facred tinto Becelus and Neptune both? For mine ownpart, T faw no incongruity therein; for that these two gods be the Lords and Rulers over one general principle, or element, to wit, humidity or moissure, considering allo that they generally in manner all, sacrifice unto Neptune, under the turname sold and one would say, Protector of Plants; and unto Bacchais, liketune, under the luthame evialules, as one would lay, redected of realist and that Ducchus, ince-wife, by the name or addition Assistant, that is to say, the president over trees, and yet if may faid, that the Pine more particularly appertained unto Nepiune: not as Apulladorus is of consider because it is a tree that loveth to grow by the ser-fide, or for that it delighteth in the winder as the feadoth: (for some there be of this mind) but especially in this regard, that it affordeth good imber, and other fluff for building of hips: for both it, and also other trees, which for their affiliny may go for her fifters, to wir. Pytch trees, Lairk's trees, and Cone trees, furnish us with their wood; most proper to float upon the Sea, and with their Rohn also and Pitch, to calk and califet ; without which composition, be the joints never so good and close, they are to no purpose in the sea: as sor which composition, be the joints never so good and close, they are to no purpose in the sea: as sor which composition, be the joints never so good and close, they are to no purpose in the sea: unto wine: for look where these trees do naturally grow, the Vine there by report yeeldeth pleafant wine; which Theophrastus imputeth to the heat of the soile; for commonly the Pitch tree groweth in places of Marle, or white Clay, which by nature is hot, and so by consequence helpeth the concoction of wine; like as such kind of clay yeeldeth water, of all others most light and weer besides, if the same be blended with wheat. It maketh the greater heap, for that the heat thereof doth cause it to swell, and become more full and tender: more over the Vine receiveth many conmodicies and pleasures more from the Pirch tree, for that it, with those things which be, is good and necessary, both to commend and also to preserve wines ; for it is an ordinary thing with all men, to Pitch those vessels into which they put up their wines, yea; and some there be who put Rosin even into the wine: a sfor example, those of Enhau in Greece, and Italy, the inhabitants by the Possel and that which more is, from out of Gaule by Vienna, there is brought a certain Pitch-wine; called Pissels which the Romans set much flore by, because it given it not only a delectable scent, but also a better strength, taking from it a small time the newnesses and the watery substance there. of, by the means of a milde and kind heat. This being faid, there was an Orator there, a man of great reading, a fingular scholar, and an excellent humanitian, who cryed our in this manner: And is it so indeed? as who would say, it were not very lately, and but the otherday, that the Pine tree yeelded garlands and chaplets at the IRhmian games? for heretofore the victors there, were crowned with wreaths and coronets made of Smallach leaves: and this appeareth by that which wee may hear out of a certain Comedy, a covetous Miser speak in this wise:

These Isthmick games I gladly would part so, For price that Smallach wreaths in market go.

And Timeus the Historiographer writes that when the Corinthians, marched in battel array under the conduct of Timulton against the Carthaginians, for the defence of Sicily, they encounted in the way certain folk, who carried bunches of Smallach: now when many of the fouldiers took this occurrence for an ill preiage (because Smallach is tasken to be an unluchy herbinfomuch as when we see one lie extream fick, and indanger of death, we say: That he hath need of nothing else but Smallach) Timulcon willed them to be of good cheer, and put them in minde of the viscotions chaples of Smallach at the Isthmian games, wherewith the Corinthians crowned the winners: Moreover, the admiral Gally of King Antigonus was called Isthman, for that without any sowing of setting, there grew Smallach of it selse about the poup thereof: and this obscure and enigmatical Engigram under dark and covert words, significant plainly, earthen vessels stuffed and stopped with Smallach: and in this manner it gooth:

This Argine earth which ere while was full soft, Now baked hard with fire, the blood deep red Of Bacchus hides witzin, but loe aloft, It Ishmick branches bears in mouth and head

Cettes, they have not read thus much, who vaunt fo greatly of the Pitch tree chaplet, as if it were not a modern stranger and new commer, but the ancient, proper, and natural garland, belonging to the Ishmian games. Which words of his, moved they ounger fort not a slittle, as being delivered by a man who had seen and read much: and Lucanius the High Priest himselse, cashing his eye upon me, and smiling withal: Now by Neptune (quoth he) I sweat, what a deal of learning is here! howbeit, others there were, who bearing themselves (as it should feem) upon mine ignorance and want of reading, were perfwaded of the contrary, and avouched, that the Pitch tree branches were the ancient garlands in the Ishmick solemnity, as natural unto that country; and on the other side, the the coronet of Smallach was a meer (tranger, brought from Nemea thither upon an emulation, in regard of Herender, whereby it had indeed the name, for a time infomuch as it supplanted the other, and won the credit from it, as being counted a facted herb, and ordained for this purpose: but afterwards, the Pine garland four filed again and recovered the ancient reputation, foar this day it is in as great honour, as everit was, Hereupon I suffered my selfe to be perswarded, and gave so good ear, that many testimonies for confirmation of this, opinion I learned, yea, and some of them I bare awayand remembred: and namely, that out of them, Emphories the Poet, who spake of Meliceria, muchaster this manner:

The young man dead, they did bemaile. and then his corps they laid Upongreen branches of Pine tree, whereof the crowns were faid To have been made, those to adorne with honour glorious, Who at the Sacred Isthmick, games were deem'd victorious: For why? as yet the murdering band, fir Charon had not flain The fon of Neme, woful dame, whereas with stream amain Alopus runs: fince when, began the wreath of Smallach green, To bind the head of champions, all bravely to be feen.

Also out of Callimachus, who hath expressed this mattermore plainly, where he bringesth Hereitical in, speaking after this manner:

And it, shough much inferiout;
and more serve firial, Employ theipflat in Ilminch games, when in memorial
Of god Aggron they with crowns
the wittors brave do dack; According to Nemann rite;
and thereby give the check To chapters made of Pine tree fair;
where with the champion
For victory, some time was dight at games Corimbian.

Over and besides, if I be nordeceived, I have light upon a certain commentary of Procles writing of the sithmian solemnity: namely, that at the very sith institution thereof, ordained it was: That the victorious coroner thould be made of Pitch treebranches: but afterwards, when these games were accounted sacred, they translated thither from the Nemzan Solemnities, the chaplet of Smallach: now this Procles was one of the Scholars in the Academy, what time as Xemorgies taught and sours should be supported to the scholars in the Academy, what time as Xemorgies taught and sours should be supported to the scholars in the Academy.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What is the meaning of these words in Homer: Sweetley & niogist?

Some of the company where I supped upon a time, thought Achilles ridiculous, in that hee willed his friend Patroclus * to fill out purer wine, and lesse delayed, giving a reason withall, * For so he saying:

For now are come to visit me for love, My decrest friends, and whom I best approve.

But Nicerans the Macedonian, a familiar friend of ours, opposed himselfedirectly, and faid: That & Acepta, in this place of Homer, fignifieth nor meer. Wine of it self, without water, but hot Wine, as it the primitive word Coept, were derived and by Self Nicerans, that is to say, vital hear & ebullition: and therefore meet it was (quoth be) that (seeing his good friends were in place) there should be filled out for thom, a cup of fresh Wine, new drawn, and full of life and sparkling spirits: like as we our selves life to do, when as we pour our and offer unto the gods, our facred libations: but Softers the Poet, callingto mind, and alledging a sentence of Empedocles, whose words be these, speaking of the general muration of the universal world.

What thing before most simple was and pure, Became now * mixt by compound temp rature, faid: That the Philosophermeant by the word (very, as much as weed or, that is to say, well teme expected: Neither see I (quoth the) any thing to the contrary, but that Achilles might bid Paraelast OD dd

Now that Achilles otherwise of himselfe greatly loved not wine, for that he was by nature sowre and implacable, appeareth by these verses of the same Poet;

For gentle nature he had none, he was not soon appear'd,
But ireful, sierce, and violent, and once mov'd, hardly plear'd. And in one place, speaking liberally of himself, he said: That many nights he flept no wink, Of Sundry matters he did fothink.

Now who knoweth not, that short sleeps agree not to those that drink meer wine, neither will they serve their turn : allo when as he contested with Agamemnon, and revised him, at the first word he gave him the tearm anolders, Wine-bibber, or Drunkard; as if drunkennesse and wine-bibbing were the vice which his heart abhorred most: And therefore to conclude, considering all these circumsances, great reason he had, that seeing right honourable personages were come unto him, and those of good years, he should be well advised to take order, not to temper wine for them, as his manner was for himsels; because the same had been too small, and not agreeable for their per-

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

Of those who invite many guests to supper.

V Pon my return from Alexandria, all my friends one after another feafied me, for my welcome home: and to bear me company, they invited with me, as many as they thought, in regard of kindred or friendship, were any way toward me; in such sort, as by reason of the multitude of guelts, our meetings were ordinarily more tumultuous; and sooner dissolved then they had wont to be: the disorder therefore of string at such feasts, gave us occasion to discourse much of that matter, But Onesicrates the Physician when he feasted me in his turn, as others did; bade not very many, but those only whom he knew to be my special friends, and most familiar with me: whereupon I called to minde a fentence written by Plato, as touching a City, and thought with my felle, that it might very well be applied unto a feaft: for like as a City which fillgroweth and augmenteth, in the end becomes no more a City; for that there is a certain biguesse prefixed and limited unto it, which it must not out-grow: even so there is a just proportion in the greatnesse of a feast, within the which it is still a feast: but it it passes and exceed the same (Imean) in the number and multitude of guests, fo as they cannot falute and speak one to another conveniently, they have no meanes to cheere up and drink one to another reciprocally, nor exercise their mutual knowledge kindly: surely it is no more to be called a feast : for there should not be at a feast, as in a camp, messengers and curriers between; nor after the manner of a great gally, special servitors, going from one to another, to cheer them up, and bid them be merry; but the guelts ought to speak and talk one with another; for that a fealt must be disposed after the manner of a dance, so as he who fits lowest may hear him that is highest. After I had thus much said, my grandfather Lamprias began to speak, and that with fo loud a voice and so firong, that all the company might hear him: There is then (quoth he) a kinde of mean and moderation, whereof he had need, not only in eating and drinking at a feast, but also in the bidding and inviting of guetts; for furely there may be an excesse in unmeasurable courtese and humanity, when it cannot omit nor leave out any of those with whom a man heretofore hath feasted or made merry, but draweth all of them, as if the case were to go for to see a play, behold folemn lights, or to hear musick: and for mine own part, I think that the good man of the house, or master of a feast, is not so much worthy to be blamed or laughed at, for being at a fault of bread or drinkfor his guests; as when he hath not room enough to place them: of which he ought to make provision with the largest, not only for those who are formally invited, but also for comers in, and such as bid themselves: for strangers also that pass by : moreover, if there chance to be some want of bread or wine, the fault may be laid upon the servants, as if they had made it away, or played the theeves: but if there be no room left, it cannot chuse but be imputed to the negligence and indifferention of him who invited the guests: Hefiodus is wonderfully much commended for writing thus:

At first no doubt it was so cast, That there might be a Chaos vast.

For in the beginning of the world, requifite it was that there should be a void placefor to receive and comprehend all those things that were to be created: Not (quoth he) as my son yesterday made a supper, according to that which Anaxagoras said: All things were hudled and jumbled together pell-mell, confusedly: and admit that there be place and room enough, yea, and provision of meat sufficient, yet neverthelesse, a multitude would be avoided, as a thing that bringeth consuson, and which maketh a society unsociable, and a meeting unmeet and not affable: Certes, lesse harm it were; and more tolerable a great deal, to take from them who are bidden to our table, their Wine, then their Communication and fellow ship of talk; and therefore Theophrastus called (merrily) Barbars shops, dry banquets without wine; for the good talk that is between a number of perions sitting there one by another: but they who bring a fort together into one place, thrumbling them one upon another, deprive them of all conference, and discoursing reciprocally, or rather indeed they bring ir fo to paffe, that but very few can commune and converie together; for by that means they fort themselves apart, two by two, or three by three, for to have some talk: as for those who are set farther off, hardly they cannot discern, no nor know them, being distant and removed alunder, as a man would fay, the length of an horie race:

Some, where Achilles tents are pight close for to make their stay: And some, where Ajax quarter is, as far an other way.

Thus you shall see how some rich men hereby, otherwhile shew their foolish magnificence to no purpose, in building halls, and dining chambers, containing thirty tables a piece in them, yea, and fome of greater capacity then so: and verily this manner of preparation forto make suppers and dinners, is for folk that have no amity nor fociety one with another, when there is more need of some provost of a field to marshalthem, then an Usher of an hall to see good order among them: but these men may in some fort well be pardoned for doing so; because they think their riches no riches, but that it is blind, deaf, lame also, or shut up, that it cannot get forth, unlesseit have a number of witnesses, like as a Tragedy, many spectators: but as for us, this remedy we have of not affembling so many at once together; namely to bid often, and to make divers suppers, to invite (I say) our friends and well-willers at fundry times, by few at once, and to by this means we may make amends for all, and bring both ends together: for they that feaft but feldome, and as they fay & Leguar @, that is to fay, by the cart loads, are forced to put in the rollall those that any way belong unto them, either by kindred, friendship or acquaintance whatsoever: whereas they who ordinarily pick out three or four at a time, and do so oft, make their feasts, as it were, little barks, to discharge their great hulks, and the same to go light and nimble: moreover, when a man considereth continually with himselfe the cause why he inviteth his friends: it maketh him to observe a disference and choice in that great multitude of them: for like as for every occasion and businesse that we have, we affemble not all forts of people, but such only as bemeet for each purpole; for if we should have need of good counsel, we call for those who be wise: if we would have a matter pleaded, we send for eloquent Orators: if a voyage, or journey performed, we seek for such as will take up with short meales, and who have little else to do, and be best at leasure; even so in our invitations and feasts, we must have regard ever and anon to chuse those who are meet, and will fort well together: meet men I call these for example sake: if he be a Prince or great Potentate whom we invite to supper, the fittest persons to bear him company, be the head Officers, the Magistrates and principal men of the City, especially if they be friends, or already acquainted: it wemake a marriage supper, or a feast for the birth of a child, those would be bidden who are of kindred and affinity; and in one word, as many as are linked together by the bond of Jupiter Homoginos, that is to fay, the protector of confanguinity: and in all these feasts and solemnities, we ought evermore to have a careful eye to bring them together who are friends or well willers one to another: for when we facrifice unto fome one god, we make not our prayers to all others, although they be worshipped in the same Temples, and upon the same Altars; but if there be three cups or bowles brought full unto us, we pour libations out of the first to some, the second we offer to others, and the last we bestow likewise upon a third fort: for there is no envy abideth in the quire or dance of the gods: semblably, the dance and quire of friends is divine, insome fort, if so be a man know how to distribute and deal his courteste and kindnesse decently among them, and as it were to go round about with them all.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that guests at the beginning of a supper sit close together at the table, but afterwards

Hele words thus passed, and then immediately a new question was moved; namely, What the cause might be, that men commonly at the beginning of dinner or supper, sit at the table very straight and close, but toward the end more at large; whereas it should seem by all reason, that they should do clean contrary, for that then their bellies be full? Some of the company attributed this unto the form and positure of their bodies, as they sit; for that ordinary mensit to their meat, directly at their full breadth, groveling forward, and put their right hands straight forth upon the table; but after they have well supped, they turn themselves more to a side, and sit edge-wise, taking up no place now, according to the superficies of the body, not sitting (as a man would say) by the square, but rather by the line and the plumb : like as therefore the cockal-bones occupie lesse roome when they fall upon one of their sides, then if they be couched flat; even so every one of us at the first fitteth bending forward, and fronteth the table with his mouth and eyes directly uponit; but afterwards he changeth that form, from front to flank, and turneth fidelong to the board. Many there were who ascribed the reason of this, to the yeelding of the couch or bed, whereon mensit at their meat; for being pressed down with sitting, is stretched broader and wider, like as our shoes with wearing and going in them, grow more slack and ease for us by little and little, until in the end they be so large, that we may turn our feet in them. Then the good old man spakemerrily and said: That one and the same feast had always two Presidents and Governors disferent one from another: at the beginning hunger, which cannot skill of keeping any good order; toward the end, Bacchus, and him all men know very well, and confesse to have been a very sufficient captain, and an excellent leader of an Army: like as therefore Epaminordas (when as other Captains by their ignorance and unskilfulnessehad brought the Army of the Thebans into a place so narrow that all was thrust together, and the ranks and files came one upon another, and crushed themfelves) took upon him the place of a commander, and not onely delivered it out of those straights, but also reduced it into good order of battel; even so god Bacchus surnamed Lyaus, and Choreus, that is to fay, a deliverer, and master of dances, finding us at the beginning of supper thrusting one another, and having no elbow room, by reason of hunger that thrumbleth us to gether like a fort of dogs, bringeth us again into a decent order, whereby we fit at ease and liberty enough like good

Of those who are said to bewitch with their eye:

Here grew some question upon a time, at the table, as touching those who are reported to be eye biters, or to bewitch with their eyes; and when others (in manner all)passed it over with laughing, as a frivolous and ridiculous thing: Metrius Florus, who had invited us to his house, took the matter in hand, and faid: That the effects or events rather, which dayly we do observe, do make marrellous much to the brute and voice that goeth of the thing; but for want of yeelding a good reason thereof, and setting down the true cause, the report many times of such matters wanteth credit: But unjuttly (quoth he) and wrongfully in mine opinion; for an infinite number there be of other matters, that have a real effence, and are notoriously known to be so, although we are ignorant of their cause; and in one word, whosoever seeketh in each thing for a probable reason, overthrow-eth miracles and wonders in all; for where we faile to give reason of a cause, there begin we to doubt, and make queition, and that is as much to fay, as to play the Philosophers: so as we may in-fer consequently: They that discredit things admirable, do in some sort, take away and abolish all Philosophy: but we ought (quoth he) in such things as these, to search * Why they are so, by reafon: and learn * That they are so, by history and relation: for histories do report unto us many narrations of like examples. Thus we know, that there be men, who by looking wiftly and with fixed eyes upon little infants, do hurt them most of all, for that the habit and temperature of their bodies which is moist, tender, and weak, soon receiveth alteration by them, and changeth to the worse

whereas leffefubject they be to fuch accidents, when their bodies are better knit, most frong and compact. And yet Philarchus writeth in his History of a certain nation and people inhabiting the Realm of Pontus in times past, called Thybiens, who were by that means petitierous and deadly, not only to young babes, but also to men grown storlook how many either their eye, their breath or their speech could reach unto, they were sure to fall fick, and pine away: and this harm was felt and perceived (as it should seem) by Merchants, who resorted into those parts, and brought from thence, flaves to be fold. But as for these, the example peradventure is not so strange and wonderful, because the touching, contagion, and familiar conversing together, may yeeld a manifest reason and cause of such accidents; and like as the wings of other towles, if they belaid together with those of the Eagle, perish, consume, and come to nothing, for that the plume and down of the reathers fall off and putrifie: even fo, there is no reason to the contrary, but that the touching of a man should be partly good and profitable, and in part hurtful and prejudicial marry, that folk should take harm by being feen only, and looked on, is an accident which (as I faid before) we know, to be; but for that the cause thereof is so difficult and hard to be hunted out, the report of it is in credible: Howbeit (quoth I then) you winde the cause already; you have met (in some fort I say) with the tracts and footing thereof , and are in the very way of finding, it out, being come already to those defluxions that passe from the bodies; for the scent the voice, the speech and breath, be certain defluxions and streams (as it were) flowing from the bodies of living creatures, yea, and certain parcels thereof, which move and affect the fences, when as they suffer by the same, lightning and falling upon them: and much more probable it is, that such defluxions proceed from the bodies of living creatures, by the means of heat and motion; namely, when they be enchasted and fluxed; as also that the vital spirits then do beat flrongly, and the pulfes work apace, whereby the body being shaken, casteth from it continually, certain defluxions, as is before said and great likelihood there is also, that the same should passe from the eys, more then from any other conduit of the body: for the fight being a fense very livite, active and nimble, doth from any other conduit of the body. To the inglit ochiga near very swing active and a first that carrieth and fend forth and disperse from it, a wonderful fiery puissance, together with a spirit that carrieth and directeth it; in such fort, that a man by the means of this eye-fight, both suffereth and doth many directeth it; in such fort, that a man by the means of this eye-fight, both suffereth and doth many notable effects, yea, and receiveth by the objects which he feeth, no fmall pleafures or displeasures; for love (one of the greatest and most vehement passions of the mind) hath the source and original beginning at the Eye; infomuch, as he or she that is surprised therewith, dotheven resolve and melt with beholding the beauty of those persons whom they love, as if they would run and enter sear 78 into them : and therefore, a man may very well marvel at those, who confessing that we suffer and season. receive hurt by the eye, think it a strange matter to do harm by the same; for the very aspect and regard of fuch perions as are in the flower of their beauty, and that which passeth from their eyes, whether it be light or flowing off of the spirits, doth liquific and consume those who be enamous red on them, with a certain pleasure mingled with pain, which they themselves call Bitter-sweete for nothing so much are they wounded or affected, either by hearing or seeling, as by seeing and being feen so deep is the penetration, and so strong the inslammation by the eye which maketh me otherwhiles to think, that no experience and proof they have ever had what love is, who wonder at the Median Naphtha neer to Bab) lon, that it should burn and catch a stame, being a great way off from the fire: for even (0, the eyes of fair and beautiful creatures, kindle fire within the very hearts and foules of poor Lovers, yea, though they look not upon them but afar off: but we know full well, and have often feen the remedy of those who are troubled with the Jaundice; namely, that if they can have a fight of the bird . Charadrias, they are prefently cureds for this bird hath fuch a na . * Some ture and temperature, that it draweth to it felfe, and receiveth the maledy passing from the patient, take it for as it were a fluxion, and that by the conduit of the eyes; which is the reason that these birds are never willing to see a person who hath the Jaundice, neither can they endure so to do, but turn aside and avoid it all that ever they can, by closing their eyes together, not envying (as some think) the cure of that disease by them, but learing to be hurt and wounded themselves: and of all other maladies, it is well known, that they who converse with them whose eyes be inflamed and bleered, are foonest and most of all infected therewith, so quick a power and so ready, hath the fight to setupon another, and inflict the contagion of that infirmity. Then Patrocleus: True it is that you say (quoth he) in bodily passions and diseases but as for those which be more spiritual, and concerne the foul, among which I reckon this kind of witching, how can it be, and how is it possible, that the only cast and regard of the eye should transmit any noisance or hurt into the body of another? Why? know you not (quoth I) that the foul (according as it is disposed) doth likewise affect and alter the body? the very cogitation of Venus, cauleth the flesh to rife: the ardent heat in couragious mashiffs and band-dogs, which are put upon wild beafts for to encounter them when they are baired, dimmeth their eye-fight, and oftentimes makes them flark blind: forrow, avarice, and jealousie, alter the colour and complexion of the face, drie up the habit and conflitution of the body; and envy no lesse subtile then the rest, and piercing directly to the very soul, filleth the body also with an untoward and bad disposition, which painters lively do represent in those tables which contain the pi-ture of envies face: when as therefore they who be infected with envy, do cast their eyes upon others, which because they are seared neer unto the soul, do carch and draw unto them very easily this vice, and so shoot their venemous rates, like unro poisoned darts upon them: if such chance to be wounded and hurr thereby, whom they look upon, and wistly behold: I see no strange thing, nor a matter incredible: for verily the biting of dogs is much more hurtful and dangerous when they be angrythen otherwise; and the sperme or natural seed of mendoth sooner take effect, and is more apt for generation, when they meddle with women whome they love; and generally the paffions and affections of the foul, do fortifie and corrobarate the powers, and faculties of the body and hereupon it is, that those preservatives against witchcraft called a es sacra, are then thought to do good against envy, when the eye-fight of the envious person is withdrawn and turned awayby fome filthy and abfurd object, that it cannot make to strong an impression upon the patient whom he would hure: Lo seigniour Florus (quoth I) here is mine escot for our good cheer at this meeting in ready coin paid down upon the nail head: Well done (quoth Sociarus) but first before you ting; in ready coin part down agood and currant; for I affure you, there be some pieces that seem counterfeit; for if we suppose that to be a truth, which is commonly reported, as touching those who are thus be witched and eye-bitten; it is not I am sure unknown to you, that many are of opinion, that there be of their friends and kinsfolk, yea, and some of their fathers also, who carry about them witching eyes; in such fort as their very wives will not so much as shew unto them their own babes, nor fuffer such to look upon them any while together: how then should this effeet of witchery proceed from envy? Nay, what will you fay to thole (I pray you) who are named for to eye-bite and bewitch their own felves? You have heard I am fure thus much; or at least wife yo u have read this Epigram:

Fair was sometime Eustelidas, His face and hair full lovely was; But see, one thay when needs be would (Unhoppy man) himselfe behold. In viver streams that softly ran, His beauty, then ho soon began Soto admire; that forency Erwitch's hewate by his owneye; Andfell anon by mulady,

To pine away and foto dy. For it is reported of this Entelidas, that looking upon himselfe in the river water, he was so far in love with his own beauty, and so deeply affected with the sight thereof, that he fellick, and so both beauty and the good plight of his body went away at once: but fee now what shift you can make to salve theie absurdities? or what answer you will devise to avoid them? As for that (quoth he) I shall do it at some other time sofficiently: but now drinking thus as you seeme, out of so great and large a boule, I dare be bold to averre, and that confidently, that all perturbations and passions of the mind, if they fettle and continue long in the foul, do ingenerate therein evil habitudes, and these after they have in processe of time gotten the strength and become another nature upon every fmall occasion, are stirred, and oftentimes drive men perforce, and even against their wills to those familiar and accultomed passions: for do but mark timorous and searful cowards, how they be affrighted even with such things as be safe, and do preserve them: cholerick persons are angry many times, and fall out with their best friends: lascivious wantons cannot contain, but in the end they will offer abuse and villary to the most holy and sacred bodies that be: for custome hatha wonderful power to conduct and carry the habitunto that vicewhich is familiar unto it; and look who is apt to take a fall, will stumble at every small hob that lies in the way: and therefore it is not a matter to make a wonder of, if they who have gotten in themselves habit of envy, and bewitching, be incited and moved according to the particular property of their passion, even against those who are most dear note them; and being once moved and stirred, they do not that which they will themfelves, but that whereunto they are so inclined and disposed : for like as a round bowle or ballrunneth like it selse: and semblably a roller or cylender, moveth as a roller or cylender, both of them after the different figure thereof: even so, who soever they be that have thus contracted an habitude of this eye-biting envy, their disposition moveth and driveth them enviously upon all things: howbeit it carrieth a great likelihood that they should hurt them, who are most familiar unto them, and best beloved then any other: and therefore that good Entelidas and all other such as he, who are faid to charm and bewitch themselves, incurre this hard extremity, not without great appearance of teason: for as Hippocrates saith in his Aphorisms: The good habit or plight when it is at the height is dangerous: and bodies when they are come to the highest point, they cannot hold and fland to, but prefently must incline and bend to the contrary : when as men therefore are grown suddenly all at once and see themselves in a better state then they hoped for; insomuch as they wonder and behold themselves with admiration, then be sure the body is neer unto some change, and then being carried according to their habitude to the worle, they bewitch themselves: and this is wrought the rather, by means of those fluxions which rest upon waters, looking-glasses, or any fuch mirrors by way of repercussion: for that they rebound back, and breath as it were againe upon those who look in them, so, that the hurt and dammage which they have done to others, lighteth upon themselves: this haply befalling many times to little children, doth impute (though fally and unjuftly) the cause to these that look upon them, When I had finished my speech, Caius the fon in law of Florus, began to speak in this wise: Why then belike the images that Democritus speaketh of are of no reckoning nor account, no more then the Idols of Agina and Megara, as the proverb goes: for this Philosopher faith: That there go forth certain images out of the eyes of envious persons, and those not altogether without a kinde of sense and inclination, but rather full of their malice and envious witchery who send them forth with which, when the said images coing to serve, and the sense who are envied, they trouble and offend the body, soul, and understanding: for this I take to be the meaning of that great Philosopher, and that he hard enderstanding: for this I take to be the meaning of that great Philosopher, and that he hard enderstanding: for this I take to be the meaning of that great Philosopher, and that he hard enderstanding: for this I take to be the meaning of that I have taken nothing from those dequent I) but I marvel much, how you perceived not that I have taken nothing from those defluxions, but only life and will; which I did, for fear left if now (being far within night, and very start). I had talked of (prirts, idols, and apparitions, having sense and understanding, I should have but you into some fright, and scared you with them: and therefore, if you think it so good, let unstelled and put off the consideration of these things until to morrow morning.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that the Poet Homer called the Apple tree, and have good, that is to say, bearing fruit and Empedocles named Apples, wisone, that is to say, stourishing.

A Swe were merry together at a least one day, in our City Charonta, we were served with all sorts of fruits in great abundance: by occasion whereof, it took one of the company in his head to pronounce these verses out of Homer:

σῦκαι τε γλυκεξαὶ κὶ μηλέαι ἀγλαόκας τοι, — Καὶ ἐλαΐαι Τηλεθόωται.

That is to say:
The sweet Fig trees and Apple trees, that bear a fruit so fair, whereupon arose some question, why the Poet gave unto Apple trees the attribute of bearing faire whereupon arose some question, why the Poet gave unto Apple trees the attribute of bearing faire fruit? and Tryphon verily the Physician, answered; That it might be spoken of the said tree, by way of compartion; which being but small to speak of, and making as little shew, bringeth forth so fair, of compartion; which being but small to speak of, and making as little shew, bringeth forth so fair, of compartion; which being but small to see the same in any other fruits covered with a rinde, of all parts in and every respect, he could not see the same in any other fruits covered with a rinde, of all parts in and see the said to see the same in any other fruits covered with a rinde, of all singuished the said to said the said so the said to said the said so the said to said the said said to said the said to the eye, as lovely; so as contenting thus as it doth, all the sense in unto, most delectable; and to the eye, as lovely; so as contenting thus as it doth, all the sense in an anner, by good right it is so praised and commended. We liked well of this discourse, and said, it was sufficient to solve the question. But whereas Empedocles hath written thus;

ävekev ο Liyovoite σίδαι κή τα έρφλοια μέλα ο Why Pomgrana es folate do grow

Anne rappies ven a nevers journ I understand well (said I) this Epithet & Liyeves, given unto of des that is to say, Pomgranates, because And Apples bear a lovely show? the fruit commeth norto maturity or ripenesse, until it be about the end of Autumn, when as now the extream heats be decayed and gone; for their moniture, fo thin, feeble and waterish as it is, the fun will not fuffer it to thicken, or grow to any confiftence, unlesse the air begin to change and incline unto coldnesse; and therefore Theophrassus faith, that it is the only recethat doth ripen and concoet her fruit, best and soonest, in the shade. But I doubt in what sense this, wise Philosophicall Poer gireth this addition of integrated unto apples? confidering that the manis not wont to imbelift and adorn the matters and things whereof he treateth, with the gayeft and most glorious adjectives, as with fresh and lively colours, to enrich and beautifie his stile, or to set out his verses for there is not an Epither that he uleth, but ferves for to represent and express either the substance, or elle some faculty and vertue of the thing. Thus he calleth our body enting the soul, x80 as derived on the faculty and vertue of the thing. Thus he calleth our body enting the soul, x80 as derived on the second of the secon doubt to question, there were certain Grammarians in place, who said: That Empelsecies called Apples, (πέρρλημα, in regard of their vigor: for Poets by this Verb φλοιών, understand thus much: namely, to be grown apace to the vigor, flower, and full flrength. THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that the Fig tree, being of all other trees most butter and sharp in taste, yeeldesh a fruit most sweet?

A Fter this, demanded it was, why the fig, so fat and sweet a fruit as it is, groweth upon a tree most bitter? for the very leaf of a fig tree by the reason of the afperity and roughnesse that it hath, is called Thrion, and the word is full of juice; fo that when it burneth, you shall see it cast up nath, is cauce I briom, and the rest a land when it is burnt, the affies make a Leie very fitrong, and marvel-lous deterfive, because of the acrimony and sharppesse thereof: yea, and (that which is most ad-mitable) whereas all other trees and plants clad with leaves and bearing fruit, put forth a flower before, only the fig tree never shewed blossom : and if it be true which is moreover said ; that it is never blasted, or smitten with lightning, a man may attribute and ascribe it to the bitternesse and evil habitude of the flock; for it fhould feem that lightning and thunder never touch any fuch things, no more then the skin of a sea-casse, or of the beast Hyana, Here the good old man (our grandfire) taking occasion to speak, said : No marvel then, if all the sweetnesse be found in the fruit, the rest of the tree be harsh and bitter: for like as when the cholerick humour is cast into the bag or bladder of the gall, the proper substance of the liverit selfe remaineth very sweet, even so the fig tree having sent all the sweetnesse and farnesse it had into the fruit, remaineth it selfe dissumished of it; for that within the trunk of the faid tree there is otherwise some sweetnesse and good juice, though it be but a little; I make an argument from the herb Rue: which they say, If it grow under or neer a figge tree, becometh more pleasant in smell, and in raste more mild, by receiving and enjoying some fmall sweetnesse from it; whereby that excessive, strong and odious quality of Rue is abated and extinct; unlesse peradventure a man will reason clean contrary, and say, that the fig tree drawing somewhat from Rue, for the own nurture, taketh from that herb some part of the bitternesse and acrimony thereof.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Who be they who according to the common proverb, are faid, weel and xai vulusou, that is to fay, about the falt and cumin ? and so by the way, why the Poet Homet named salt drovne.

Lorss asked us one day when we were at supper in his house, who they were whom we teamed by an usual by-word, to be about the salt and cumin: Appliaphanes the Grammarian, one of our company, solved the question readily in this manner: They (quoth he) who are such friends and so samiliar that they sup together, with salt and cumin, are meant by this common speech, But then we moved a new question, namely: How it came to passe, that salt was so highly honoured? for that Homer directly saith:

And then anon when this was done, He strewed salt divine upon.

And Plave affirmeth, that the body and inbitance of falt by mans laws, is most facred and holy: The difficulty of this question he enforced still, and augmented the more; for that the Egyptian Priests who live chaste, abstaine altogether from salt, infomuch as their very bread which they eat is not seasoned with salt: And if it were (quoth he) so divine and holy, why have they it in sogreat detestation? Then Florus willed us to let the Egyptians goe with their superstitious sashions; and to alledge somewhat of the Greeks as touching this subject argument: Whereupon I began and said: That the Egyptians themselves were not herein contrary to the Greeks: for the sanctimony and profession of chastiry, sorbiddeth procreation of children, laughing, wine, and such things; which otherwise be good, and not bee rejected: and as for salt, haply those who have vowed to live a chaste and pure life, do forbear it, for that by the heat which it hath, (as some think) it provoketh those who use it, unto lechery: and probable it is besides, that such votaties do resule salt, because of all other means, it is most delicate; and a man may well say: That it is the visual of visuads, and the sance as it were to season all others: and therefore some there be who attribute unto these falts, the very tearm of Charites or the Graces; for that they make that which is necessary for our food, to be pleasant and acceptable untous: Shall we say then (quoth Florm) that falt was called Divine in this respect? And if we did to (quoth I) we have no slender reason to induce us thereunto: for men are wont to attribute a kind of divinity unto things which are passing common, and the commodity whereof reacheth far (as for example) to water, light, and the seasons of the year: as for the earth, her above the relt, they repute not only divine, but also to be a goddeffe: and there is none of all these things rehearted, that talt giveth place unto one jot, in regard of nse and profit : being, as it is, a fortification to our meats within the body, and that which commendeth them unto our appetite: but yet confider moreover, if this be not a divine property that it hath, namely, to preserve and keep dead bodies free from putrifaction a long while, and by that means torefift death in some fort, for that it suffereth not a mortal body wholly to perish, and come to nothing; but like as the foul being the most divinepart of us, is that which maintainethall the rest alive, and suffereth not the masseand substance of the body to be dissolved, and suffer colliquation: even so, the nature of salt, taking hold ofdead bodies, and imitating herein the action of the soule, preserveth the same, holding and staying them that they run not headlong to corruption, giving unto all the parts an amity, accord and agreement one with the other: and therefore it was elegantly faid by some of the Stoicks: That the flesh of an hog was even from the beginning no better then a dead carrion, but that life being diffused within it, as if fact were strewed throughout, kept it sweet, and so preserved it for to last long. Moreover you see that we esseem lightning, or the firethat commeth by thunder, celeftial and divine, for that those bodies which have been imitten therewith, are observed by us to continue a great while unputrified and without corruption: What marvel is it then if our ancients have effeemed falt divine, having the same vertue and nature, that this divine and celestialfire bath? Here I trayed my speech and kept filence. With that, Philinus followed on and pursued the same argument : And what think you (quoth he) is not that to be held divine, which is generative, and hath power to ingender, considering that God is thought to be the original author, creator, and father of all things? I avowed no lesse, and said it was to: And it is (quoth he) an opinion generally received, that falt availeth not a little in the matter of generation, as you your selfe touched ere-while, speaking of Egyptian Priests: they also, who keep and nourish dogs for the race, when they see them dull to perform that act, and to do their kind, do excite and awaken their lust and vertue generative, that lieth (as it were) affeep, by giving them as well as other hot meats, falt flesh, and fish both, that hath lien in brine and pickle: all othore ships and vessels at sea, which ordinarily are fraight with fair, breed commonly an infinite number of Mice and Rass i for that (as fome hold) the Females. or Does of that kind, by licking of fair only, will conceive and be bagged without the company of the Males of Bix ks · but more probable it is, that fait intefle doth procure a certain itching in the natural parts of living creatures, and by that means provoketh Males and Females both, to couple together: and peradventure this may be the reason that the beauty of a Woman which is not dull and unlovely, but full of favour, attractive, and able to move concupilcence, men use to name αλμυρον ε δειμο, that is to say, saltish, or well seasoned: And I suppose that the Poets have fained Venus to have been engendered of the sea, not without some reason; and that this tale, that she should come of salt, was devised for the nonce, to signific and make known under those covert terms, that there is in salt a generative power: Certes, this is an ordinary and general thing among those Poets, to make all the sea-gods, fathers of many children, and very full of issue, To conclude, you shall not find any land creature, or flying fowle, for fruitfulnesse, comparable to any kind of fishes bred in the sea; which no doubt this verse of Empedocles had respect unto:

Leading a troop, which senselesse were and rude, Even of Sea-fish, a breeding multitude,

The Proeme.

Lato being minded to draw Timotheus the son of Conon (O Soffius Sinecio) from sumptuous feafts and inperfluous banquers, which grear Caprains commonly make, invited him one day to a supper in the Academy, which was Philosophical indeed and frugal, where the table was not furnished with those viands which might distemper the body with severous heats and inflammations, as Ion the Poet was wont to fay: but fuch a supper, I say, upon which ordinarily there follow kind and quiet sleeps, such fancies also, and imaginations as ingender sew dreams, and those short; and in one word, where the sleeps do testifie a great calmnesse and tranquillity of the body. The morrow after, Timotheus perceiving the difference between these suppers and the other. faid: That they who supped with Plate over night, found the pleasure and comfort thereof the next day: and to fay a truth, a great help and ready means to a pleafant and bleffed life, is the good temperature of the body, not drenched in wine, nor loaden with viands, but light, nimble, and ready, without any fear or distrust to perform all actions and sunctions of the day time, But there was anothe commodity no leffe then this, which they had who supped with Plato, namely, the discussion and handling of good and learned questions, which were held at the table in supper time: for the remembrance of the pleasures in eating and drinking, is illiberal and unbefeeming men of worth, transcript of the pleasures in eating and drinking, is illiberal and unbefeeming men of worth, transcript of the pleasures in eating and drinking, is illiberal and unbefeeming men of worth, transcript of the pleasures in eating and drinking, is illiberal and unbefeeming men of worth, transcript of the pleasures in eating and drinking, is illiberal and unbefeeming men of worth, transcript of the pleasures in eating and drinking, is illiberal and unbefeeming men of worth, transcript of the pleasures in eating and drinking. fitory befides, and foon at an end-like unto the odour of a perfume and sweet oyntment, of the smell of roalt in a Kitchin a day after: whereas discourses Philosophical, and disputations of learning. when they be remembred afterwards, yeeld alwayes new pleasure and fresh delight unro those that were at them, yea, and cause them who were absent and left our, in hearing the relation thereof, to have no less part of learning and erudition, then they who were present: for thus we see, that even at this day, fludents and professors of learning, have the fruition, and enjoy the benefit of Socrates his banquets, no lesse then they themselves who were personally present, and had their real part of his banquets, no lette then they themhelves who were pertonany precupation that their real part of them at the time: and verily, if corporal matter, as dainly diffus and exquitite fare, had foo greatly affected and delighted their minds with pleasure: Plato and Xempkon should have put down in writing, and let unto us the memorial, not of the discourse stere helds not of the talk which then paterial, but rather of the furniture of the table, and have made a note of the delicate viands, pathy feed, but rather of the furniture of the table, and have made a note of the delicate viands, pathy works, comfitures and junckets ferved up in Callias or Agathus houses: whereas now of all such mattets there is no mention at all, as if they were of no account, nor worth the naming, norwithflanding very like it is, there was no want of provision, no spare of cost, nor delect of diligence in that behalfe: but on the other side penned the y have most exactly, and with great diligence the discourfes of good letters and Philosophy, which then and there passed merrily; and those they have commended unto posterities, to give his example, that we ought not only to devile and reason together when we are at the board, but associated mind afterwards, what good talk had passed, and to keep the fame in memory. THE FIRST QUESTION.

What is the reason, that those who be fasting are more thirst then hungry.

Now send I unto you Sossius Senecio, this fixth book of Banquet discouries; whereof the first questionis: Why those who be long fasting, are more thirsty then hungry? for it may seem contrary unto all reason; that thirst rather then hunger should ensue much fasting; for that the want of dry food, would feem by course of nature to require a supply of nutriment by the like. Then began I in this manner to argue, before the company there in place: That of all things within us, and whereof we confift, our natural heat either alone or principally, had need of nurture and maintenance: for thus verily we do observe in outward elements, that neither aire, water, nor earth, defire nutriment; neither do they consume whatsoever is neer unto them; but it is fire only that requireth the one, and doth the other; which is the reason that all young folk doe eat more then elder persons; for that they be hotter; yea, and old men and women can endure to sath better, because their natural heat is already decayed and seeble in them; like as it is in those living creatures which have but little blood: for small need have they of nurture, for default of natural heat, Moreover, thus much we may observe in every one of our selves, that our bodily exercises, our loud outcries and such like matters, as by motion do augment heat, make us to take more pleasure in our meat, and to have a better appetite to eat: now the principal, most familiar and natural food of meat, and to nave a verter apetite to ear. In the the physical particles, that for mine opinion, is motifure, as we may fee by daily experience, that borning flames of fire ancrease by pouring oyl thereto; and of all things in the world, after are the drieft, because the whole humidity is burn up and confumed: but the terrestrial substance destinate of all liquor, remaineth alone: semblably, the nature of fire is to separate and divide bodies, by taking away the moisture which held them sodered and bound together; when as therefore wee fast long, our natural heat draweth forcibly unto it: first, all the humours out of the reliques of our nourishment: which done, the inflammation thereof paffeth farther, and fetteth upon the very radical humour within our flesh, searching every corner for moisture to feed and nourish it: there being caused therefore a wonderful drinesse in our body, like as in earth or clay that is parched with heat; our flesh by consequence commeth to stand more in need of drink then of meat, until such time as wee have taken a good draught; by means whereof our heat being well retreshed and sortisted, worketh and procureth appetite to solid and dry nourishment.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether it be mant of food that causeth hunger and thirst, or rather the transformation and clauge of the conduits and possages within our bodies?

His discourse being thus ended, Philo the Physician went about to impugne and overthrow the first position; maintaining, that thirst proceeded not from default of any nourishment, but was to be imputed unto the change of the form in certain passages of the body: and for demonwas to commend to the one fide this experience: That they who be athirft in the night, fration hereof, he alledged of the one fide this experience: That they who be athirft in the night, friely deep upon it, lole their thirttineffe, although they drink never a drop: on the other tide, this they who have the Ague, if their fit decline, or be off them, or in cale the Feaver be cleane this they who have the Ague, if their fit decline, or be off them, or in cale the Feaver be cleane patt and gone; prefently they are eased of their drought : likewite there be many, who after they have been bathed; yea, and be:eeveme, others when they have vomitted, arerid of thirftinesse: and yet they get moithure neither by the one nor the other; but they are the pores and petty conduits of the body that fuffer mutation, because they be altered and transformed into another state and disposition; and this appeareth more evidently in hunger; for many fick folk there be, who at one time have need of nourishment, and yet want appetite to their meatisome there are again, who let them eat and fill themselves never so much, have never the less appetite to meat, nay, their greedy hunger encreaseth the more femblably, you shall have many of those who loathed their meat, to recover their stomach and appetite quickly, by talting a few Olives or Capers, condite with falc pickle: whereby it appeareth plainly; that hunger is not occasioned by default of nourishment, but through the said alteration or passion of the pores and conduits of the body: for surely such means as thoie, although they diminish the want of nourishment, by addition of more food, yet nevertheleffe canfe hunger; and even so the poinant acrimony of these salt viands, contenting the taste and pleasant to the mouth, by knitting, binding, and frengthning the flomach; or contratiwile, by relaxing, or opening the same, do procure unto it, and breed therein a certain gnawing, and a difposition to the liking of their meat, which we call appetite. The reason of these arguments seemed unto me very wittily devised, and framed prettily, for to carry a good shew of probability; howbeit, to be contrary unto the principal end of nature, to which the appetite doth lead and conduct every living creature, destrous to supply that which is wanting, to fill that which is empty, and purfuing alwayes that which is meet for it and familiar, but yet defectious: for to fay, that the thing wherein principally a living (reature differeth from a liveleffe body, was not given unto usfor the tuition, maintenance and preservation of our health and safety, even as it were of our eyes that beso proper and familiar to the body, and to fear such occurrents as be adverse thereto; but to thinkthat the same is onely a passion, change, and alteration of the pores occasioned according as the same be made either bigger or smaller; is (to speak plainly) the fashion and part of thosewho make no reckoning at all of nature. Moreover, to confesse, that to quake for cold, hapneth unto our body for want of heat familiar and natural unto it, and with one breath to deny, that hunger and thirst proceed not from defect of moisture and nourishment, is very absurd : and yet, more unreasonable and monstrous it were to affirm, that nature desireth evacuation, when shee feeleth her felfe charged with fulveffe, and withal, hath a defire to repletion: not because she findeth her selfe over-empty, but upon some other passion comming I know not how, nor which way, Certes, these needs and repletions in the bodies of living creatures, resemble properly the accidents that fall out in agriculture and husbandry: for the earth suffereth many such defects, and requireth as many helps and remedies: against drought, we seek to moisten by watering: for burning with hear, to coole moderately : when things are frozen, to hear them again, and keep them warm, by laying (as it were) many coverings over: and look what is not in our power to doe, we pray unto the gods forto help and furnish us therewith: namely, sweet and mild dews, pleasant and comfortable windes: fo that nature always feeketh supply of that which is defective, for to preserve her flate and temperature. And in my conceit, this word 7000, which fignifieth nourishment seemeth to import as much as Thesiv The geory, that is to fay, preferving nature : and preferved it is in plants verily, and trees infenfibly (as Empedocles (aid) by the air about them, when they are refriended and watered thereby in convenient manner, as need requireth: but as for us, our appetite cauleth us to feek and procure that, for default wherof, we have not our kind temperature. But let us confider better, each one of those reasons by it self, which have been delivered, and how untrue they ber for first and formost, those viands which have a quick, sharp, and pleasing taste, by reason of their actimony, procure no appetite at all in those parts, which be capable of nurture, but only a certain biring or gnawing in them, much like unto that itching, when something is applyed unto the skin, that doth pluck and fret it: and say that this passion or affection (what soever it is) procureth appeting, it standeth to great reason, that by such sharp and quick viands, those matters which causeth subsets, comming to be attenuated and made more subtile; are discussed, dissolved, and so dissipated as they ought to be; by which means, confequently there followeth a want and defect; not for that the Poets and paffages be altered or changed into another form, but rather, because they be now void ded, clear, and purged: confidering that those juices which be frame, eager, quick, piecing; and falcish, by attenuating and making tender the matter that they meet with and work upon, do diff cuffe, diferegate and scatter the same, in such sort, as they ingender and procure a new appetite. To come now unto those who seep upon their thirstinesse, they be not the Pores which by their transformation allay thirst, but by reason that they receive humidity from the fleshy patts, and are filled with a vaporous moisture from thence: and as for vomits, in casting up one thing which is ad-with a vaporous moisture from thence: and as for vomits, in casting up one thing which is ad-verse to manure, they give her means to enjoy another which is friendly and familiar thereto; for thirst is not a defire to much of an exceeding great quantity of moisture, as of that which is kind and familiar; and therefore, although a man have within him great abundance of that moistire which is unnatural, yet neverthelesse, he wanteth still; for that his thirst given place to no other humidity, but unto that which is proper and natural, and whereofit is desirous: neither commeth mans body into a good temper again, before fuch time as that humidity be removed and gone, which was enemy to nature: and then the ways and passages receive willingly that moisture which is friendly and samilar unto her: as to the Ague beforesald, it driveth indeed the moisture inwardly into the center (as it were) of the body; for when the middle thereof is all on a fire, thither numeth and retireth all the humidity, where it is thrust together and retained; and by reason that there is such fore thereof, pressed and pent in, it falleth out often-times, that many being sick of the Ague, do call and vomit it up, for to be discharged thereof, and being exceeding thirtly with all, for want of moillure, and for the drynesse that is in other parts of the body, which call for humidity: when as then the lever either declineth or hath intermission, so as the ardent heat within is gone from those interiour parts in the center and middle of the body, the moisture returneth again into the outward habit, it spreadeth (I say) and is dispersed thorowout, according to the natural course thereof 1 60 as at once it bringeth ease to the parts within, and withal canseth the flesh and skin without, to be imooth, foir and moift, whereas before it was rough, hard and dry; yea, and many times it moveth (weats; whereby it commeth to patie, that the want which before caused thirst, now cealeth and is gone, while the moisture is returned from the place wherein before it was firaightly prefied and kept in, unto that which is defirous and harn need of it, and where it is at large, and more at liand appt in, unto the ast in an orchard or gettlen; although there be a pir containing plenty of water, un-beffer an andraw fome out of it, and therewith water the ground, it cannot chuse but the beibs, plants and trees will be as one would fay, athirft, and at a fault for nourithment even fo it fareth in out bodies; if all the moithire be gotten to one place, no marvel if the reft do want & become exce-ding die, until fuch time as it run again, and that there be a new diffusion thereof; like as it fallets out with those who are fick of an Ague, when the fit is past, or the seaver hath left them, and to those who sleep upon thirst : for in these, sleep bringerh back the moisture from the center and middle of the body, distributing it to all the members and parts thereof, and so maketh an equal distribution and supply thorowout.

But this transformation and change of the Pores from which it is faid that hunger and thirst doth proceed: what kind of thing is it I would gladly know? For mine own part, none other differences see I, but of more and lesse, and according as they be eitherstopped or opened: when they be obstructed or stopped, receive they cannot either drink or meat: when they be opened and unstopped, they make a void and free place; and surely that is nothing esse but the want of that which is proper and natural: For the reason (my good friend Philo) why cloarls which are to be dyed, be dipped fift in Allom water, is because that such water hath a piercing, scouring, and abstersive vertue, by means wereof, when all the superstoods slith in them is contained and rid away, the pores being opened, retain more surely the tindure which is given unto the cloaths, onely because they reteive the same better, by reason of the emptinesse occasioned by want.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the cause that when men be hungry of they drink, are delivered from their hunger-but contrarinises, when they be a thirst, if they eat, are more thirsty then before?

Then those discourses were thus passed: he who invited us to supper, began in this wise:

It seemeth unto me (my masters) that this reasonas touching the voidance and repletion of pores, carrieth with it a great affectance of truth; and namely, in the solution of another question besides, to wit: Why in them who be hungry, if they drink, their hunger cealeth immediately? and contrativate, they who are a third, if they eat, are still more thirdly? I am of opinion (quoth hee) that those who alledge and nige these pores and their effects, doe render the reason and cause of this accident, veryeastly, and with exceeding great probability; however in many points, they enforce the same not so much as probably: for whethers all bodies have pores, some of one measure, and symmetry, others of another: those which be larger then the rest, receive food folid as well as liquid both together: such as been airrower and more straight admit drink: the avoidance and evacuation of which, causeth chieft, like as of the other, hunger: and therefore if they who be a shift.

athird do eat, they find no fuccour and benefit thereby, because the pores by reason of their streightnesse, are not able to receive dry and solid nutriment, but continue still indigent and destitute of that which is their due, and fit for them: whereas they who be hungry, in case they drink find comfort thereby, for that the liquid nouriture entring into those large pores, and filling those concavities of theirs, do slake and diminish mightily the sorce of their hunger.

As touching the event and effest (quoth I) true it is (as I thinke) but I cannot accord and give my content to the supposition of the cause pretended: For if (quoth I) a man should hold, that with theie pores and conduits (upon which fome stand to much), so greatly embrace and maintaine so shouly) the slesh is pierced, and by meanes thereof sull of holes; jurely he would make it very loofe, quavering, flaggy, and so rotten, that it would not hang together: moreover, to say that the same parts of the body do not receive meat and drinke together, but that they do passe and run (as it were) thorough a strainer or canvale bolter, some one way, and some another; methinks is a very strange position, and a meere devised siction: for this very mixture of humidity, tempering and making tender the meats received, together with the co-operative help of the inward naturall hear, and the spirits, doth cut, subtiliate, and mince the food with all manner of incisions, shreddings, and divisions, no tooles, no knives, nor instruments in the world so fine and small; insomuch as every part and parcell of the faid nourishment is familiar, meet and convenient for each part and member of the body; not applied and fitted as it were to certaine veffels and holes to be filled thereby; but united and perfectly concorporate to the whole, and every part thereof; but if this were not fo, yet the maine point of the question is not assoiled for all that; for they who eat, unless they also drinke toit, are so far off from allaying their thirst, that contrariwise they encrease the same; and to this point there is not yet a word faid. Confider now (faid I) whether the politions and reasons which we fee down, are not probable and apparent? First we suppose, that most ture being consumed by dinnesse is cleane perished and gone; and that drinesse being tempered and sustained by most ture hath certaine diffusions, and exhalations; secondly we hold that neither hunger is a generall and univerfall want of dry food, nor thirst, of moisture, but a certaine scant nesse and defect of the one and the other, when there is not enough and sufficient; for those who altogether do want the same, be neither hungry nor thirfly, but die presently: Let these supposals be laid for grounds, it will not be from henceforth hard, to know the cause of that which is in question: for thirst increaseth upon them that eate, because meats by their drinesse do gather together, suck and drinke up the humidity disperfed, and which is left but small and feeble, in all the body, causing the same to evaporate away; like as we may observe without our bodies, how dry earth and dust do quickly snatch, dispatch, and consume quite the liquor or moisture that is mingled therewith: contrariwile, drinke necessarily flacketh hunger; for by reason that moisture drenching and soaking that little meat which it findeth dry and hard, raiseth from it certaine vapours and moist exhalations, and those it doth elevate and carry up into all the body, applying the same to the parts that stand in need: and therefore Erafistratus not unproperly tearmed moisture, the wagon of the viands: for being mixed and tempered with such things as otherwise of themselves by reason of their drinesse or other evill disposition, beidle, and heavy, it raiseth and lifteth up: and hereupon it commeth, that many men who have been exceeding hungry, only by bathing or washing themselves, without any drinke attall, have wonderfully assumed and allaied their hunger: for the mossiture from without, entring into the body, cauleth them to be more succulent and in better plight; for that it doth enlarge the parts within, so that it doth mitigate the fell mood, and appeale the cruell rage of hunger. To conclude, this is the teason that they who are determined to pine themselves to death byutter abstinence from all folid meats, live and continue a long time if they receive but water only, even untill the time that all be quite evaporate, spent and dried up, which might nourish and be united unto

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that pit or well-water being drawn, if it be less all night within the aire of the pit's becommeth colder than it was?

VVE had a certaine guest who lived delicately, and loved to drinke cold water; for to please and foler in the content whose appetite, our fervants drew up a bucket of water out of the pit or well, and foler in thang within the same (fo that it rouched not the top of the water) all the night long; wherewith he was served the morrow after at his supper, & he found it robe much colder than that which was newly drawn: now this stranger, being a prosessed for hold and inferently well learned, told us, that he had found this in Arisfasteamong other points, grounded upon good reason, which he delivered unto us in this write: All water (quoth he) which is first heat, becommeth afterwards more cold than it was before is like to that which is provided and prepared for Kings; first, stey set it on the freuntil it boile again: which done, they bury the pan or vessell wherein it is within show; and by this device it proves exceeding cold: no otherwise than our bodies, after that we have been in the flough or boines, be cooled much more by that meanes: for relaxation occasioned by heat, maketh the body more rare, and causeth the pores to open, and lo by consequence it receiveth more aire from withour, which environesh the body, and bringeth a more fudden and violent changes; the set of the providence of the set of the providence of the consequence it receiveth more aire from withour, which environesh the body, and bringeth a more sudden and violent changes; when as therefore water is first chafed (as it were) and fet in an heat by agitation and stirring within the bucket whiles it was in drawing, it growesh to be the colder by the aire which invironesh the said vessell round about. This stranger and guest of ours we commended for his consider resolution and perfect memory ib ut as touching the reasons that he alledged, we made some doubt: for little aire in which the vessell hangeth be cold, how doth it inchafe the water? and if it be hot, how cooleth it afterwards? for beside all reason it is, that a thing should be affected or suffer contraily from one and the same cause, unlesse some difference come between. And when the other held his from one and the same cause, unlesse some say againe: Why (quoth 1) there is no doubt to be made of the aire; for our very sense seach us, that cold it is, and especially that which is in the bottome of pits; and therefore impossible it is, that watershould be heat by the cold aire; but the truth is this rather, although this cold aire cannot alter all the water of the spring in the bottome of the well, yet if a man draw the same in a little quantity, it will do the deed, and be so much predominant as to coole it exceedingly.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the reasonth at little stones and small plates or pellets of lead, being cast into water, make it calder?

TOu remember I am fure (do you not ? faid I) what Ariftotle hath written, as touching pibble flones and flints, which if they be cast into water cause the same to be much colder and more astringent: And you remember (quoth he) as well, that the Philosopher in his Problemes hath only faid it is fo ; but let us affay to find out the cause, for it seemeth very difficult to be conceived and imagined: you say true indeed (quoth I;) and a marvell it were if we could hit upon it: howbeit, marke and confider what I will lay unto it: First to begin withall, do you not thinke that water is fooner made cold by the aire without, if the same may come to enter into it? also, that the aire is of moreforce and efficacy, when it beateth against hard flints, pibbles, or whethones? for they will not suffer it to paffe thorow, as vessels either of brasse or earth; but by their compact folidity, refifting and standing out against it, they put it by from themselves, and turn it upon the water; wherebythe coldnesse may be the stronger, and the water thorowout be fully affected therewith: and this is the reason, that in Winter-time running rivers be much colder than the sea; for that the cold aire hath greater power upon them, as being driven back agains from the bottome of the water; whereas in the fea it is diffolved, and paffeth away, by reason of the great depth thereof encountring there nothing at all, upon which it may ftrike and beat : but it feemeth there is another reason, that waters, the thinner and clearer they be, fuffer the more from the cold aire; for fooner they be changed and overcome, so weake and feeble they are: now hard whetstones and little pibbles do subtiliate and make the water more thin in drawing to the bottome where they be, all the groffe and terrefriall substance that trouble it; in such fort, as the water by that meanes, being more fine, and consequently weaker, sooner is vanquished and surmounted by the refrigeration of the aire. To come now unto lead: cold of nature it is, and if it be foaked in vineger, and wrought with it, maketh ceruse of all deadly postons the coldest. As for the stones aforesaid, by reason of their solidity, they have an inward coldnesse conceived deeply within them; for as every stone is a peece of earth gathered together and congealed (as it were) by exceeding cold, so the more compact and massie that it is, the harder is it congealed, and confequently, so much the colder: no marvell therefore it is, if both plummets of lead and these little hard pibbles aforesaid, by repercussion from themselves, inforce the coldnesse of the water.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is the reason : hat men use to keep snow within chaffe, light straw, and cloaths.

Ponthese words, that stranger and guest of ours, after he had paused a while: Lovers (quoth he) above all things, are destrous to talke with their paramours; or if they cannot so yet at leastwise they will be talking of them; and even so it fareth at this time between me and snow; for, because there is none here in place, nor to be had, I will speake of it; and namely, I would gladly know the reason why it is wont to be kept in such things as be very hot; for we uleto cover and swaddle it (as it were) with straw and chastle, yea, and to lap it within soft cloaths, unflorner sugs, and shape frize, and so preserve it a long time in the own kind, without running to water: A wonderfull matter, that the hortest things should preserve those which are extreame cold! And so will I say too (quoth I) if that were true: but it is far otherwise, and we greatly deceive our selves in raking that by and by to be hortst selfe which doth hear another; and namely, confidering that we our selves use to say, that one and the selfe-same garment in Winter keeps us warme, and in Summer cooleth us; like as that nurse in the tragedy, which gave suck unto Niobes children:

With mantles course, and little blanquets worne She warms and cools her pretty babes, new borne.

The Almaigns verily put on garments only for to defend their bodies against the rigour of cold: the Æthiopians weare them not, but to fave themselves from fultry heat: we in Greece use them for the one purpose and the other; and therefore why should we count them to be hot, because they warme us, rather than cold, for that they coole us? yet of the twaine, if we would be judged by the outward lense, we might repute them rather cold than hot : for when we put on our shirts or inner garments first, our naked skin finds them cold; and so when we go into our beds, we feele the fheets and other cloaths of themselves as cold; but afterwards they help to heat us; but how? being themselves sull of hear, which commeth from us, they hold in our hear, and withall keep off the cold aire from our bodies. Thus you see how they that be sick of the ague, or otherwise, burne with hear, change continually their linnens and other cloaths about them, because ever as any fresh thing is laid upon them they feele it cold and take comfort therein; no sooner isit cast over them, and lien a while but it becommeth hot, by reason of the ardent heat of their bodies: like as therefore a garment being warmed once by us doth warme us againe; even so, if it be made cold by fnow it keepeth it cold reciprocally; but made cold it is by fnow, for that there ariseth from it a subtile spirit, or vapour which doth it; and the same so long as it abideth within, holdeth it together concrete and folid in the own nature; contrariwile, when it is gone, inow melterhand turneth to water; then that white fresh colour vanisheth away, which came by the mixture of the said spirit and humidity together, causing a kind of froth: when as snow therefore is lapped within cloaths, both the cold is held in thereby, and the outward aire kept out, that it cannot enter in to thaw and melt the lubstance of the low thus gathered and congealed together; now to this purpole they use such cloaths as have not yet come under the fullers hand, nor been dressed, burled, shorne, and pressed; and that for the length and drinesse of the shag haire and slocks, which will not suffer the cloath to lie heavy and pressed own the snow, and crush it being so spungious and light as it is: and even so the straw and chasse, lying lightly upon it, and softly touching it, breaketh not the congealed substance thereof; and otherwise besides, the same lieth close and last together. whereby it is a cause that neither the coldnesse of the snow within can breath forth nor the heat of the aire without enter in. To conclude, that the excretion and issuing out of that spirit, is the thing that causeth the snow to fore-give, to fret, and to melt in the end, is apparant to our outward senses, for that the frow when it thaweth engendreth wind.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Whether wine is to run thorough a strainer before it be drunke?

I feet, one of our Citizens, left the schooles, having conversed but a small while with a most ex-cellent and renowned Philosopher; yet, so long as in that time he hadnot learned any good thing at his hands, but stollen from him, ere he was aware, that, whereby he was offensive and odious unto others; and namely, this bad custome he had gotten of his Master, boldly to reprove and correct in all things those who were in his company: when as therefore we were upon a time with Ariston in his house at supper together, he found fault generally with all the provision, as being too fumptuous, curious, and superfluous; and among other things, he flatly denied, That wine ought to passe through a strainer before it be powred forth and filled to the table; but he said, It should be drunke as it came out of the tun, as Hefiodus laid, whiles it hath the firength and natural force, and as nature hath given it unto us; for this manner of depuration and clarifying of it by a strainer first doth enervate and cut as it were the finews of the vigour and vertue, yea, and quench the native heat that it hath; for it cannot chuse but the same will exhale, evaporate, and flie away with the spirit and life thereof, being so often filled and powred out of one vessell into another: Againe (quoth he) it bewrayeth a certaine curiofity, delicaty, and waitefull wantonnesse thus to consume and ipend the good and profitable for that which is pleasant only and delectable: for like as to curcocks for to make them capons, or to geld fowes and make them gualts that their flesh may be tender dainty, and (against the nature of it) effeminate, was never surely the invention of men, sound in judgement, and of honest behaviour, but of wastfull gluttons, and such as were given over to belly cheere; even so verily they that thus straine wine, do geld it, they cut the spurs and pare the nailes thereof; if I may be allowed to to speake by way of Metaphor, yea, and do effeminate the same; whiles they are not able either to beare it by reason of their infirmity and weaknesse, nor drinke it in measure, as they should because of their intemperance: but surely this is a sophisticall device of theirs, and an artificiall trick to help them for to drinke more, and excule them for powring it down to merrily; for by this meanes the force of wine they take away, leaving nothing but bare wine; much like unto those who give water boyled unto fick and weake folke, who cannot endure to drinke it cold, and yet beyond measure desire it; for the very edge of wine they take off, and looke what strength and vertue was init, the same they rid away and expell quite: this in so doing they marre it for ever: this may be a sufficient argument, that wine thus minsed will not last nor continue long in the own nature, but turne quickly to be very dregs - it ioseth (I say) the verdure thereof prelently, as if it were cut by the root from the owne mother, which are the lees thereof. Certes, in old time they were wont directly to call wine it felfe, Triya, that is to fay, Lees: like as we use to tearme a man by a diminutive speech, a soule or an head, giving unto him Eee 2 the denomination of those principall parts only; and even at this day we expresse the gathering of vine truit, by the verbe rewar. Also in one place Homer called wine Auturior, and as for wine it jelfe, it was an ordinary thing with him, to call it αιθοπα και έρυθροι, that is to 1ay, blackifh and red, not pale and wan, by often straining and cleanfing, such as Ariston here serveth us with thereat rea, not pair and wan, by otter that so my good friend (quoth he) not pale, bloudlesse, and discoloured : but that which at the very first sight sheweth it selfepleasant, mild, and lovely, whereas you would have us to ingurgitate and drench our felves with a wine as black as the night, thick, groffe, and duskift, like a darke cloud: the clarifying and purification thereof you condemn, which in truth is nothing else but the casting up as it were by vomit of all the choler that it had, and the discharging it of that which is heavy, heady, in it, able to make men fick and drunken, to the end that being nore light, cheerefull, and leffe cholerick, it might go into our bodies for to be intermingled with more light, cheerefull, and leffe cholerick, it might go into our bodies for to be intermingled with us, even furth as Homer faith, those worthies and demi-gods, at the war of Trop, used to drinke: for Homer when he named wine aldona, meant not blackish and thick, but transparent, neat, and bright; for having before attributed unto braffe these epithites, iunio, and wifel, that is to say, meet for men, and resplendent, he would not have called it who atterwards, it he had meant black and duskish by that attribute. Like as therefore the sage Anacharsis, when he reproved some other fashions among the Greeks, commended yet their char-coales, for that leaving the smoake without doores, they brought the fire into the houle; even to you my mafters, that are wife men and great (cholars, may haply blame us in other respects, if you lift: but in case when we have rejected and dispatched away that which was turbulent, cholerick, and furious in wine, we make it then looke cleare, and tafte pleasant of it selfe, without any sophistication; if we do not (Ifay) turne or take off the edge quite, and grind out all the fleele (as it were) but rather foorring away rust and canker, furbush; and glaze it, and so present it unto you for to drinke; what hainous fault (I pray you) have we committed? But you will say (for sooth) it hath more strength in it when it is not thus clarified with straining: and io (by your leave, good fir) hath a trantick, lunatick, and mad man, when he is in his fits; but after that he is well purged with Ellebor, or by good regiment in diet, brought to be staied, and reduced into his right mind and senses againe, by good regiment in diet, brought to be trated, and reduced into instigutining and rentes againe, that violent and extraordinary force is gone, but the true naturall fittength of his own, and his feled temperature remaine (till in his body, together with his right wits; even fo this cleaning and clarifying of wine, by ridding away that headineffe which troubleth the braine, and caufeth rage. bringeth it to a mild habite and whollome constitution. Certes, for mine own part, I hold there is a great differen e between affected curiofity, and simple neathers or elegancy : for those women that paint themselves, perfume and besmeere their bodies with costly odours, and balmes, or otherwise gitter in their ornaments of gold, and go in their rich purple robes, are by good right thought to be curious costly, and wanton dames; but if a woman use the bath, wash her skin, annoint her selse with ordinary oyle, yea, and weare the tresses of her own haire, disposed and laid in order decently. no man will find fault with her for it. This diffinction in womens dreffing and attire, the Poet Homer hath elegantly and properly expressed in the person of Juno, when she diesed and trimmed her selfe, in this wise:

Wah pure Ambrofiafirft, her corps Immortall from all foile And filth she cleans'd, then it she did Annoint with glibber oile.

Thus far forth, there is nothing to be feen in her, but carefull diligence and matron-like cleanlinesse; mary when she comes to carquans, chaines, borders, and buttons of gold, when she hangs on her pendant earerings most curiously and artificially wrought, and not staying there, proceeds in the end to take in her hand that enchanting tiflue and girdle of Venus; beleeve me, here was superfluous sumptuosity, here was vanity and wantonnesse indeed, not beseeming a wife or dame of honour; semblably, they that colour their wine with the sweet wood of aloe or cinamon, and otherwife give it a tincture and pleasant aromatization with saffron, do even as much as those who curioufly trick up and fet out a woman, for to bring her to a banquet, and to profitute her as a currizan; whereas they that do no more but purge out of it the groffe filthinefle, and that which is good for nothing, make it by that meanes pure, whollome, and medicinable: for otherwife, if you admit not this, you may as well fay, that all things that you fee here is nothing but needleffe inperfluity, and affected curiofity, beginning even at the very house and the surniture thereof for why is it (will you fay) thus pargetted and laid over with a coat of plaister? why is it open and built with windows on that side especially where it may receive the purest aire and freshest winds, or where it may enjoy the light of the fun tending Westward toward his setting? why are these pots and drinking cups. every one of them rubbed and scoured on every side, so neat and cleane that they glitter and shine againe, so as a man may see himselse in them? And ought (good fir) these boules and goblets to be kept cleane without all filth, or sweet vvithout evill sent; and must the wine vvhich vve drinke out of them be full of filthy dregs, or otherwise stained with any ordure and corruption but what need I run thorows all the rest? the very workmanship and painfull labour about the wheat whereof our bread here is made, what is it else (I beseech you, but cleaning and purging) see you not what a do there is about it before it be brought to this passe? for there must be not only threshing, fauning, vvinnovving, riddling, grinding, sifting, serting, and boulting out the bran from the flowre, while it is in the nature of corn and meale; but also it requiret hto be knead and wrought, that no roughnesse remaine behind in the dough; so that being thus united and concorporate into a lumpe of patte, it may be made bread fit for our eating: what abfurdity then is there in this, if straining and cleansing of wine riddeth it from that feculent & dreggy matter, as if it were course brans, or grosse grounds, especially seeing the doing of it, is not any wise chargeable nor laborious?

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What is the cause of that extraordinary hunger called Buniu@?

Here is a folemne facrifice used among us, received by tradition from our ancestors, which the provost or chiefe governour of the Ciry for the rime had no provost or chiefe governour of the Ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the ciry for the rime had no provost or the rim provost or chiefe governour of the City for the time being, performeth at the publike altar, but other private Citizens besides in their own houses: and this solemnity is called, The banishment of Bulimos, that is to fay, of hunger or famine: and the manner is at luch a time, for every Matter of an house to take one of his slaves, and when he hath swinged him well with twigs of the withy called Chast-tree, to thrust him out of the doores by the head and shoulders, saying withall: Out with * Bulimos, but come in wealth and health. Now that yeare wherein I was provoft, many there * Thuriston with business and completion with fact the feaft; and after we had performed all ceremonies and completing and femine ments thereto belonging, and were fet at the table, some question there was moved, first, as touching: it seemeth by the vocable it felte garing, what it should fignifie, and afterwards of the words uttered unto the fallowith flave when he is driven out; but most of all, of that malady so called, and of the accidents and cir-tuarthey pu cumstances thereof. As for the tearme Bulimos, everyman in manner was of opinion, that it betokened a great and publike famine, but especially we Greeks: of Lossa, who in our dialect use the most open letter of the for the form of the family open letter of the form of the form of the family open letter of the form of the family open letter of mos, that is to fay, a great famine, or a generall famine thorowont the City, and it leemed unto us, "p.forb. that Bubroftis was another thing different from it; and namely, by a found argument which we had from the Chronicles penned by Metrodorus, as touching the acts of Ionia, wherein thus much he writeth: That the Smyrneans who in old time were Aolians, ule to facrifice unto Bubroftis, a black bull, as an holocaust or burnt offering, which they cut into peeces with the hide, and so burne it all together. But forasmuch as all manner of hunger resembleth a maladie (and principally, this called β κίμ () which commeth upon a man when his body is affected with some unkind and unnaturall indipolition, it seemeth that by great reason, as they oppose wealth to poverty, so they set health against sicknesse: and like as the heaving and overturning of the stomack, a disease when as men are faid Nauriar, took that name first upon occasion of those who are in a ship, and when they saile or row, fall to be stomack sick, and are apt to cast: but afterwards by custome of speech, who sever feele the like passion of the stomack, and a disposition to vomit, are said pauria, that is to say, to be fea-fick; even fo the verbe βέλλμιαν, and the noune βελίμ@, taking the beginning as is beforefaid. there, is come unto us, and fignifieth a dogs-app. tite or extraordinary hunger. And to this purpose we all spake, and made a contribution as it were of all our reasons, to make out a common supper or collation: but when we came to touch the cause of this disease; the first doubt that arose among us was this, that they should most be surprized with this malady who travell in great snows: like as Brutus did of late daies; who when he marched with his army from Dyrrhashium to Apollonia, was in danger of his life, by occasion of this infirmity: it was a time when the snow lay very deep sin which march he went fuch a pace, that none of those who had the carriage of victuals overtook him, or came neer unto him : now when as he fainted fo for feebleneffe of ftomack, that he now swooned, and was ready to give up the ghost; the souldiers were forced to run in haste unto the walls of the City, and to call for a loafe of bread unto their very enemies, warding and keeping the watch upon the walls, which when they had prefendy gotten, therewith they recovered Brusse; whereupon afterwards, when he was master of the Town, he grievously intreated all the inhabitants for the curtefie which he had received from thence. This disease hapneth likewise to horses and affes, especially when they have either figs or apples a load: but that which of all the rest is most wonderfull, there is no manner of food or fullenance in the world, that in such a case so soon recovereth the strength, not of men only, but of labouring beasts also, as to give them bread. So that if they eate a morsell thereof, be it never so little, they will presently find their seet, and be able to walke.

Hereupon enfued filence for a while; and then I (knowing well enough how much the arguments of ancient writers are able to content and fatisfie such as are but dull and flow of conceit; butcontratiwise unto those that be studious, ripe of wit, and diligent, the same make an overture and give courage and heart to search and inquire surther into the truth) called to mind and delivered before them all a fentence out of Ariftotle, who affirmeth, That the stronger the cold is without, the more is the heat within our bodies, and so consequently causeth the greater colliquation of the humours in the interiour parts. Now if these humours thus resolved take a course unto the legs, they cause lasfitudes and heavinesse; if the rheume fall upon the principall fountaines and organs of motion and respiration, it bringeth faintings and feeblenesse. I had no sooner faid, but as it is wont in such cafes to fall out, some tooke in hand to oppugne these reasons, and others againe to defend and maintaine the same: and Sociariu, for his part: The words (quoth he) in the beginning of your speech were very well placed, and the ground surely laid; for intruth the bodies of those who walke in inow are evidently cold without, and exceedingly cloted fall and knit together; but that the inward hear occasioned thereby, should make such a colliquation of humours, and that the same the invalue least the and friends in the principal parts and infriments of religiration is a bold and rath conceit, and I cannot fee how it should than You rather would I thinke that the hear being thus kept in, and united together, and so by that meanes fortified, consumeth all the nourishment; which being frenty it cannot chuse but the saidhear also must needs languish even as a fire without fewell: and hereupon it is, that fuch have an exceeding hunger upon them, and when they have eaten never so little, they come presently to the mielves agains; for that food is the maintenance of naturall heat: Then Cleomenes the Physician: This word wude, that is to fay, hunger (quoth he) in the comwound feeling, fignifieth nothing elfe, but is crept into the composition of it I know not how, without any realon at all; like as in the verbe grainty, which betokeneth to devour, or swallow downe folid meat, wire, that is to lay, to drinke, hath no lense or congruity at all; no morethan wille. tions meat, and, the second of feemeth not unto me to be any hunger, as many have taken it; but icis a pathonof the itomack, which concurring indeed with hunger engendereth a fainting of the heart, and an aptreffer of woon and even as odours and (incls do fetch agains and help those that be in a lwoone; so bread doth remedy and recover those who are feeble and faint, by this Bulimia, porfor that such have need of fuflenance; (tor let it be never fo little that they take, they are revived and refreshed thereby) bur because it fatcheth the spirits againe, and recalleth the power and strength of nature that was going away. Now that this Bulimas or Bulimia, is a faint neffe of the heart, and no hunger at all, appeareth evidently by an accident that we observe in those draught-beasts, whereof we spake before, subject to this infirmity; for the smell of figs and apples worketh not in them any defect or want of nourishment; but causeth rather a gnawing in the mouth of the may, a plucking (I iay) and concortion in the brim of the stomack. As for me, on the other side, although I thought these reasons indifferently well alledged; yet I was of opinion, that if I went another way to worke, and argued from a contrary principle, I could maintaine a probability, and uphold, that all this might proceed raa contrary principle. Account management of the first of breath that patient from the flow in manner of tipbrile aire, is the most citting-edge, and fined decision or scale, comming from the concretion of that mergor or congested substance, which I wor not how, is of so keen and pirting a nature, that it will firske thorough, nor flesh only, but veffels also of filver and braffe: for we see that they are not able to containe and hold snow in them, but when it commeth to melt, it consumeth away, and covereth the outfide of fuch veffels, glazed over with a most subtile mousture, as cleere as yee, which no doubt the faid spirit, breath, aire, or edge, (call it what you will) left behind ir, when it passed through those insensible pores of the said vessels; this spirit then thus penetrative and quick as a flame, when it imiteth upon their bodies who go in inow, feemeth to fcorch and finge the superficial outside of the skin, in cutting and making way thorough into the shelf in manner of fire; whereupon esset a great rarefaction of the body, by meanes whereof, the inward hear flying forth, meeteth with the cold spirit or aire without in the superficies which doth extinguish and quench it quite, and thereby yeeldeth a kind of small sweat or dew, standing with drops upon the outfide, and so the naturall firength of the body is resolved and consumed : now it a man at such a time fir not, but relt fill, there is not much naturall heat of the body that passeth thus away; but when motion by walking or otherwise, doth quickly turne the nutriment of the body into heat, and withall the laid heat flieth outward thorough the skin thus rarified; how can it other vile be, but all at once there should ensue a great ecclipie (4s it vvere) and generall defect of the natural povvers? And that true it is that the fame doth not alwaies close knit and bind together the body out otherwise melt and ratifie the same at appeareth manifelly by this experience: that in the spea and nipping vvinters, many times plates or plummets of lead are known to Ivveat and melt: this observation alfo, that many do fall into this infirmity called Enlimia, vvho are not hungry, doth argue rather a defluxion and dilatation, than a conflipation of the body; which no doubt in Winter is rarified by that subtilty of the spirit, vvhereof I spake, and especially, vvhen travell and stirring doth sharpenand subtiliate the heat within the body: for being thus made thin, and wearied besides, it flieth forth in great abundance, and so is dispersed thorovyout the body. As for those figs and apples, it is like that they do exhale and evaporate such a spirit, and doth subtiliate and dissipate the natural hear of labouring heafts that carry them: for it standeth by good reason in nature, that as some be revived and refreshed with one thing, and some with another; so contrarivise, some things do difsipate the spirits in one, and others in another.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

Why she Paet Homes to other liquors giveth proper epithites and attributes, and oyle only he calleth mails?

THere was a great question also another time: What might the reason be, that there being so many liquors as there are, the Poet Hemm is wont to adopte every one of them with their fere-feverall and proper epithits, and namely, to call milks, white; honey, yellow; and wine, red; but oyle alone he ordinarily noteth by an accident common unto them all, and rearmeth it moil? co which this answer was made: That as a thing is named, Most sweet, which is altogether sweet; and most white, which is altogether white; (now you must understand, that a thing is said to be fuch and fuch altogether, when there is nothing mixed with it of a contrary name I even fo we areto call that moit, which hath not one jot of directle mingled smoog; and furth amplity doth properly agree unto oyle: for first and formost, the polished smoothnesse that it hath, doth shew that the parts thereof be all uniforme and even throughout; and fell it wherefoever you will, you fhall find it equall in every relped, and one part accordeth with another to, as the whole agreeth to withfland both mixture and cold: befides, to the eye-fight at yeldeth, a most pure and cleare mirfor to behold the face in ; for why? there is no roughpessenor suggestinesse in it, to diffinate the reflerion of the light; but by reason of the humidity or moisture thereof all the light (how little foeverit be) doth rebound and returne againe upon the fight : whereas contrarivile, milke alone; of all other liquors, fendeth back none of thele images and refemblances, like as a mirror or looking. plate doth, for that it hath a great deale of terreflatall fibitance in it i moreover, of all liquid matters oyle only maketh the leaft notife when it is flitted or thaken, for that it is for moift throughout; whereas in other liquors, the parts which be hard and earthy in running, flowing, and moving, doencounrer, finite and hit one another, and fo confequently make a noile, by reason of their weight and solidity and that which more is, it remaineth simple of it selfe, without admitting any mixture or composition with any other liquor whatspever, for that it is so firme, compact, or fast; and good reason, for it hath no wandring holes here and there, between terrence and hard parts, which might receive any other substance within: moreover, all theparts of oile, for that they be so like one unto the other in a continued union, do joyne pating well together, however they will not fort with other liquors; and by reason of this tennity and continuity, when oyle doth froath or fome, it sufferest no wind or spirit to enter in: furthermore, this humidity of oyle is the cause that it feedeth and nourisheth fire, for maintained it is with nothing that is not moist, and this is the only liquor that may be burned, as we may fee evidently in the wood which we thaily burne; namely, that the airy fiblitance therein, flieth up in fimake; that which is retrestriall, surneth into ashes; and there is nothing but that which is moilt or liquid, that flameth out, burneth light, and is confumed cleanes for why? fire hath no other sustenance to seed upon; and therefore, water, wine, and other liquors, fland much upon a feculent, muddy and earthly matter, which is the cause that if a mando cate them upon a fire or flame, by their afperity, they difgregate, and by their weight, cheake and cuench it; but oyle, (for that most properly and since ely it is moist, and by reasonalso that it is so subtile) soone receiveth alteration, and being overcome by the fire, is quickly inflamed: but the greatest argument to prove the moissure of oile, is this, that a little thereof will spread and go a great way; for neither honey, nor water, nor any other liquid thing what lovet, in it final a quantity can be dilated and drawn fo far as oile; but for the most part they are spent and gone by occasion of their ficcity: and verily, oyle being to pliable and ready to be drawn every way, foft also and glib, is apt to run all over the body, when it is announced, it flowerh and spreadeth a great way, by meanes of the humidity of all parts which are formovable, in such fort, as it commutes a long time, and hardly will be rid away, it slicketh and cleaveth so fast for a garment, if it be dipped and drenched all over in water, will foon he dry againe; but the spots and staines with oile require no fmall ado to be scoured out and cleansed, for that it taketh so deep an impression; and all because it is so fine, subtile, and exceeding moilt: and Aristatle himselfe faith, that even wine also being delaied with water, if it be gotten into a cloath, is hardly fetched out, for that now it is more subtile than before, and pierceth farther within the pores thereof.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Whit is the cause that the flesh of beasts killed for sacrifice, if it be hung upon a sig-tree, becommeth more tender within a while?

A siffor had a cook commended highly by those who used to sup with his Master, soft singular skill in his art; and namely, for that amongst all other viands which he handled, and dressed passing well, he served up a, cook unto the table before us, newly killed and sarrisced unto Heroute; the stellawhereof did eare as short and tender as if he had hung by the heeles a day or two before: and when Arishn sid that it was an ease matter so to do; and that there needed no more but presently when his throat was cut to hang him upon a sig-tree, voe took occasion thereby to searchinto the cause of this effect: Certes, that there passes here, the that goeth of a bull, who if he be tied to a signetice, how wild, savage, and fell soeves he was before, will soon he meek and quiet, abide to be handled, and in one voord, lay down his surious rage, as if it were cleane daunced; But the principal cause hereof was attributed to the actimony and sharpe quality of the voods, for the tree is more successed with the surious and the least-be all sail of injures; also whiles it burneth in the fire, there ariseth from it a bitter to bring sincake, very surfished to the eyes; and when it is burnet, there is made of the assessment of the surse, which which be all fignes of heat and moreover, whereas the milky juyce of the fig-tree will cause milke to turne and curdle, (some say) it is not by the inequality of the figures of milke, which are comprehended and glewed as it were therewith, namely, when the united and round parts thereof are call up to the superficies, but for that the foresaid juyce by meanes of heat, doth resolve the water substance of the liquor, which is not apreto gather considence and be thickned: moreover, this is another figue thereof, that notwithstanding the juyce be infome fort sweet, yet it is good for nothing, and maketh the worst and most unpleasant drinke in the world; for it is not the inequality thereof, that causeth the smooth parts to gather a curd, but the heat which maketh the cold and cruddy parts to coagulate. A good proofe of this we have from falt, which serveth to this purpose, trindy parts to to guide. A good post-becamle it for but it impeacheth this interlacing and glutinous binding pretended; for that by na-ture it doth rather dissolve and unbind. To come againe therefore unto the question in hand; the figtree sendeth from it a sharpe piercing and incisive spirit: and this is it that doth make tender, and as the were concost the flesh of the said foule: and as great an effect thould one fee, if he had pur him in a heap of wheat or inch corne, or covered him all over with salt nitre; and all by reason of heat: and that this is true that wheat is hot, may be gathered by the vessels full of wine, which are hidden within a heap of wheat ; for a man shall soon find that the wine will be all gone.

The Seventh Book

Of Symposiaques, or Banquet-Discourses.

He Romans have commonly in their mouths, O Soffius Senecio, the speech of a pleasant conceited manand a curteous, who oever he was, who when he had supped alone at any time, was wont thus to say: Eaten I have this day, but not supped: shewing thereby, that meales would never be without mirth and good company, to leafon the fame, and to give a pleasant taste unto the viands. Euenus verily used to say. That fire was the best sauce in the world: and as for falt, Homer calleth it divine; and most men gave it the name of the Graces; for that being mingled or otherwise taken with most of our meats, it gives a kind of grace, and commendeth them as pleasant and agreeable to the stomack. But to say a truth, the most divine sauce of a table or a supper is the presence of a friend, a familiar, and one whom a man knoweth well; not so much for that he eateth and drinketh with us, but rather because as he is partaker of our speeches, so he doth participate his own unto us, especially if in such reciprocall talkethere be any good discourses, and those which be profitable, fit, and pertinent to the purpose; for much babling indeed and lavish speech that many men use at the board, and in their caps, bewrayeth their vaine folly, driving them oftentimes into inconfiderate and passionate fits, and to perverse lewdnesse; and therefore no lesse requifite it is, and needfull, to make choice of speeches, than of friends to be admitted to our table: and in this case we ought both to thinke, and also to say, contrary unto the ancient Lacedæmonians; who when they received any young man or stranger into their guild-halls, called Phiditia, where they used to dine and sup in publike together, would shew unto them the doores of the place, and fay: Out at these there never goeth word: but we acquainting our selves with good words, and pertinent speeches at the table in our discourses, are willing and content that the same should go forth all, and be fet abroad to all perions what soever; for that the matters and arguments of our talk are void of lateivious wantonnesse, without backbiting, slandering, malice, and illiberall fourtility, not beseeming men of good education: as a man may well judge by these examples following in the Decade of this seventh book,

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Against those who reprove Plato, for saying: That our drinke passeth by the lungs.

Thapped one day in fummer time, that one of the company where I was at supper came out with this verie of Alcan, which every man hath readily in his mouth, and pronounced it with a loud τέγγε πλεύμονας δινώ, το γας άς χον πεςιτελαίεται.

That is to lay: Now drinke and wet thy lungs with wine, For why? the hot Dog-ft ar doth shine.

No marvell(quoth Nicias) then (a Phylician of the City Nicopolis :) if a Poet as Alcaus was, were ignorant in that which Plato a great Philosopher knew not: and yet Alcaus in some fort may be borne out in faying so, and relieved in this wife; namely that the lungs being so neere as they are unto the Homack, enjoy the benefit of the liquid drinke, and therefore it was not improperly faid, That they be wet and soaked therewith: but this famous Philosopher by expresse words hath lett in writing, that our drinke directly passeth for the most part thorow the lungs: so that he hath given us no meanes of any probability in the world, to excuse and defend him, would we never so faine, fo groffe is his errour, and ignor neefo palpable: for in the first place, (considering it is necessary, that the dry nourishment should be mingled with the liquid) plaine it is, that there ought to be one common veffeil whi his the fromack, for to receive them both together; to the end, that it might transmit and send into the beily and panch beneath the meat well toaked and made lost: besides, seeing that the lungs he mooth and every way compact and folid, how is it possible, that if a man drink a supping or grewest, wherein there is a little meale or flower, it should get thorow, and not flay there? for this is the doubt that Erafistratus objected very well against Plato. Moreover, this Philosopher having considered most parts of the body, and searched by reason, wherefore they were made; and being desirous to know (as became a man of his profession) for what use nature had framed every one, he might have thought thus much : That the wezill of the throat, otherwise called Epiglottis, was not made for nothing, and to no purpole; but ordained for this, that when we wallow any food it might keep down and close the conduit of the wind-pipe, for feate that nothing might fall that way upon the lights; which part, no doubt, is wonderfully troubled, tormented and torne (as it were) with the cough, when any little thing is gotten thither, where the breath doth passe to and fro : Now this wezill above aid, being placed just in the midst, and indifferent to serve both passages, when we speake, doth shut the mouth of that conduit or wezand that leadeth to the stomack; and as we either eate or drinke, falleth likewise upon the wind-pipe that goeth to the lungs keeping that passage pure and cleare, for the wind and breath to go and come at eale, by way of respiration. Furthermore, thus much we know by experience: That those who take their drinke leiturely, letting it go down by little and little have moister bellies than those who powretheir liquor down at once; for by this meanes the drinke is carried directly into the bladder, passing away apace and with violence, making no stay; whereas otherwise, it resteth longer with the meat, which it foaketh gently, and is better mingled and incorporate into it: but we should never feethe one or the other, if at the first, our drinke and meat went apart, and had their severall waies by themselves when we swallow them down; for we conjoyne our meat and drinke together, lending them both one after another, to the end that the liquor might ferve instead of a wagon, according as Erafftratus was wont to fay, for to carry and convey the meat and the nourishment in to all parts.

After that Nicias had made this discourse, Protogenes the Grammarian added moreover, and seconded him in this wife, saying That the Poet Homer, first of all other, saw well enough, and observed, that the stomack was the proper receptacle and vessel to receive our food, as the wind-pipe, which they called in old time ased egy@ to admit the wind and the breath: and hereupon it cames that they used to call those who had big and loud voices, sees pastdy st, that is to say, wide throated, the wind pipe and not the gullet, wezard, or gorge: and therefore when he had faid of Achillets charging Hetter with his launce:

He van him through his * gorge at firsts.

A speeding wound and deadly thrust.

A little after he added, and f id:

His * wind-pipe yet he went beside,

And did not it in twaine divide. He meaneth by dood earl & the proper instrument of the voice and conduit of the breath, which he cut not quite in funder as he did the other, named navnatha or neuravia, that is to fay, the wezand or guller. Lipon

* octou-

Upon these words all was husht for a time, untill Florus took upon him to speake in the behalfe of Plato: And shall we thus indeed suffer this Philosopher (quoth he) to be condemned when he is not here in place to answer for himselfe? No (said I) that we will not; but we will joyne unto Plato the Poet Homer also, and put them both together; who is so far off from averting and turning away the liquor from the wind-pipe, that he sendeth both drinke and meat together out of it; for these be his words to that effect?

There gush't out of his * wind-pipe wine good store, And gobs of mans flesh, eaten new before.

Unlesse peradventure some one will dare to say, that this Cyclops Polyphemus, as he had but one eve in his head, so likewise he had no more but one conduit for his meat, drinke, and voice; or else mainraine that in this place the Poet, by exprys, meaneth the flomack, and not the wind-pipe or wezill pipe, which hath been named (0, by all men generally, as well ancient as moderne writers: and this cite I not for want of teltimonies, but as induced thereto for the truths fake: for there be witnesses enough to depose on Plato's side, and those of good credit and authority: for let Eurolis the comicall Poet go by, it you please, who in his comedy named Colaces, that is to say, Flatterers or Parasites, thus

For why? this rule and precept streightly gave Protagoras: To drinke ; that men might have Their lungs well wet and drencht with liquor cleare, Erethat in skie the Dog-star doth appeare.

And passe by, if you will, that elegant and sweet conceited Poet Eratosthenes, whose words be these: With good meere-wine do not forget

The bottome of thy lungs to wet. Euripides verily, who in express tearms writeth thus in one tragedy,

The wine fought all the conduits round about,

And so didpasset be lung-pipes cleanethroughout.

Theweth evidently, that he was quicker signted than Eriffrasus, and saw further into the thing than he did; for well he knew that the lungs have many pipes in them, and be as it were boared thorow with many holes, by which the liquor passeth: for our wind or breath had no need of such conduits and small pipes to send it out; but the lungs were made spungeous and full of cavernosities or holes, in manner of a colander or frainer for liquors, yea, and other matters that go down together with the liquors: neither is it more unmeeet (my good Nicias) for the lungs to transmit and give passage unto meale, or any good thick grewell, than for the stomack; for our stomack or gullet is not, as some thinke, smooth and slippery, but hath a kind of roughnesse and certaine rugged wrinkles, of which by all likelihood some small crumbs and parcels of our meat do take hold, and sticking thereto, are not at once swallowed down, and carried away: but a man is not able indeed to affirme Caregorically, either the one or the other; for nature is so witty and industrious in all her operations. that no eloquence will ferve to expresse the same; neither is it possible to explicate and declare sufficiently the exquisite workmanship and perfection of those principall instruments which she useth, I meane those that serve for the spirit, or breath, and the heat: howbeit, in the favour of Plato I am willing to cite more witnesses, to wit, Philiston the Locrien, a very ancient writer, and renowned for his excellency in your art of Phylick; and Hippocrates of Cos: for these men have allowed no other way nor passage for our drinke than Plato hath: and assorthe wezill that you stand fo much upon, and have in such reputation, Dioxippus was not ignorant of it: but he saith, that about it the humidity or liquor in swallowing is divided and severed, and so glideth or slippeth into the wind-pipe; but the meat rolleth into the flomack, and within the faid wind-pipe there falleth no part of the meat; howbeit the stoma. k receiveth together with the dry food some part alio of the drinke or liquor mingled among; and this seemeth to stand well with reason: for the wezill is set before the wind-pipe as a sence or lid, to the end that by little and little the drinke might gently run as by aftrainer into it, not juddenly and at once with a violence, for feare that if it were in that manner powred in, it would either frop or elie fore trouble and impeach the breathswhich is the reason that birds have no such flap or wezill, and nature hath ordained none for them, for they neither draw in by guipes, nor lap their drinke, but dipping their bils let it down softly, and so wet their throat: And thus much may serve for witnesses in the behalfe of Plato. To come now unto reason: First and foremost our very sense doth confirme the same that he hath said: for let the faid wezill-pipe be wounded, no liquor will go down, but as if a conduit-pipe were cut in funder, we may see all of it to breake forth and run out at the wound, not with standing the we and or flomack be found and whole: moreover we all know by experience, that upon the maladycalled Peripreumonia, that is to fay, the inflammation of the lungs, there followeth a most ardent thirst, by occasion of drought or heat, or else some other cause, which with the said inflammation engendreth also an appetite to drinke: furthermore, there is another argument, stronger and more evident than this, namely, that those creatures which have either no lights. or very small, haveno need of drinke, nor defire it; for every part of the body hath a certaine naturall appetiteto do that worke or function unto which it is ordained; and looke what creatures foever have no fuch parts, neither have they use for them, nor any defire to that operation which is performed by them: In fum, if it were not fo, as Plato faith, it may feeme that the bladder was made in vaine;

for if the flomack receive drinke as well as meat, and fend it down into the belly, what needed the specification or excrement of the liquid food, that is to fay drinke, any peculiar receptacle or passage by it leste; for sufficient it had been to have had one common, as well for the one as the other, to dilcharge the extrements of both, by one spout as it were into the same draught: but now it is otherwife: the bladder is by it felfe, and the gues apart by themselves; for that the one nutriment goeth from thelungs; the other from the stomack, parting immediately, and taking their leverall waies at the very swallowing. And bereupon it is that in the liquid superfluitie which is wine, there appeareth nothing of the dry, refembling it either in colour or fent; and yet natural reason would, that if it were mixed and tempered with it in the belly and the guts, it should be filled with the qualities thereof, and could not possibly be excluded out of the body to pure and void of ordure.

* Againe, it was never known, that aftone hath been ingendred in the paunch or guts; and yet good *untrue, reatonit were, that moisture there should congeale or gathesto a stone as it doth within the bladder; if true it were that all our drinke descended into the belly and the guts, by passing thorough the flomack only: but it feemeth that the flomack incontinently when we begin to drinke, fucketh and draweth out of that liquor which passeth along by it in the wezill pipe, asmuch only as is needfull and requifice for it, to mollifie and to convert into a nutritive pap or juyce the folid meat and to it leaveth no liquid excrement at all: whereas the lungs, fo foon as they have diffributed both spirit and liquor from thence, unto those parts that have need thereof, expell and send out the rest into the bladder: Well, to conclude, more likelihood there is of truth by far, in this, than in the other: and yet peradventure the truth indeed of these matters lieth hidden still and incomprehensible; in regard whereof, it is not meet to proceed to rashly and intolently to pronounce sentence against a man, who as well for his own inficiency, as the singular opinion of the world, is reputed the Prince and chiefe of all Philosophers, especially in souncertains a thing as this, and in deleppe whereof there may be so many reasons collected out of the readings and writings of Plato.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

What is meant in Plato by this word xeeas bos . and why those seeds which in sowing light upon oxe hornes become hard and not easie to be concolled.

"Here hath been alwaies much question and controversie about κεςασβάλΘ, and ἀτεςάμων, ποτ Here hath been alwaies much quertion and confederate upon oxe hornes, according to the who or what is so called (for certain it is, that seeds falling upon oxe hornes, according to the common opinion, yeeld fruit, hard and not easily concocted; whereuponby way of Metaphor, a Rubborn and fiffe-necked person men use to tearme xsqurgboor, and drsqduora) but as touching the cause why such graine or seeds hitting against the homes of an oxe should come to be sountoward: And many times refused I have, yea, and denied my friends to search into the thing; the rather for that Theophrastus hath rendred so darke and obscure a reason, ranging it among many other examples which he hathgathered and purdown in writing of flrange and wonderfull effects, whereof the radiused. caule is hard to be found; namely, That an hen after that the hath laid an egge, turneth round a τίω σίτωι bout, and with a feture or ftraw feemeth to purific and hallow her felfe, and the egge allo; that the Dout, and with a return of the weether purine and trained for teas, and the east trained fear-calle or feale confument thepine, and yet fivalloweth it not down; femblably, that flags hide something of the something fear-calle or feale confument thepine, and yet fivalloweth it not down; femblably, that flags hide something for the something features. their hornes within the ground and bury them; likewise, that if one goat hold the herb Exparisms, flare this that is to say, sea-holly, in his mouth, all the rest of the slock will stand still: Among these miraching swallowed lous effects, Theophrastus (I say hath put down the feeds falling upon the hornes of an oxe; a thing lous effects, Theophrastus (I say hath put down the feeds falling upon the hornes of an oxe; a thing down the lous effects, Theophrastus (I say hath put down the feeds falling upon the hornes of an oxe; a thing down the lous effects, the cause is most difficult, if not impossible to be delived the indexes the feeds of the feeds falling upon the hornes of an oxe; a thing down t known for certaine to be fo, but whereof, the called smolt difficult of the called smolt difficult friends came upon reading the red. But at a Supper in the City Delphi, as I fate one day, certaine of my familiar friends came upon reading the red. me in this manner, that feeing not only, according to the common faying:

From belly full best counsell doth arise, And surest plots men in that case devise.

but also we are more ready with our questions, and lesse to seek for answers, when as wine is in our Tuan draheads, caufing us to be forward in the one, and refolute in the other; they would request me therefore to say somewhat unto the foresaid matter in question: howbeit, I held off fill, as being well backed with no bad advocates, who took my part, and were ready to defend my caule; and by name, Enthydemus my colleague or companion with me in the facerdotall dignity, and Patrocless my fon in battheorige law, who be problem to the facerdotal dignity and Patrocless my fon in battheorige. law, who brought forth and alledged many fuch things, observed as well in agriculture, as by hunters; engine of which fort is that which is practifed by those who take upon them skill in the foreight and prevention of haile; namely, that it may be averted and turned afide, by the bloud of a mould-warpe, or linner rags, flained with the monthly purgations of women: Item, that if a man take the fig. of a wild fig-tree, and tie them to a tame fig-tree of the orchard, it is a meanes that the first of the faid fig-tree, and tie them to a tame fig-tree of the orchard, it is a meanes that the fruit of the faid fig-tree (hall not fall, but tarry on, and ripen kindly: also that flags weep lait tearses, but wild the strength of the first of the the cause here of quoth Euthydemue) then presently you must render a reasonatio of smallach and gertamue the cause here of quoth Euthydemue) then presently you must render a reasonation of smallach and gertamue will inches cummin; of which, the former, if it be trodden under foot and trampled on in the comming up, will матоmen have an opinion it will grow and prosper the better; and as for the other, they sow it with curfes and all the fowleft words that can be devifed, and so it will spring and thrive best. Tush (quoth Flo-carryic rus) these be but toies and ridiculous mockeries to make sport with but as touching the cause of the other matters above specified, I would not have you to reject the inquisition theroi, as if it were incomprehensible. Well (quoth I) now I have found a medicine and remedy, which if you do use, you shall bring this man with reason to our opinion, that you also your selfe may solve some of these questions propounded: It seemeth unto me therefore that it is cold that causeth this rebellious hardneffe as well in wheat and other corne, as also in pulse; namely, by preffing and driving in their solid tubstance untillit be hard againe; for heat maketh things fost and easie to be dissolved and therefore they do not well and truly in alledging against Homer this verficle:

रा दि दर्दा है द्रों देंद्र गड़त. The yeare, not field, Dott beare and yeeld.

For furely those fields and grounds which are by nature hot, if the aire with all afford a kind and feafonable temperature of the weather, bring forth more tender fruits: and therefore fuch corne of feed which prefently and directly from the husbandmans hands, lighteth apon the ground, entring into it, and there covered, find the benefit both of the heat and moulture of the loile, whereby they soone spure and come up; whereas those which as they be cast do hit upon the horns of the beasts, they meet not with that direct positure or rectitude called infinioum, which Hesiodus commendeth for the bett, but falling down (1 wot not how) and missing of their right place, seem rather to have been flung at a venture, than orderly fown; and therefore the cold comming upon them, either manreth and killeth them outright, or elle lighting upon their naked husks, cauleth them to bring fruit that proveth hard and churlish, as drie as chips, and such as will not be made tender and sidow, without they besteeped in some liquor, as having not been covered but with their own bare coats: for this you may observe ordinarily in stones, that those parts and sides which lie covered deeper within the ground, as if they were of the nature of plants, be more frim and tender, as being preferved by hear, than those outward faces which lie ebbe or above the earth; and therefore skilfull maions digeteeper into the ground for stones which they meane to square, work, and cnt, as being mellowed by the heat of the earth; whereas those which lie bare alost and exposed to the aire, by reason of the cold prove hard and not easie to be wrought or put to any use in building: semblably, even come, if it continue long in the open aire, and cocked upon the flacks of threshing floores, is more hard and rebellious, than that which is soone taken away and laid upin garners; yea, and oftentimes the very wind which bloweth whiles it is fanned or winnowed, maketh it more tough and flubborne, and all by reason of cold: whereof the experience, by report, is to be seen about Philippi a City in Macedonie, where the remedy is to let corne lie in the chaffe: and therefore you must not thinke it strange, if you heare husbandmen report, that of two lands or ridges, running directly one by the fide of another, the one should yeeld come tough and hard; the other soft and tender: and that which more is, beanes lying in one cod, some be of one fort, and some of another, according as they have felt (more or lette) either of cold or of wind.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the cause, that the midst of wine, the top of oile, and the bottome of honey, is best?

MY wives father Alexion, one day laughed at Hefiodau, for giving counfell to drinke wine luftily, when the veffell is either newly pierced or runneth low; but to forbeare when it is half drawn; his words are these:

When theree is full, or when it draweth low, Drinke hard; but spare, to midst when it doth grow.

For that the wine there is most excellent: For who knoweth not (quoth he) that wine is best in the middle, oyle in the top, and honey in the bottome of the vessell? but Hesiodus (forsooth) adviseth us to let the midst alone, and to stay untill it change to the worse and be sowre; namely, when it runneth low and little is left in the veffel. Which words being passed, the company there present bad Hefiedus farewell, and betook themselves into searching out the cause of this difference and diversity in these liquors, And first, as touching the reason of honey, we were not very much troubled about it, because there is none in manner but knoweth that a thing the more rare or hollow the substance of it is, the lighter it is said to be; as also, that solid, massie, and compact things, by reason of their weight, do fettle downward; in such fort, that although you turne a vessell up-fide-down; yet within a while after, each part returneth into the own place againe; the heavy finks down, the light floats above; and even so, there wanted no arguments to yeeld a sound reason for the wine also; for first and formost, the vertue and strength of wine, which is the heatthereof, by good right gathereth about the midst of the vessell, and keepeth that part of all others best; then the bottome for the vicinity unto the lees is naught: laftly, the upper region, for that it is next to the aire, is likewise corrupt; for this we all know, that the wind or the aire is most dangerous unto wine, for that it altereth the nature thereof; and therefore we use to set wine-vessels within the ground, yea, and to stop and cover them with all care and diligence, that the least aire in the world come not to the wine; and that which more is, wine will nothing to foone corrupt when the veffels be full as when it hath been much drawn and groweth low, for the aire entreth in apace proportionably to the place that is void; the wine taketh wind thereby and somuch the sooner changeth; whereas if the vessels be full, the wine is able to maintain it selfe, not admitting from without much of that which is adverse unto it, or can hurt it greatly.

But the consideration of oile put us not to a little debate in arguing: One of the company said : That the bottom of oile was the worst, because it was troubled and muddy with the lees or mother shereof: and as for that which is above, he taid: It was nothing better than the rest, but seemed only so, because it was farthest removed from that which might hurt it: Others attributed the caule unto the foliditie thereof, in which regard, it will not well be mingled or incorporate with any other liquor, unless it be broken or divided by force and violence; for to compact it is, that it will not admit the very aire to enter in it, or to be mingled with it, but keepeth it leafe apart, and rejecteth it by reason of the fine imoothness, and continuity of all the parts, so that less altered it is by the aire, as being not predominant over it: nevertheless, it seemeth that Aritistle doth contradict and gainfay this reason, who had observed (as he faith himselfe) that the oile is sweeter, more odoriferous, and in all respects better, which is kept in vessels not filled up to the brim; and afterwards afcribeth the cause of this meliority or betterness unto the aire : For that (faith he) there entereth more aire into a vessell that is half empty : and hath the more power: Then I wot not well flaid I) but what and if in regard of one and the same faculty and power, the aire bettereth oile, and impaireth the goodness of wines for we know that age is hurtfull to oile, and good for wine; which age the aire taketh from oile, because that which is cooled continueth still young and fresh : contrariwile that which is pent in and stuffed up, as having no aire, soon ageth and waxeth old : great apparence there is therefore of truth, that the aire approaching neer unto oile, and touching the superficies thereof, keepeth infresh and young still: And this is the reason, that of wine the upmost part is worlt, but of oile the belt, because that age worketh in that, a very good disposition, but in this, as bad.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What was the reason that the ancient Romans were very precise, not to suffer the table to be clean voided and all taken away; or the lamp and candle to be put out?

Lorus a great lover of antiquity, would never abide, that a table should be taken away empty. Forth alwayes left some meator other standing upon it: And I know full well (quoth he) that both my father and my grandfather before him, not only observed this most carefully, but also would not in any case permit the lamp after supper to be put out, because for sparing of oile, and that thereby none should be wasted vainly. But Enfrophus the Athenian being upon a time at supper with us, hearing Florus making this relation: And what good got they by this (quoth he) unless they had learned the cunning cast of Epicharmus our fellow-citizen; who as he said himselfe, having studied a long time how he might keep his boies and servants about him from filching and frealing away his oile, hardly, and with much adoe at the last, found this means: for prefently after that the lamps were put out, he filled them full again with oile and then the next morning, he would come and fee whether they were full full. This speech made Florus to laugh: But leeing (quoth he) this question is so well solved, let us search I pray you into the reason: Why in old time, as it should seem, our * ancients were so religious and precise, as touching their rables and * Romans lamps: first therefore they began with lamps and lights: And Cafernius his son in law said: That those ancients as he thought took it to be an ominous matter, and a very abomination indeed; that any fire what loever should be put out, for the likeness and kinted that it had with that sacred fire which is alwayes kept inextinguible: for two wayes there be (as I take it) whereby fire (like aswe men) may die; the one violent, when it is quenched and put out by force, the other naturall when it goeth out and dieth of it selse: as for that sacred fire, they remedied both the one and the other, in maintaining and looking to it continually with great care and diligence; the other which is common, they neglected and suffered it to go out of it self, without any more adoe; for fo they themselves quenched it not perforce, nor caused it to die, grudging and envying that it should live, as a beaft that doth no good, they passed for it no more, nor made any further reckoning. Then Lucius the son of Florus said: That he liked well of all the rest that was said; but as concerning the facred fire, he supposed; that our ancestors chose it not to reverence and adore, because they thought it more holy or better than other: but like as among the Aegyptians, some worshipped the whole kind of dogs; others, wolves likewise or crocodiles; but they nourished (with any especiall respect) but one of every kinde; to wit, some, one dog; others one wolfe, and others again, one crocodile; for that impossible it was to keep them all, even so here in this case, the vigilant care and devotion which they employed in faving and keeping the facred fire, was a figne and solemne testimonial of the religious observance which they carried respectively to the whole element of fire; the reason was because there is nothing in the world that more refembleth a living creature, confidering that it moveth, stirreth, and feedeth it selfe; yea, and by the shining it light that giveth (in manner of the soul) layeth all things open, and maketh them to be seen; but most of all it sheweth and proveth the power that it hath, not to be without some vitall seed, or principle, in the extinguishing and violent death thereof; for when it is either quen hed, suffocated, or killed by force, it teemeth to give a cry or schriek. firigling as it were with death, like unto a living creature when the life is taken away by violence. Ardin uttering these words, calting his eyes upon me: What say you (quoth he) unto me, can you alledge any thing better of your own? I cannot (faid I) find any fault with you, in all that you have delivered but I would willingly adde thus much moreover; that this fashion and custome of maintaining fire is a very exercise and discipline training us to great humanity: for surely I hold it not lawfull to poil our meats and viands after we have eaten therof sufficiently, no more than I do for to flop or choake up a spring or fountain after we have drunk our fill of the pure water thereof, or to take down and demolish the marks that guide men in navigation, or way faring, upon the land, when we have once ferred our own turn with them but these and such like things we ought to leave behind us unto posterity, as means to do them good that shall come after us, and have need of them when we are gone: & therefore I hold it neither seemly nor honest, to put out a lamp for mechanicall misery, so toon as a man himselfe hath done withall; but he ought to maintain and keep it burning still, that what need soever there should be of fire, it may be sound there ready, and shining light out; for a blessed thing it were in us, if possibly we so could, to impart the use of our own eyefight, our hearing, yea, and our wildome, thrength and valour unto others for a while, when we are to fleep or otherwise to take our repose: consider moreover, whether our forefathers have not permitted excessive ceremonies and observations in these cases, even for an exercise and studious meditations of thankfulness, as namely; when they reverenced so highly the oakes bearing acoms * usegiar, as they did Certes, the Athenians had one fig-tree which they honored by the name of the holy & unleis han- facted Fig-tree: & expressly forbad to cut down the mulberry tree: for these ceremonies I assure you, ly it should do not make men inclined to superstition as some think, but frame and train us to gratitude and sobe $\auan, ciable humanity one toward another, when as we are thus reverently affected to fuch things as thefe. that is to that have no foul nor tenfe. And therefore Hefodus did very well, when he would not permit fay, the O-139, the U-live tree, 35 any flesh or meats to be taken out of the pots or cauldrons for to be set upon the table, unless somethe French thing before had gone out of them, for an affay to the gods; but gave order that some portion interpreter thereof should be offered as first fruits unto the fire; as it were a reward and satisfaction for the mifeement to niltry and good fervice that it had done: The Romans also did as well, who would not when they had done with their lamps take from them that nourishment which they had once allowed, but suffered them to enjoy the same, still burning & living, by the means thereof, After I had thus said: Now I assure you (quoth Enstrophus) hath northis speech of yours made the overture and given way to pass forward to a discourse of the table? for that our ancients thought there should be alwayes somewhat left standing upon it after dinner and supper, for their houshold servants and children; for furely glad they be, not so much to get wherewith to eat, and to have it in this order communicated from us and our table unto them: and therefore the Persian kings by report, were wont alwayes to fend from their, owntable certain diffies, as a liuration not only to their friends and minions. to their great captaines and lieutenants under them, to their chief pensioners also and squires of the body; but they would have their flaves, yea and their hounds and dogs to be ferved daily, and have their ordinary allowance fet even upon their table verily their will & meaning was, that whofoever did them any fervice, and were imployed in their ministry, should, if it were possible be partakers of their table and fire also: for furely the most fell and savage beasts that be, are made tame by fuch communication and fellowship in their feeding. Hereat I could not chuse but laugh: And why then do you not (quoth he) my good friend, put in practife the old order, and bring abroad the fish laid up in flore, according to the common proverb, as also the Chenix or measure that Pythaga-ras io much talketh of, and upon which he forebiddeth a man to sit? giving us thereby a letion, that we should learn to leave somewhat for the next day, and on the even to remember, and think upon the morrow. We Bootians have this by-word amongst us, common in every mans mouth: Leave somewhat for the Medes since time that the Medes overran and for raged the whole province of Phocis, and walted the for ntiers and marches of Baotia: but furely we should have evermore ready at hand this faying: Save fomething alwayes for strangers and guests, that may come in unlooked for : And to speak what I think : formine own part, I mislike utterly that hungry table that Achilles kept, which evermore was found bare and void: For when as Ajax and Wyffes came upon embassage unto him, they found no meat at all stirring, whereupon he was forced even then to kill formewhat, and to dreis the same out of hand for their suppers: Another time also being minded to entertainking Priamus friendly, when he came unto his pavilion:

He then bestir'd himselfe, and caught up soon, A good white sheep, whose throat he cut anon;

but about cutting it up, quartering, jointing, feething and rofting he spenta great part of the night whereas Eumana wise (choler of a wise master, was nothing at all troubled at the sudden and unexpected comming of Telemachus, but presently willed him to sit down, made him good cheer, setting before him platters full

Of good flesh meats, which were of former store

All ready rost, and left the night before.

But if you think that to be but a small matter, and lightly to be regarded, yet I am sure consesses will it hat this is not a thing of little importance; namely to restain and contain the appetite, when as there is enough yet before a man, to provoke and satisfie it; for these who are wont to abstain from from that which is present, have less desire to that which is absent: Then Lucius added thus much, that he remembred how he had heard his grandmorher say: That the table was a sacred thing: Which if it be so (quoth he) there ought no thing that holy is, to be empty; and for mine own part, lam of this minde: That the table is a representation and figure of the earth for besides that it feedeth us, round it is, and standeth firme and sure; in wich regard, some have called it properly. Veft 1: and like as we would have the earth to bear and bring forth alwayes something or other for our prosit; so we think, that we shall neveriee the table void, nor less without some viands upon it.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

That we ought especially to beware of those pleasures which we take in naughty musick; and how we should take herd thereof.

T the folemnity of the Pythick games, Cellistratus the superintendent, deputed by the high Acommission and councell of State, named Amplyttiones, for to oversee and keepgood order, put back a certain minitrell, who plaied upon the flute, though he were a countrey man of his and a triend, because he came not in time to present himselfe for to be enrolled among those that were to contend for the prize, which he did according to the statutes and lawes of those games provided in that behalfe: but one evening when he had invited us to tupper, he brought him forth into the banquet among us, fet out and adorned in his fair robes and chaplets magnificently, as the manner is to be feen at fuch games of prize, and attended befides with a goodly dance and quire of fingers. well and trimly appointed; and I affore you, a brave shew it was at the first entrie, and a pleasant passime worth the seeing and hearing; but after that he had tried and sounded the whole company there met, and perceived many of them how they were inclined and that for their delight and pleature which they presently took, they would be carried away & stuffer him to do what he lift himselfe; namely to play lateivious tunes, and in gellure to represent the same accordingly; then he shewed himselve openly, and gave us an evident proof and demonstration; that musick will make those more drunk, and dittemper their brains worse (who inconsideratly at all times, and without all measure exceedingly give themselves unto it I than all the wine that they can drink. For now by this time, they could not be content as they were fet at the table, to hout and hollo with open thoat, and withall, to keep a clapping with their hands one at another; but in the end, the most part of them leapt from the board, and began withall, to dance and to footit, year, and otherwise to shew dishoneit and filthy gestures, far unbeteeming gentlemen but yet surable to the tunes he sounded & the fongs that the rest chanted; but afterwards, when they had made an end and that the barronet (as it were after a fit of furious madnels) was come again to it felle, and better fettled, Lamprias was defirous to have faid somewhat; and rebuked in good earnest, this militule and disorder of the youth, but that he feared withall, that he should be thought too rigorous, and give offence unto the company; until such time as Calliftrains himselfe gave him his hint, and incited him so to do, by such a speech as this: For mine own part (quoth he) even I also, do acquit of intemperance, the simple defire of hearing musick, and seeing sports: howbeit; I am not altogether of Arisfoxenus opinion, when he faith, that there be the only pleasure that be worth a willoup, and at the end whereof, a man fo guid fay Kaxas, that is to fay, Oh, well & trimly done! For fyrely, men are wont to attribute to much unto certain dainty meats and fweet perfumes and ointments, calling them trim and fine, and giving this praise unto them, that they be well dressed and confected; yea and it as an ordinary ipeer hato fay: That it is well with us, when we have been at a delicate and coffly supper. Liuppole ailo, that Ariffole himselse alledgeth not a sufficient cause, that the solace and pleasure by fair fights and sweet musick, and generally, the contentment that we have by the eye and the ear, is to be exempted from the crime of intemperancy, because, as he faith, these be the only delights proper unto man; whereas in all others, bruce beafts do communicate with us and have the benefit of them: for I fee that there be many creatures which have no use of reason, and vet take delight in mufick; as for example, stags, in flutes and pipes and at the time when mares are to be covered with stallions, there is a certain found of the hauthoies and a fong to it; named thereupon, Hippothoros: and Pindarus faith in one place, that he was moved with the fong,

Like as the Dolphin swims apace,
Directly forward to that place
Whereas the pleasant hour-boise sound,
And whences their noise doth soon rebound;
What time, both winds and wayes do lie

And as they dance, they bear up their heads and eyes aloft, as joyning in the object which they fee of others likewife dancing; for they frive to imitate and counterfeit the fame; flitting and wagging their shoulders to and fro: Francos see therefore, what singularity by it lelse there is in these pleafures, because they only are respective to the soil, and others belong unto the body, and do seize and rest, the body: whereas tunes, measures, dances, and songs, passing bessies and beyond the sence, do fasten their delights and tickling pleasure, upon the very joy and contenument of the mind; which is the region; that none of these delectations are hidden, nor have need either of darknesse.

to cover them, or of walls to inviron, enclose, and keep them in, as women are wont to fav by other pleasures; but contrariwise, built there are for these delights of the eye and ear, cirques and races, theaters and shew-places; and the greater company that is there with us to see or hear any of these, the greater joy we take, and the thing it selfe is more stately: but this is plain, that degrous we are, not of a number of witnesses to testifie our intemperance and naughty pleasure, but we care not how many fee our honest exercises and civill sports or recreations.

After that Callifratus had ended his speech, Lamprias perceiving that those favourers and maintainers of such ear-sports, took better heart, and became more audacious by these words, set in hand to lpeak now indeed as he meant before, in this manner: This is not the cause, good fir Callifiatus, the fon of Leon; but in mine opinion, our ancient forefathers have not done well, to fay that Bacchus was the fon of Oblivion; for they should rather have said, that he was his father; confidering, that even now by his means you have forgotten, that of those faults and mildemeanours which are committed by occasion of pleasures, some proceed from intemperance; others from ignorance or negligence for where the hurt and damage is evident, there men (if they fin) do it because their reason is forced & overcome by intemperance; but look where the hire and reward of incontinence & loofeness doth not directly ensue, nor presently upon the committing of a fault, there all their delinquency is to be ascribed unto ignorance, for that such lewd acts, they both approve and perpetrate, because they wist not what hurt would follow: and therefore such as do exorbitate and milgovern themselves in eating and drinking excessively, as also in the immoderate use of women; which enormities be ordinarily accompanied with many maladies, much expence, decay of estate, lois of goods and an ill name besides; we usually call loose, dissolute, and intemperate persons: such an one as that Theodestes, who being diseased in his eyes: when oever he espied his sweet-heart whom he kept as his harlot, would salute her in these tearms. Xaide biygh bail

All hade my freet and lovely light, The only joy of mine eye-fight. And fuch another was Anaxarchus of Abdera: Who (by report) knew well what miseries Helivedin, but yet his nature was Inclined so to pleasure, which men wife, And sages dread most part; that he alas Was thereby drawn and carried unto fin, Out of that way which judgement set him in,

But those who hold out manfully, and stand upon their own guards, for fear they be caught and overcome with the groffe pleasure of the belly, and the parts under it, of tast and of smelling; and yet neverthelels fuffer themselves to be circumvented and surprized by other delights, which secretly forelay them, and lie in ambush, hidden close within their eyes and ears; these men (I say) although they be nothing less passionate, dissolute, and incontinent than the others, yet we tearn them not fo for all that: and why so ? because they know not the danger wherein they stand; they run not headlong through ignorance, thinking they shall be masters over their pleasures, yea, though they tarried at the theater all the long day, from morning to night, to see and hear plaies and other passings, without bit of bread or drop of drink; as if for sooth an earthen vessell or pitcher should boast it selfe and stand much upon this, that it is not stirred and taken up by the belly or the bottom, and yet easily removed and carried from place to place by the two ears: & therefore Arcesilans was wont to fay: That it skilled not which way one committed filthiness, for behind and before, was all one lothat we ought to fear that wantonness and pleasures which tickleth us in our ears and eyes both:neither are we to think a city impregnable, which having all other gates fast made with strong locks, fortified also with cross bars, and portcullisses, if the enemies may enter in at one other gate nor to take our felves to be invincible and unconquered by pleasures, for that we be not caught and taken within the temple of Venus; in case wee juffer our selves to be taken in the chappell of the Mules, or elie at some theater: For surely such a passion may overtake and captivate our soul as well here as there, yea, and betake it unto pleafures, for to hale and pull, carry and hurry us as they list: and these verily do insuse and powre into our spirits, possons more eager and piercing, yea, and in greater variety; I mean of longs, dances, musicall accords and measures, than all those be, which either cooks, confectioners, or perfumers can devife: by the strength thereof, they lead and carry us whither they will, yea, and corrupt us so, as that we cannot chuse but convince and condemne our selves by our own testimony against us: For as Pindarus said very well:

We cannot charge, nor yet blame-worshy shink, What ever, for our present meat and drink The sacred earth to us afforded hath, Or fea, with winder, that is fo fell and wrath.

And to say a truth, there is no dainty cates, no delicate viands, fish or flesh; no northis passing good wine which we drink, that for any pleasure and contentment which they yeeld unto us, causeth us to feeup any fuch noises, like as ere while, the found and playing of the flutes did, which filled (I say) not this house only, but I believe well, the whole city, with out-cries, utas, clapping of hands, and alarmes: and therefore we are to stand in great fear and dread of such pleasures as these; for exceeding forcible they be, and most powerfullthey be, as those who stay not there, as thole do which affect either tast, seeling, or smelling; to wit, in the unreasonable part of the soul, without passing any farther; but they reach unto the very judgement, and discourse of reason, Moreover, in other delights and pleasures, although reason should faile and not be able to withstand them, but give over in plain field: yet there be other passions a good many which will resist and impeach them: for fay there be some dainty and delicat fish to be bought and fold in themarket inigardise oftentimes holdeth back a gluttons fingers from drawing out his purse-firings. who otherwise would be busic and ready enough to help his deinty tooth: covetouiness likewise other whiles turneth away a wanton leacher, and whorematter from meddling with a dear and coffly courtefan, who holds her-felte at an exceeding high price; like as Menander in one of his comedies bringeth in a prety pageant of this matter: for when a certain band had brought unto a banquer, where divers youths were drinking, and making merry together, a pailing faire wench, young withall, and trimly fet out in every point, for to entire and allure them, they

Fell to their junkets hard, and deinty cares.

For when it flands upon this point, that a man must take mony up at interest, or else go without his pleasure; certes, it is a shrewd punishment to bridle his lust and incontinence; for we are not alwayes to willing and ready to lay our hand to our purses: now theeyes and ears of such as love mulicians and minitrele, and other luch gentleman-like sports, and recreations as we call them, fatisfy their furious appetites and affections, in founding mutick, plaies and shewes, for nothing and without any colt: for why? such pleasures as there, they may be sped with, and enjoying many places, as the publick and facred games of prize, in theaters, and at feaths, and all at other mens charges; and theriore an easie matter it is to meet with matter enough for to spoile and undoe them quite, who have not reason to govern and direct them. Hereat he made a paule, and to there was fome filence for a while: And what? would you have (quoth Calliftratus) this reason, either to do or say for to succour and save us? for the will not fatten round about our eares, those little cases or bolsters to cover our ears with, which Xenocrates speaketh of, neither will thee cause us to rise from the table so soon as we heare a musician to tune his lute or prepare his pipe: No in truth (quoth Lamprias) but looke how often foever as we fall into the danger of these pleasures, we ought to call upon the muses for to succourus; we must flie into that mountain Helicon of our ancients: for such an one as is enamoured upon a sumptuous and costly strumper, we cannot tell how to match by and by with a Penelope: nor marry unto Panthea; but if one take pleafure in baudy ballads, lascivious longs, and wanton dances, we may loon divert him from thence, by fetting him to read Euripides, Pindarus, or Menander; and to wash a filthy ear, and furred all over with falt (as Plato faith) with a sweet and potable lotion of good layings and wife fentences: for like as magicians commanded those who are possessed or haunted with evill spirits, to rehearse and pronounce apart by themselves Ephenan letters, or words of a counter-charme; evenso when we are among these vanities, where minutels play their parts, and morisk dancers their may-games, fetching their frisks and gambols, Shaking them (elves in furious wife, With strange all armes and hideous cries: Wagging and flinging every way. Their necks and heads all while they play.

Let us then call to remembrance the grave, holy and venerable writings of those ancient Sages, and conferring them with these fortish fonnets, ribald rimes, paltry poems, and ridiculous reasons, we shall not be endangered by them, nor turn aside (as they say) and suffer our selves to be carried away with them down the stream.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

of such guests as be named shadowes; and whither he that is called by the one, may go unto another to Supper ; if he may, when, and to whom.

Momer in the second book of his Ilias, writeth of Menelius, how he came of his own accord unbidden, to a feast that his prother Agamemnon made unto the princes and chief commanders of the army:

> For why? he well conceived in his mind, The * troubled much, his brother he should find.

And as he would not neglect and overfee thus much, that either the ignorance or forgetfullness in get his his brother should be otherwise seen; so he was less willing to discover it himselfe in failing for own broto come; as some troward and prevish persons are wont to take hold of such oversights and negli- there gences of their friends, being better content in their hearts thus to be neglected, than honoured, because they would have advantage, and somewhat to complain of. But as touching such as are invited at all to a feast, nor have no formall bidding (whom now adayes, we call shadowes) and yet are brought in be those who are invited, there arose one day a question, how this custome first came up and took beginning. Some were of opinion that Socrates began it, who periwaded

Aristodemus upon a time, being not bidden to goe with him to a feast at Agathons house, where there fell out a pretty jelt and a ridiculous; for Aristodemus tooke no heed when he thither came, that he had left Socrates by the way behinde him, and so himselfe entred before into the roome; which is as much as the shadow before the body, and the light comming after: but afterwards, at the feafling and entertainment of friends that are travellers, and pals by as strangers, especially, if they were princes or great governours, because men knew not who were in their traine, and whom they deigned this honour, for to fit at their own table, and to eat and drink with them; the cultome was to requelt themselves, for to bring with them whom they would, but withall, to set down a determinate number; for fear left they should be so served as one was, who invited to supper, Philip king of Macedonie, into the countrey: for he came to his hofts house with a great retinue after him, who had not provided a supper for many guests: Philip perceiving that his friend was hereupon in great perplexity, and knew not what to do, fent unto every one of his friends that he brought with him, a servitor of purpose to round them secretly in the ear, that they should so eat of the viands before them, as that they referred a piece of their stomack for a dainty tart or cate that was to come in: by which means, whiles they looked evermore when the faid dish should come to the table, and did eat more sparely in hope of it, of those meats which stood before them. there was sufficient for them all. But whiles I seemed thus to play upon the point before the company there present, Florus thought good that this question ought to be handled in good earnest, and more leriously; namely, as touching those shadowes above said: Whether it might stand with honefly and good manners, to follow or go with them who were bidden? As for Cefernise his fon in law, he utterly condemned that fashion: For a man ought (quoth he) to obey the counsel of Hefiodus, who writeth thus:

Above allothers, to thy feaft,

Invite thy friend who loves thee best.

If not so, yet be sure at leastwise to bid thy familiars and those of thine aquaintance, for to participate with thee in thy facred libations and thanksgivings to the gods at the table, in discourses there held in the curtefies passing to and fro; and namely, in drinking one to another: but now adaies it is with men that make featts, or with those who keep ferry-barges or barks to transport passengers; for when they take in men aboard, they permit them to cast into the vessell what fardles or baggage they have befides; for even so, we making a feast for some especiall persons, give them leave to fill the place with whomsoever they please; whether they behonest men and of worth or no it maks no matter. And I would marvell much, if a man of quality, and one that knoweth good mannets, would come thus bidden(as it were) at the second hand, which is all one as unbidden, being such an one, as many times the mafter of the feast himselfe knoweth not; and if he be one of his acquaintance and knowledge, and yet unbidden, furely it were more shame now to go to his house, as it were, to upbraid him and cast in his teeth as if he came unto his feast without his good will, and yet would take his part thereof, even by violence and strong hand, Moreover, to go before or tarry after him, who would feeme to bid one to another mans table, carrieth fome shame with it, and would make a modest and honest man dismaied and blank: neither is it a decent thing to have need of witnesses, and a warrant (as it were between him and the mafter of the house, to infinuate thus much, that he is come indeed, not as one formerly bidden to supper, but as the shadow of such and such a man: besides, to dance attendance upon another, and observe when he hath been in the stouph, is anointed and washed, waiting the houre when he will go, sooner or later, ; this in my simple judgement is a very base and mechanicall thing, savouring strongly of the buffon or parasite Gnatho, if ever there were such a smell-feast as Gnatho, who haunted mens tables where it cost him nought: furthermore, if there be no time or place, wherein a mans tongue may be better permitted to fay thus:

Art thou dispos'd to boast, to crack and brave In measure? speake out hardly; good leave have,

than at a banquet, where commonly there is most liberty allowed and intermingled in all that is done and faid and everything is well taken, as in mirth; how should a man behave and govern himfelfe at fuch a place, who is not a lawfull and naturall bidden guest indeed; but as a man would fay, a bastard and subreptitious, crept in, and intruded I wot not how into a feast, without all order of inviting? for fay that he do speak freely at the board, or fay he do not, lie open he shall both for the one and the other, to the calumniations of them there present: neither is it a small inconvenience to bemade a marke for scurrile termes, and a meer laughing-stock, namely, when a man putteth up, and endureth the base name of a shadow, and will be content to answer thereunto? for I assure you, to make small account of unseemly words, is the next way to lead men unto undecent and dishonest deeds, and to acquaint them therewith by little and little: wherefore when I invite others to a feast or supper unto mine own house, I allow them otherwhiles to bring their shadowes with them (for the custome of a city is much, and may not well be broken) but furely, when I have my felfe been called upon, to go with others to a place where I am not bidden. I have ever yet denied and could not for any thing be brought unto it. Upon which words enfued filence for a time, untill Floras began again in this wife: Certes this second point is more difficult and doubtfull than the other; for when we are to entertain ftrangers that be traveliers (as hath been faid before) we must of necessity invite them in this order : the reason is because it were incivility and discurresie, to part them and their friends in a strange place, whom they were wont to have about them; and again, it is no easie matter to know, whom a man hath in his company. See then (quoth I) whether they who have given liberty unto them that make a feast, thus to invite guelts, that they may take others unto them (as you fay) permit not them also whom they would bring, as their shadowes, to obey, and so to comeunto a teast; for it standeth not with honesty, to grant and give that, which is not meet for to demand or give; nor in one word to follicite or exhort one to that, whereunto he would not willingly be follicited, either to do or give his confent: but as for great States and rulers, or ftrangers travelling by the way, there is no fuch inviting or choice to be made; for entertained the must be whomsoever they bring with them: but otherwise, when one friend feastern another sewere amore friendly and courteous part, for himselfe to bid the familiars or kinsfolke of his saidfriend. knowing them so well as he doth; for by this meanes greater honour he doth unto his friend yea, and winneth more thanks at his hands again, when the party invited shall know that he loveth them best, that most willingly he desireth to have their company, as taking pleasure that they be honoured and entreated to come as well, for his fake; and yet for all this, it would other whiles be wholly referred unto his discretion that is bidden: like as those who facrifice unto fome one god, do honour likewile and make vowes unto those who are partakers of the same temple and altat in common, although they name them not severally by themselves. * * For there is neither wine; dainty viands, nortweet perfumes, that give such contentment and pleasure at a feath, adden a man whom one loveth and liketh well of, sitting by his side or neerunto him at the table: moreover, to ask and demand of the man himselfe, whom one would feast, what viands or what banquetting diffnes or pattry works he loveth bett; as also to feek and enquire of the divertitie of wines and pleasant odors he delighted in, were a very uncivilland absurd part: but when aman hath many friends, many kinsfolks and familiars, to request such an one to bring with him, those especially whose company he liketh best, and in whom he taketh greatest pleasure, is no absurdity at all, nor a thing that can be offensive: for neither to faile in one ship, nor to dwell in the same house, ne yet to plead in the same cause, with those whom we are not affected well unto, is so displeasant and odious, as to fit at a supper with them against whom our heart doth rife; and the contrary is as acceptable : for furely the table is a very communion and fociety of mirth and earnest, of words and deeds; and therefore if men would be merry there, and make good cheer, I fee no need, that all manner of persons indifferently should meet, but those only who have some inward friendship, and private familiarity one with another: as for our meats and fauces that come up to the board, cooks I confels do make them of all manner of sapours, different as they be, mixing them together and tempring, harsh, sowre, milde, sweet, sharp, subtill, and biting, one with another: but a supper or featt, is nothing acceptable and contenting, unless it be composed of guests who are of the fame humour and disposition: and for that, as the Peripatetick Philosophers do affirm, that there is one Primum mobile, above, or principall mover in nature, which moveth only, and is not moved; and another thing beneath, and in the lowest place, which is moved only, and moveth not; but between these two extremities, there is a middle nature, that moveth one and is moved by another; even fo, (lay I) there is the same proportion among three forts of men, the first of those who invite another; the second of such as are invited only; and the third of them that do invite others, and are invited themselves: and now because we have spoke. already of the first and principal seastmaker, who inviteth, it were not amiss now to say somewhat of the other two folks: He then who is bidden, and yet hath leave to bid others; ought in great reason (as I think) to be carefull and take heed, that he forbear to bring with him a great number or multitude, left he foould feem to make spoile of his friends house, as of an enemies territory, and asit were to forage there for all those that belong unto him; or to do as those who come to occupy and inhabit a new countrey, that is to fay, by bringing with him so many of his own friends, disselfe, or at least wife exclude and put by his guests, who invited him, and so by that means the masters of the seasts might be served as they are, who fet forth suppers unto Hecate or Proferpina, and to those avertuncan gods, or apotropai, whom men call upon, not to dogood, but to avert evill, for they themselves not any of their house lick their lips with any jot of all that cheer; only they have their part of all the smoak and troubles belonging thereto: for otherwise they that alledge unto us this common saying, speak it but merrily and by way of jest; but certainly it befalleth even so in good truth and earnest unto those who entertain either strangers or friends so rude and uncivil, who with a number of shadowes, as if there were so many harpies of cormorants and greedy guls, consumed and devoured all their provision; secondly, a friend that is himselfe solemnly invited, must be carefull, that he take not with him, for to goe unto another mans house, those that he first meeteth or that come next hand, but such especially, as he knoweth to be triends and of familiar acquaintance with the feaft-maker, as if he fitived a vie to prevent him in bidding of them; if not fo; to have those with him of his own friends, whom the mafter of the feaft himselfecould have wished and made choise of to have bidden; as for example, if he be a modest man and a civill, to fort him with modest & civill perions; if studious and learned, to furnish his table with students and good schollers; if he have been before-time in authority, to fit him now with personages of power and authority; and in one word, to acquaint him with those, whom he knoweth he would be willing to salute, and entertain with speech and communication; for this is a wise kind of courtely and great civility, to give unsh such a personage occasion and means, to salue, embrace, and make much of them : whereas he who commeth to a least with such about him as hath no conformity at all unto the feast-maker, but seem meer aliens, and strangers ; as namely, with great drunkards, to a sober mans house; to a man that is a good husband, wary, and thrifty in his expences, with a fort of dissolute ruffians and man tina. 32 good manipulation merganis tining man, that loveth to drink heartily, to laifly to jeft and to be metry, with grim firs, and fevere ancients, fuch as in their talk are grave, and by their long beards, may be taken for fages and profound clerks; such an one (I fay) is a very absurd fellow, thus to require the hospitall courtely of his friend, with such impertinent incongruity: for he that is inwied must be as carefull so please first the inviter, as the featt-maker, his guest; and then acceptable shall he be and wellcom indeed, if not himselfe only, but those also who come with him or for the love of him, be of good carriage and lovely behaviour. As for the third person, who remaineth to be (poken of, to wit, who is bidden and brought in by another; if he take pepper in the nole, and cannor abide to be called a shadow; certainly he is a fraid of his own shadow; but in this case, there would be very great circumspection had; for it is no point of honesty and good manners, to be loon intreated, and ready to follow every one indifferently at his call; confidered it would be, and that not flightly, what he is who moveth thee to go with him to fuch a feast ifor it he benot a very familiar friend, but one of these rich magnificoes and portly personages, who would (as it were upon a scaffold) make a shew unto the world of a number of favourites and followers to guard and attend him at his heeles; or such an one as would seem to do much for thee, or to grace and honour thee greatly by taking thee in this order with him, thou oughtelt flatly to deny him, and refuse such courtely: well, say that he be a friend and familiar person, yet must not thou by and by for all that, be ready and obey, but then only, when there is some necessary occasion for to commune or speake with the malter of the featt or with the other party, and that otherwise shou can't meet with no good opportunity for to do it; or if he be newly returned from lome long voiage, when he hath been a great time away, or else about to depart, and so seem (for very good will) defirous of thy company at supper; or if it appear that he meaneth not to take with him many, nor those drangers and unknown but either thy selfe alone, or some few others of his samiliars; or after all thele confiderations, if thou mayest perceive, that by this occasion and opportunity of thy company, he doth practife to contract some beginning offarther acquaintance, friendthip and amity, and namely, if he be reputed an honest man, and worthy to be loved and regarded, who thus is defirous of thy company, and earnest with thee to go with him; for wicked and lewd persons, the more they seem to clasp and take hold, and hang upon us, the more we ought to shake them off as burres, or elfe to leap over them as briers and brambles: nay, admit that they be honelt enough, who would have our company, and bring us to a man that is not honeft, we ought not to go with them, left we chance to take polion with hony, that is to fay, get the acquaintance of a naughty, man, by the means of an honest minded friend: moreover, about it is, to go unto a mans house whom we know not at all, or with whom we never had any manner of dealing and acquaintance, unleis he be a personage of great mark for singular vertue, as we have before said, or that this occasion may serve as a foundation or ground-work of some farther love and amity; for then it were not amiss to be easily intreated, and to go willingly without any ceremonial complement unto him, under the wing and shadow of another. As for those who be already our familiars, unto fuch above all others we may be bold to go at the motion of another; for by that means we give reciprocall liberty and leave unto them for to repaire likewile unto us at the request of others. There was one Philip indeed, a buffon and fourtile jefter, who was wont to fay: That to go unto a fealt, formally invited, was fimply more ridiculous, than to come as a shadow by the bidding of another: but in truth, more honourable and pleasant it is for honest men and good friends, to refort unto their friends, who be likewise honest and vertuous, in seasonable time (without being invited or espected) with other friends; for thereby they both rejoyce the heart of those that entertain them, and do honour unto such as bring them: but above all, most undecentit is, to go unto princes rulers rich men and great States, when we are not invited by themselves, but brought by others; for in any case avoid we must, the imputation and note not undeserved, of impudency, incivility, want of good manners, or ambitious infolency.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Whether it be a lawfull and decent thing, to admit minstrell-wenches to a feast, for to play and sing?

Nourcity Cheronea, there was held a great discourse one day at the table, where Diogenianus the Pergamian was present, as touching the ear-sports which were to be admitted at a banquet; and much adoe we had to defend our felves, and to confute a long bearded philosopher that was there, one of the Stoicks feet for footh, who alledged against us, Plato, blaming and condemning those who brought into their feasts minstrell-wenches, to pipe and sing & to be heard, as if they were not able themselves to entertain good speeches one with another; and yet present there was, a scholer, out of the same school, Philip a Prusian, who said: That such personages were not to be named in this question, who are brought in as speakers at Agathons board, for that their speeches sounded more fweetly and melodiously, than all the flutes and cithrons in the world: no marvell it was therefore, that these minstrels had no audience at such a feast, but rather, that the guests sitting thereat the table, forgat not altogether to eat and drink, for the great pleasure and contentment which they tooke in hearing such discourses. And yet Xenophon was not ashamed to endure in the prefence of Socrates, Anifthenes, and other fuch personages, a pleasant conceited jester named Philipbus; no more than Homer to teach men: That an onion was a good fauce to draw on wine: And Plato having inferted in manner an interlude or comedy within his Banquet, the speech of Aristophanes, as touching love:at the last ferting as it were the back doors of the hall wide open, brings in apageant, fuller of variety and vanity than all the relt, to wit, Alcibiades little better than drunk. crowned with chaplets and garlands of flowers, and marching in a mask or mummery: then follow the altercations and debates with Socrates as touching Agathon, and that encomiafitial praife of Socrates: (O bleffed, faint Charices!) that even Apollo himselfe (were it lawfull for to say) if he had entred in place with his harp ready tirung and tuned for to play, the company would have requested him to stay his hand, untill the foresaid speech had been finished and brought to an end : And did these personages indeed (quoth he) notwithstanding they had so great grace in their discouries, use nevertheless these pleasant sports and pastimes between, garnishing their feasts therewith, and all to make the company to laugh and be merry? And shall we being intermingled with persons managing affaires of State, with merchants, occupiers, and with many (it may so fall out) altogether unlettered, and somewhat rusticall, banish out of our feasts and banquets this amiable delight and passime; or else rise from the table and be gone, as if we would flie from fuch Sirenes as ioon as ever we fee them comming? It was thought a strange and wonderfull matter in Clitomachus the champion and professions of performing games of prize; that so soon as ever there was any talk begin of love matters, he would leave the company and depart : and when agrave Philotopher avoideth the found of the flute, and goeth out of thefeast, and as if he were afraid of a minitrell wench, preparing her-felie to found and fing, * putteth on his shoes, and cal- * For they leth incontinently to his page for to light his torch; shall he not in so doing be thought worthy to sat upon behissed at and laughed of every one, for taking offence, and abhorring these harmless pleasures; pallers like as those beetles which flie from perfumes and sweet odors? For if there be any time or place at meat, allowed for these disports, it is at feasts and banquers principally. Then (I say) and there are we to give and did our minds to fuch delights, all the while we facrifice unto Bacchus For mine own part Euripides, off their howsoever otherwise he pleaseth me very well, dorh not satisfie me herein, when he ordaineth shoes for as touching musick, that transferred it should be from feasts and banquets, unto sorowes and pensive fadness: for in these cases, there would be some good, sober and wise remonstrance at hand (like as a Physician with fick folk) to help all: but otherwise we are to mingle these delights of musick with the gitts of Bacchus, in manner of asport and recreation: Certes, a prety speech it was of a Lacedamonian, who being at Athens on a time, when new tragedies were to be acted, and the authours of them to contend for the best game; seeing the sumptuous furniture and provision of those who were the masters of the revels, and such pastimes, together with the painfull labour in teaching and prompting of parts, and what adoe there was in ordering of the dances and shewes thereto belonging: whiles one strived to go beyond another: Oh what a foolish city is this (quoth he Ito imploy to much travell and terious fludy in idle plaies and disports ! For to say a truth, when weare at our playes, we must do nothing else but play, and not to buy so dear (with such cost and dispences, yea, and with the loss of time, which were better bestowed about other good affaires an idle sport: mary at the table, when our spirit is sequestrated from other business, we may taffe a litle of fuch delights, and in the mean while, confider withall, what profit fuch folacemay

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What Acroams or Ear-sports, are especially to be used at supper time?

Hen these words had passed, the sophister above-said, would glad y have replied again; but I for to interrupt and stay his speech began first and said: Nay rather Diogenianus, I think it better to confider upon this point; that feeing there be many ear-delights to content our hearing, which of them is most meet and fit? and if you think so good, let us refer the matter to this wife man here in place, and request him to give his judgement: for being as he is, inflexible, and a man subject to no passions, we shall never need to fear that he will so much trip, as to prefer a thing that is more pleasant, before that which is better. Then he at the request and exhortation of Diegenianus and us, without any delay: As for other pastimes (quoth he) at theaters, exhibited upon the stage and scaffold of players and dancers, Ireject and banish them all: only I admit one kind of sport to delight theear, which not long since came to be taken up at Rome, in feasts and banquets, and is not yet divulged abroad in every place: For you know well (quoth he) that among the dialogues of Plato. some there he which contain a continued narration of a thing done or (indicorders again confift of certain devited personages, talking and discouring together: of these personali dialogues, those that be easiest, children use to learne, and con them without book, together with expressing the gestures agreeable to the quality, manners, and nature of the persons, who are feigned and brought in; a conformation also and framing of the voice, yea, and a countenance and disposition every way answerable to the words that they pronounce : this manner of pastime hath been wonderfully well accepted among grave persons, and men of honour; but such as be effeminate, or have dainty and delicate ears, by reason that they are rude, illiterate, and ignorant what is good and honest; and who, as Arisfenus was wont to say, will be ready to calt up their gorge, and vomit yellow choler, when they hear any good harmony, millike them and would not abide the hearing: and I would not marvell verity, if they reject and condemne them utterly, being to possessed with womanish daintiness. Phil p then perceiving some there in place, not to take thele words well: Stay there (quoth he) my good friend, and forbear in this wife to raise upon us, for we were the first, who were offended with this manner and fashion, when it began at Rome, yea, and we reproved thole who would have Plato ferve the turne for to make folk merry at the board, and laboured all they could, that Plato's dialogues forfooth should be rehearsed and heard, amid'it tarts, march-panes, comfitures, and sweet periumes: considering, that it some verses of Sappho, or Anacreous odes should be rehearsed: Me thinks I ought for very shame and reverence, set the cup down out of my hand, If I were about to drink: many more things to this effect I have in my head, which I am afraid to utter for fear I might be thought of purpose to make head, and to dispute against you : and therefore to this friend here of ours, together with the cup as you fee, I give the charge, for to wash a saltish ear (as they say) with potable liquor of pleasant speech; then Diogeniansus receiving the cup at his hand: But (quoth he)I hear no other yet but all good fober speeches; so that it seemeth that the wine doth not work in our heads, nor overcome our braines; and I feare me, that I my selfe shall be capitulated and articled against; howbeit, if I must speak my mind, I am of opinion, that many of these matters which are prefented unto our ears, for to tickle and please them, ought to be cut off and namely, tragedies above all others, as being a thing (iwis) not very well befitting a seas, for that it speaketh in too grave and base a voice, representing besides, such arguments and acts, as move the hearer to pitty and compassion: I reject also, our of our dances, that which is called Pyladion, as being over-stately, and too full of pomp, exceeding patheticall besides, and requiring many perfons and actors: but if we may admit any of thosecountrey kinds, which Socrates recounteth, when he speakes of dances, I receive that which is called Bathyllion, which of it selfe beareth a lower port, and foundeth much like to the ruftick dance, called Cordax, or refembling Echo Pan, or fome Satyre dancing amorously and wantonly with Cupid: as for the comedy, that which was called Verus, that is to fay, the ancient kind first used, it forteth not well with the table, nor would be acted before men when they be drinking and merry, in regard of the inequality thereof for that earnestness and liberty of speech, used in those glancing digressions, called Tagasdous, is too free and over vehement; also the facility and readiness to scoff, flout, and jibe, is too rise and common over-broad and plain befides, full of undecent and unhonest verbs, and as full of filthy and lascivious nownes. Moreover, like as at the feafts of great princes and potentates, there standeth alwayes waiting by every one of them that fit at the board, a cup-bearer, to give him drink when he calleth for it; even so there had need to be some Grammarian or other at hand continually for to expound ever & anon, the meaning of divers tearmes used in these comedies, to wit, what signifieth in Eurolis the poet, this word Lasmodias; also, what the poet Placo meanes by Cinesias, by his comedies; and what is meant by Lampon, in Cravinus; likewise one or other for the purpose, to give the hearers to understand, who they be whom the actors let flie their scurrile scoffs at : so that by this means, our feast must be like a Grammar school, or else all the frumps and mocks that be slung and difcharged, will light in vaine, and lose their grace, for want of being understood. But to come unto the new comedy, what should a man lay any thing of it but this, that it is so incorporate in feasts and banquets, that a man may better make a supper without wine, than without Menander? for why? the phrase or manner of speech in these comedies is sweet, pleasant and familiar, the matter such, as neither can be despised of the sober, nor offensive to the drunken; besides, the vertuous and sententious sayings therein, delivered in simple and plain tearmes, run so smooth, that they are able to soften and make pliable every way the stiffest and hardest natures that be, by the meanes of wine, like as the bars of iron in the fire, and to reduce them to humanity. To be short, the temperature throughout of mirth and gravity together, is such, as it seemeth that this comedy was devised first for nothing else, but both to pleasure & profit, those who had taken their wine liberally & were now well disposed to mirth: moreover, even the amatorious objects therein presented are not without a fingular use and benefit, for these who being already set in an heat with wine, are within a while after to go to bed & sleep with their wedded wives: neither shall you find among all his comedies, as many as he hath written, any filthy love of a young fair boy; and as for the deflowring of young maidens & virgins about which there is such adoe in his comedies they ordinarily do end in marriages & all parties be pleased. As touching the love of harlots & professed courtesans, if they be proud, didainful and prefumptuous queans, certainly our wanton affection that way, is well cooled and daunted, by certain chastilments or repentances of young men, who are reprefented in these comedies, to come again unto themselves, and acknowledge their follies; but as for those kinde harlots, which are of good natures, and for their parts do answer again in true love, either you shall have in the end their own fathers found, who may provide them husbands, or else there is some measure of time set but forto gage their love; which at the last, after a certain revolution and courserun, turneth unto civill and bashfull behaviour. I know well, that all these matters and observations, unto those who are otherwise occupied and busied in affaires, be of no importance; but at a table, where men are set of very purpose to be merry and to solate themselves. I would wonder, if their desterity, delight, and good grace, doth not bring with it some amendment and ornament into the minds and conditions of those who take heed unto them, yea, and imprint a certain zeal and emulation, to frame and conforme themselves unto those that be honest and of the better fort.

Atthefe words, Diogenianus paused a while, were it for that he had made an end of his speech, or to take his wind, and breath himselse a little : and when the sophister began to reply and came upon him again, saying, that in his opinion there should have been some places and verses recited out of Aristophanes. Philip speaking unto me by name. This man (quoth he) hath his defire satisfied, now that he hath to well recommended his friend Menander, in whom he taketh to great delight, and in comparison of whom, he seemeth to have no care nor regard at all of any other; but there remain yer, many other matters, which we are wont to hear for our pleasure, which hitherto have not been examined; and yet very willing I amoto hear some discourse of them: as for the prety work of imagers, who cut out and grave small living creatures, if it please this stranger here and Diogentanni, we will put over the controversie and the decision thereof untill to morrow morning, when we are more fober. Then began I to speake, and said: There be yet, other kind of sports and plaies name ed Mimi, of which, tome they call Hypothefes, as it were, moralities & representations of histories; others, Pagma, that is to wit, ridiculous fooleries; but neither of them both, do I take meet for a banquet; the former, both because they require so long time in the acting, and also, for that they require fo costly furniture and preparation; the other, are too full of ribandrly, offilthy and beastly fixeches, not well befeeming the mouthes of pages and lackies, that carry their mafters flippers and pantofles after them, especially, if their masters be honest and wife men : and yet many there are, who at their feasts, where their wives sit by their sides, and where their young children be present. cause such sooissh acts and speeches to be represented, as trouble the spirits and disorder the passions of the mind more, than any drunkenness whatsoever. But as for the play of the harp, which is of so great antiquity, and ever fince before Homers time, hath been a familiar friend and companion with feafts, and alwayes entertained there, it were not meet nor honest for to dissolve that ancient friendfhip, and so long continuance: but we would request those minstrels that play and singto the harp, to take out of their songs those dolefull plants, dumps, and forcowfull lamentations, which be so ordinary in them, and to chaunt pleasant ditties and fresh galliards, meet for those who are met to be merry and jocund. Moreover, as touching the flute and hauthoies, they will not be kept out, do what a man will, from the table; for if we do but offer our labations, by powring out wine in the honour of the gods, we must needs have our pipes, or else all were marred, yea, and chaplets of flowers upon our heads; and it seemeth that the gods themselves do sing thereto and accord: moreover, the found of the flute doth dulce the spirits, and entreth into the ears with so milde and pleasant a tune, that it carrieth with it a tranquillity and pacification of all motions, even unto the foul, in such fort, that if there did remain in the understanding and mind, any grief, any care or anxiety, which the wine had not discussed and chased away, by the gracious and amiable noise thereof, and the voice of the musician singing thereto, it quietesh it, and bringeth it asleep: provided alwayes, that this instrument keep a mean and mediocrity, so that it move not the foule too much, and make it passionate, with so many tunes and notes that it hath, at what time as the faid foul is so drenched and wrought soft with wine, that it is ready to be affected therewith: for like as sheep and other cattell, understand not any articulate language of a man, carrying a sense and understanding therewith; howbeit, with certain whistles or chirts, done by lips or hands, or with the found of somepipe or shell, the shepheards and other heard-men can tell how to raise them, or make them lie down & couchieven so, the brutish part of the soul, which hath no understanding, nor is capable of reason, may be appeased, ranged and disposed as it ought to be, by longs and founds, by measures, tunes and notes, as if it were charmed and enchanted by them: but to speak what I think, this is my conceit, that neither found of flute, nor lute and harp, by it felfe, without mans voice and fong to it, can make merry the company met rogether at a feaft, somuch as a good speech, well and properly fitted; for so we must accustome our selves in good earnest, to take our principall pleasure and delight in speech, and to spend the best part of that time in discourse and communication: as for song and harmony, we are to make (as it were) a sauce to our speech, not tolick them up and swallow them down alone by themselves: for like as no man will reject and refuse the pleasure that commeth by wine, and viands taken for the necessity of our nouriture, and bringing therewith commodity of our health; but that which entreth by fweet fents and perfumes is not necessary, but superfluous and delicate, Socrates sent away (as it were) with a box of the ear; even so we ought not to hear the sound of a flute or platterie, which striketh and beateth upon our ears only, but if it follow or accompany our speech, which doth feast and exhilarate the reason that is in our soul, we may well admit and receive the same. And verily, for mine own part. Ithink, that the reason why in old time Apollo punished that presumptuous Marsas, was this, that when he had closed up his mouth with his pipe and muzzle together, he prefumed to contend and strive (having nothing but the bare sound of the naked flute) against him, who together with the found of the harp, had the fong also and musick of the voice : let us therefore in this one thing especially, beware and take heed, that in the company of those men, who by their speech and learned discourses are able to delight and pleasure one another, we bring not in any such thing to enter in at their ears, which may be an impeachment or hinderance rather to their delight, than a delectation it selfe: for not only they be soolish and ill advised, as Euripides saith:

Who having of their own at home enough themselves to save, Will seeke else where, and from abroad, their remedy to have.

but also, those who being provided sufficiently of means in themselves, to make their recreations of. and to folace their hearts, labour nevertheless all that ever they can, to have their delights from others. For the magnificence of that great king of Persia, wherewith he meane to entertain Andcides the Lacedamonian, seemed (I assure you) very grosse, absurd and impertinent, namely, when he dipped and wet a chaplet of roles, faffron, and other odoriferous flowers, intermingled together, in a precious oile, and so lent it unto him, doing injury by that means to the flowers, and atterly quenching and marring that native beauty and fragrant sweetness of their own; semblably, no less abfurdity it were, when a feast bath mirth and musick enough in it selfe, to go about for to enchant and encharme it with other ministrelsie from abroad, and so for a strange and borrowed delight, to bereave the guests of their own and proper, and as one would lay, change the principall for the accessory. I conclude therefore, that the fittest season for such amusement and occupying of the ears is, when the feast beginneth a little to grow turbulent, and to fall into some contentious debate and braul, by heat of opinionative arguing, for to allay and quench all, that it break not out, to opprobrious tearms; or to express a disputation, which is like to pass the bounds of reasoning, and to grow unto an unpleafant and fophilicall altercation; yea, and to flay all litigious wrangling and vehement invectives, befeeming rather pleas at bar, or the orations in the publick hall of a city untill such time as the banquet be reduced into the former calme and tranquillity.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

That to confuls at the table, while men are drinking wine, was an ancient customs among the Greeks

I tooftrains upon a time invited us to a supper; and when we were set, there arose some speech as touching certain matters, upon which the Athenians were the morrow after to sit in council, and to debate in a generall assembly of the city: now, as one of our company cast out this word, and faid: This is the Persian fashion, my masters, thus to consult and hold a councill at the board, And why Persian rather than Grecian (quoth Glaucias ?) for a Grecian I am sure he was, that said :

Taspos and wheins, Burn x untis audion. That is to tay,

From belly full, best counsell doth arise, And surest plots men in that case devise.

And Greeks they were, who under the conduct of Agamemnon held Troy befieged; who as they were eating and drinking together,

The good old Nestox first began

Wifely upon the point to fean, who also was himselse the author of this meeting, and advised the king to invite his nobles, and the principall captaines of the army to dinner, for to fit in councill in these tearms:

Make now a feast, I you advise my lord, And bid your ancient peeres, who when at board They be all fet; marke who gives counsell beft, Obey his reed, and fee therein you rest.

And therefore the most nations of Greece which were ruled under the best lawes, and most conflantly retained their ancient ordinances and customes, laid the first foundation of their government and councill of State upon wine: for those guilds and societies in Candy, which they called Andreia, as also the Phiditia in Sparta, were instituted and held for privy councills and assemblies of senators; like unto that, if I be not deceived, which even in this city here of Athens goeth under the name of Prytancion, and The smothesion, and not far different from these, is that nightassembly of the principall personages, and most politick States-men, whereof Plato speaketh in his books, unto which he referreth the causes and affaires of most importance, which require greatest consultation: those councellers of State also in Homer:

Who offerwine to Mercury, the last of others all, What time, as now bed-time it is, and them to Reep doth call, do not they I pray join wine and words together? when they are about therefore to depart, and retire themselves into their bed-chambers, the first thing that they do is to make their prayers, and powre out their libations of wine, unto the wilest God of all others, as if he were present with them, and their superintendent to oversee them: but they who were indeed the most ancient of all others, called even Bacchus himselse* Euhalus, as if they had no need at all of Mercury, and in regard also of him, they attributed unto night the name of * Enphrone.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Whether they did well who fat in consultation at the table?

WHen Glaucias had spoken these words, we all thought that these turbulent and litigious debates had been well appealed and laid asseps; but to the end that they might so much the rather die and be buried in oblivion: Nicostratus provided another question and said: At the first (quoth he) I made no great matter of this cultome, nor regarded it much, taking it to be a meer Persiantashion; but now seeing it is discovered to be an order also among the Greeks, requinte and necessary it is to render some reason thereof, for to defend it against an evident absuidity, which at the first fight presenteth it selle; for that the discourse of reason in manner of the eye, is hardly to be governed by us, and untoward for to be brought to perform her work in a great quantity of moisture, and the same as yet stirring and waving: and bendes, all odious griefs, which on every fide appear and come forth to wine, like as Snakes, Lizards, and fuch like Serpents, are brought to light and shew themselves to the sun, cause the mind to be wavering, inconstant, and irre-olute: as therefore a bed or pallet is better then a chair, for them that are disposed to drink and make merry, for that it containeth the body at full, and exempteth it from all manner of motion even to the beth way is, to keep the foul quiet and in repose altogether; and if that may not be, to do by it as men do by children that can relt and stand on no ground, but be evermore stirring; namely, to give unto it not a fword or a javelin, but a rattle or a ball, like as Bacchus putteth into the hands of drunken folk the ferula (talk (a most light weapon and instrument either to offend or defend withal) to the end that as they be readiest to strike, so they might be least able for to hurt: for the faults that bee committed in drunkennesse ought to passe lightly in mirth, and go away with laughter, and not to belamentable tragical, and bringing with them great calamities. Moreover, that which is the chiefe and principal thing in confultation of great affairs, to wit, that he who for want of wit and knowledge in the world, should follow the opinion of those who are of great conceit, deepe judgement, and long experience, this means Wine bereaved us of ; insomuch as it seemeth hereupon to have taken the name dive, in Greek; because as Plate faith, it causeth them that drink it freely, * 615 AZ, that is to fay, to have a good conceit and weening of themselves, as if they were ve- *vvincos ry witty and wife: for however they take themselves to be eloquent, fair, or rich, as ordinarily they do all of them; yet they esteem better of their own wit and wisedom, then of any thing else: and this is the reason that Wine is talkative and full of words; it filleth us with lavish speech, and the same unseasonable; yea, it maketh us to have a marvellous good opinion of our selves in each respect, as if we were worthy to command and prescribe unto others, more meet to be heard then to heare, and fitter to lead and go before, then to follow and come after; But (quoth Glaucius then) an easie matter it is for any man to collect and alledge much tending unto this point, confedering how evident and plaine the thing is: therefore it were good to hear a discourse to the contrary, if haply any person, young or old, will stand up in defence of Wine. Then our brother, full conningly and fliely, like a crafty Sophister: Why (quoth he) think you that any man is able so presently and upon a sudden to devise and speak unto this question in hand, all that may be said probably thereto? And why (quoth Nicostratus) should not I so think, considering so many learned men in place, and those who love Wine well enough? at which word the other smiled and faid: Are you indeed sufficient, even in your own conceit, to discourse upon this point before us, and yet indiposed, and altogether unable to consider upon State matters, and affaires of Government, because you have taken your Wine well? and is not this all one, as to think that hee who hath drunk freely, feeth well enough with his eyes, and howfoever he heareth not perfectly with his eares those whom he speaketh and talketh with, yet for all that he hath the perfect hea-sing of those who either sing or play upon the flute? for as it is likely, and flandeth to great reason, that good and profitable things should affect and draw the outward senses more unto them, than those which are gaudy onely and fine; even so no doubt, such matters make the mind also more intentive: and if a man for that he hath plied his drinking overmuch, cannot haply apprehend well the difficult subtilities of some high points in Philosophy, I nothing marvel thereat; but if the queflion be of matters and affairs of State, great likelihood there is, that if he becalled away thereto, heshould gather his wits more close together, and be more vigorous; like as Philip King of Macedenia, who having played the fool, and made himselse ridiculous at Charonea, after the battel there, both in word and deed, upon his liberal drinking, presently as soon as he fell to treaty of Peace and Articles of agreement, he composed his countenance to gravity, knit his brows, and cast behind him all vain fooleries, wanton gestures and unicemly behaviour, and so gave unto the Athenians a lober, discreet, and we'l advised answer. And verily one thing it is to drink well, and another thing to be flark drunk fuch as be so far gone and overseen with drink that they know not what they do or fay, ought as wee think, to take their beds and fleep; as for those who have taken their Wine indeed too much and be fearce fober (howbeit, otherwise men of wit and understanding) we shall neverneed to feare that they will taile in judgement, yea, and forget their experience, considering that we dayly see these Danters, Singers, and Minstrels perform their patts no worse afeafts, for all their liberal drinking, than in the publick Theaters: for the skill and knowledge, whereof Hey that chase Philosophy out of seasts and banquets (O Sossius Senecio) do not the same, but worfe far, then those who take away the light from thence; for that when the lamp is gone, fuch persons as be made temperate and well disposed, will be nothing the worse therfore, making as they do, more account of a reverent regard, then of the mutual fight one of canother: whereas, if rudenesse, ignorance and leudnesse be joined with wine, the very golden lamp of Minerva, if it were there, could not possibly make the feast or banquet lovely, gracious, modelt, and well ordered: for that men should teed and fill themselves together in slence, without a word faying, were the faltion that favoured very much of ftill (wine at their draft, and perhaps a thing impossible: but who foever referveth speech in a feaft, and withal, admitteth not the wile and profitable use thereof, is more worthy to be laughed at then he who thinketh verily, that quests should be ever eating and drinking at a supper, but filleth not unto them, wine undelayed, unseasoned, and which is meer of it selle : or setting before them viands unseasoned, without salt or sauce, and the fame not cleanly dreffed: for that there is no meat or drink to unfavory, unpleafant and hurtful. for want of good and orderly handling, as words carried unfeemly, and without differetion, at a binquet: which is the reason, that Philosophers when they reprove drunkennesse, call it a dotting hywine: and furely this dotage is no other thing, but raving, or vaine, foolish and undifferer u-fing of words now when disordinate babling and foolish talk, meeteth once with wine in a banquet, it cannot chuse but the issue thereof will be reproachful contumely. intolency, brainsick folly and villany, which of all others, is a most unpleasant end, and farthest from all Muses and Graces: and therefore it is no foolish ceremony and absurd fashion, which the women in our country obferve at their fealts called Agronia, where they make semblance for a while, as if they sought for Bacchus, being fled out of the way, but afterwards give over fecking, and fay that he is gone away, and run to the Mules, and there lurketh, and lieth hidden among them: and anon, when supper is ended, they use to put forth dark riddles, and propose questions one to another, hard to be solved; the mystery whereof, teacheth us thus much, that both we, ought at the table, to use such speech as doth contain some good learned speculation and erudition: and also, that when those discourses are joined with wine and drunkennesse, then they be the Mules who hide and cover all furious outtage and enormity, which also is willing to be detained and kept by them.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Astouching those days which are ennobled by the nativity of some renounced persons: and with alof that progeny or race which is faid to be derived from the gods.

This book then, which is the eighth in order of our Symponaques or Discouries at the Table, shal contain in the first place, that which not long since we chanced to hear and speak, that day whereon we celebrate the feast of Places nativity: for having solemnized the birth day of Socrates upon the fixth of February: the morrow after, which was the feventh of that month, we did the like by Plato: which gave us occasion, and ministred matter first to enter into a discourse fitting the occurrence of these two nativities : in which Diogenianus the Pergamion, began first in this manner: Ion the Poet (quoth he) faid not amisse of fortune, that being as she was, different from wiledome in many things, yet the brought forth effects not a few like unto her: and as for this, it feemeth that the hath caused it to fall out very well and fitly, and not without some skill, (rash though she be otherwise) not only for that these two birth days jump so neer one unto the other, but also because, that of the master who was of the twain more ancient, commeth also in order before the other. Whereuponit came into my head allo to alledge many examples of occurrents happening likewile at one and the same time: and namely, as touching the birth and death of Euripides, who was born that very day whereon the Greeks fought the naval battel of Solamis at lea with the King of Persia. and whose fortune it was to die the same day that Dense the elder Tyrant of Sicily was born: as if fortune of purpose (as Timeus saith) had taken out of the world a Poet, who represented Tragical calamities, the very same day that she brought into the world the Actor thereof. Mention also was made of the death of King Alexarder the Great, which fell out just upon the same day that Diegenes the Cynick Philosopher departed this life: and by one general voice accorded it was, that King Attalus left his life, the very day that he celebrated the memorial of his nativity: and fomethere were who faid, that Pompey the Great died in Egypt the fame day of the year that he was born : though others affirmed that it was one day fooner: femblably, there came into our remembrance at the same time Pindarus, who being born during the solemnity of the Pythick games, composed afterwards many hymns in the honour of that god, for whom those games were solemnized then Florus faid, that Carneades was not unworthy to be remembred upon the day of Plato's nativity, confidering he was one of the most famous pillars that supported the School of Academy: and whereof they have gotten the habit, is evermore so present and ready with them, that it maketh their bodies active and nimble, able to perform thole parts and functions directly, yea, and to anfiver the motions of the mind accordingly with confidence. Many there be allo, in whose heads and hearts wine so worketh, that it putteth into them an affured boldnesse and resolution, which helpeth them much to the performance of any great actions, and the same is nothing infolent and nespecta the mind and gracious. And thus we read of Afchium the Poet, that he endited and wrote his Tragedies when he was thorowly let in an heat with wine; in such forts as that they all. were conceived by the influence of Bacchus, and not as Gorgus faith, that one of them, and namely, the greatest (entituled, The ieven Princes before Theter) was begotten (asit were) by Mari, For wine being of power to enchaige the body and mind both, according as Planelaith, causeth the body to be peripirable, quick and active, opening all the Pores and passages thereof, giving way unto the fantalies and imaginations early to run forth, drawing out together with them, the affurance of reason and boldnesse of speech : for you shall have men, whose invention naturally is good enough, in whom (when they be lober and fasting) the same is cold, timorous, and in manner from zen: let them once be well plyed with wine, cup after cup, you shall see them evaporate and smoak out, like as trankingenie doth by the heat of fire. Furthermore, the nature of wine, chaleth away all fear, which is as contrary unto those who fit in consultation, as any thing in the world; it quencheth allo, many other bate and vile paffions, such as malice and rancour; it openeth the double plates and iolds of the mind. diplaying and differentiage the whole diposition and nature of a man, by his very words: yea, it hath a vertue to give frank and liberal speech; and consequently, audacity to utter the truth; without which, neither experience nor quicknesse of wit availeth ought: for many there be who putting in practice, and making use of that which cometh quickly into their heads, freed better, and have greater successe, then those who warily, cautelously, and with much fubrilty, seem to conceale and keep in that which presenteth it selfe unto them, and be very lateward in delivering their opinion: we are not therefore to fear wine in this regard, that it flireth up the passions of the mind; for it in iteth not the worst unlesse it be in the wickedest men, whose countel is at no time fober: but as Theophraftus was wont to call Barbars-fhops, dry banquets without wine even to, there is a kind of winelesse drunkennesse, and the same, sowre and unpleafant, dwelling continually within the minds of menthat be vicious and without good bringing up; troubled and vexed always with fome anger, with gridg, malice, envy, emulation, contention, or illiberal batenetle; of which vices, wine abating the edge of a great part, rather then fharpning them, maketh men not tottilh foois, and blockish dolts, but ready and apt, and yet circumipeet, cautelous, and wary; not fupine and negligent in matters concerning their profits; but yet induftrious, and making choife of that which is good and honest : but such as tearm wily-crassin esse, by the name of fine wir, and take erroneous opinion and mechanical nigardite, for witedom may even as well, and with good reaton my, that as many as when they be drinking at the table, speak their minds roundly, and utterwith liberty what they think, be fenicleffe fools: but contrativile, our ancients called Bacchus, bassing and assess which is as much to say, as Deliverer and Freer; being of opinion, that there was to be after bed unto him, a great part of divination, not for that he was furious, raging and mad, as Emipid staid, but because he delivered the minde, and freeth it from all service fear, diffidence and cowardife, giving us freedom and liberty to speak the truth, and use franknesse of speech one to another.

both of them were born at the festival times of Apollo; the one in Athens, what time as the feast Doin of them were obtained the other, that very day when as the Cyrenians folemnized is, which they call Carnea; and both of them fell out just upon the seventh day of February; on which day you my masters, who are the Prophets and Priess of Apollo, do say that himselfe was born, and therefore you call him Heddomagenes: neither do I think, that they who attribute unto this God, the fatherhood of Plato do him any dishonour, in that he hath begotten and provided for us a Phyfrian, who by the means of the doctrine of Socrates, even another Chiron, cureth and healeth the greater infirmities and more grievous maladies of the foul. Moreover, it was not forgotten, how it was held for certain, that Apollo appeared in a vision by night, unto Ariston the Father of Plato, was need or certain, that agree of Fide, and a voice befides was heard, forbidding him exprefly not to lie with his Wife, nor to touch her for the space of ten months. Hereupon Tyndares the Lacedamonian seconded these words, and faid, that by good right we were to fing and fay thus of Plato:

He seemed not the son of mort al wight ; Some godfor fire, he may avouch by right.

Howbeir, for my part, I am afraid, that to beget repugneth no lefte with the immortality of the Deity, then to be begotten: for furely, even the act of generation, implyeth also a mutation and passing, then to be begotten: on: and King Alexander the Great fignified no lesse one time, when he said, that he knew himselfe principally to be mortal and subject to corruption, by having company with a woman, and by his fleep: for that fleep is occasioned by a relaxation proceeding from feeblenels, and as for all generation performed it is by the passage of some portion of ones telfe into another: and so much therefore is loft and gone from the principal: and yet on the other fide, I take heart again, and am confirmed, when I hear Plate himselfe to call the eternal God, who never was born nor begotten, Father and Creator of the World, and other things generable; not that God doth engender after the manner of men, by the means of natural feed; but by another power doth ingenerate and infuse into matter, a vertue generative, and a principle, which altereth, moveth and transmuteth the same: For even by winds that female birds inspire, Conceiv'd they be, when they to breed defire.

Neither do I think it any absurdity, that a god companying with a woman, not as man, but after another fort of touching and contractation, and by other means, altereth and replenisheth her, being a mortal (reature, with divine and heavenly feed: And this is (quoth he) no invention of mine for the Egyptians hold that their Apis is in that manner engendred by the light of the Moon, striking upon his dam, whereby she is conceived; and generally they admit thus much, that a god of the male fex, may deale with a mortal woman: but contrariwife, they think not that a mortal man is able to give unto any goddefle the beginning of conception or birth; for they are of opinion, that the fubltance of these goddefles, consistent in a certain air, and spirits, yea, and in certain heats and

THE SECOND QUESTION.

How Plato is to be understood, when he faith: That God continually is exercised in Geometry.

Fter these words, there ensued some silence for a while: and then Diogenianus beginning again Ato speak: How think you Matters (quoth he) are you contented and well pleased, considering that we have had some speech already of the gods, and that on the day wherein we solemnize the nativity of Plate, that we make him partaker allo of our conference, and take occasion thereby, to consider upon what intention and in what sense he hath said, that God continually practiseth Geometry, at leastwife it we may presuppose and set down, that he it was who was the author of this sentence: Then said I; Written it is not in any place of all his books; howbeit, held to be a saying of his, and it iavoureth much of his stile and manner of phrase. Whereupon Tyndares immediately taking the words out of his mouth; Think you (quoth he) O Diogenianus, that this sentence coverely and in mystical tearms, signifieth any dark subtilty, and not the very same, which Plato himselfe hath both said and written in praising and magnifying Geometry, as being the thing which plucketh those away who are fastened unto sensible objects, and averteth them to the consideration of fuch natures, as be intelligible and eternal; the contemplation whereof is the very end of Phi-lofophy, even as the view and beholding of fecret facted things, is the end of Religious Mysteries: for the nail of pleasure and pain, which fasteneth the soul unto the body, among other mischieses that it doth unto man, worketh him this displeasure as it should seem above all, that it causeth senfible things to be more evident unto him, then intellectual, and forceth his understanding to judge by passion more then by reason: for being accustomed by the sense and feeling of extream pain, or exceeding pleasure of the body, to be intentive unto that wandering, uncertaine, and mutable nature of the body, as seeming a thing subsistent, blinded hee is, and loseth altogether the knowledge of that which is effential indeed, and hath a true being, foregoing that light and instrument of the foule, which is better then ten thousand bodily eyes, and by which organ alone, he might fee the Deity and Divine Nature: for foit is, that in all other Sciences which we name Mathematical, as in lo many mirrors, not twining and warping, but plain, in aooth, and even, there appear the very tracts, prints, and images of the truth of things intelligible: But Geometry especially which Philo calleth the mother City, and miltrefle commanding all the reft, doth divertand gently withdraw by little and little, the mind purified and cleanfed from the cogitation of fentual things: and this is the reason that Plato himselfe reproved Eudoxus, Architas, and Menachmus, who went about to reduce the duplication of the cube or folid fquare by nechanical infiruments, and artificial engins, as if it had not been possible (if a man would fet unto it) by demonstration of reason to find out and comprehend, two middle lines proportionall; for he objected unto them: That this was as much as to destroy and overthrow the best thing in Geometry, when by this meanes they would have her turne back again unto tentible things, and keep her from mounting up alost, and embracing those eternal and incorporal images: upon which God being continually intentive, is therefore

After Tyndares, Florus a familiar friend of his, and one who made semblant always by way of foot and gave it out in word, that he was amorous of him: Well done of you (quoth he) in that you would not have this speech to be your own, but a common saying of every man, and you would jeem to argue and prove, that Plato sheweth how Geometry is not necessary for the gods, but for men: for God hath no need of Mathematical Science, as an engine or instrument to turn him from things ingendered, and to bring about and direct his intelligence and understanding unto those that be of an eternal effence: For why? In him, with him, and about him they be all: but take heed rather, and see whether Place hath not covertly under these dark words lisped and fignified somewhat that is pertinent and proper unto you, which you have not marked nor observed, in that he joineth Lycurgus with Socrates, no leffe then Pythagoras, as Dicearchus was of opinion; for Lycurgus as you know very well, chased out of Lacedamon, arithmetical proportion as a popular thing, turbulent and apt to make commotions; but he brought in the Geometrical, as befitting the civil and modest government of some few wife Sages, and a lawful royalty and regal dominion: for the former giveth equally unto all according to number; but the other unto every one, by reason, and with regard of desert and worthinesse; this proportion (I say) maketh no confusion of all together, but in it there is an apparent discretion and distinction between the good and the bad, dealing always unto every one their own, not by the ballance or lot, but according to the difference of vice and verue: God therefore nieth this proportion, and applieth it unto things: and the same it is (my good friend Tyndares) which is called Dice and Nemesis; teaching us thereby, that we ought to make of judice, equality, and not of equality, judice for the equality which the common fort feeketh after, and is indeed the greatest injudice that may be, God taketh out of the world, and as much as polibly may be, observeth that which is fit and meet for every one according to defert and worthinesse, going herein Geometrically to work, by reason and law defining and distributing accordingly.

When we had praised this exposition and interpretation of his, Tyndares said: That he envied fuch commendation, exhorting Autobalus fet against Florus, to conflite him, and correct that which he had delivered. That he refused to do; howbeit, he opposed and brought forth a certain opininema teneration on an acconceit of his own: Thus it is (quoth he) Geometry is not affeculative skill of mens manners and behaviour, nor yet occupied about any subject matter what foever, but, the Symptomes, accidents, and passions of those extremities or terms which accomplish bodies: neither hath God by anyother means tramed and made the world, but only by determining or making finite that ny any street make which was infinite in it felfe, not in regard of quantity greatnesse, and multitude; but for that being as it was, inconstant, wandering, disorderly, and unperfect, our ancients were wont to call it infinite, that is to say, undetermined and unfinished: for the form and figure is the term or end of every thing that is formed and shapen: the want whereof made it of it select be shapelesse and disfigured: but after that numbers and proportion come to be imprinted upon the rude and formleffe matter, then being tyed and bound (as it were) first with lines, and after lines, which superficies and profundities, it brought forth the first kindes and differences of bodies, as the foundation and ground-workfor the generation of air, earth; water and fire: for impossible it had been, and abfurd, that of matter fo wandering, fo errant, and diforderly, there should arise equalities of fides, and fimilitudes of Angles, in those folid iquare bodies, which were called Ottacha and Eicafoedra, that is to fay, with eight and twenty bases: likewise in pyramidals and cubes, unlesse there had been some workman to limit, ordain, and dispose every thing Geometrically; thus a limit or term being given unto that which was infinite; all things this universal world, composed, ordered, and contempered accordingly in excellent manner, were first and made, and are made now every, day norwithstanding the said matter striveth and laboureth daily to return unto her infinite estate, as very loth and returing to be thus geometrized, that is to fay, reduced to some finite and determinate limits; whereas realon on the contrary fide, restraineth and comprehendeth her; distributing her into divers Ideaes, from which all things which are ingendered, take their generation and con-

He had no sooner thussaid, but he requested me to contribute somewhat also of mine own unto this discourse and question in hand: but I for my part, commended highly their opinions, thus delivered, as being naturally and directly devised by themselves and their own proper inventions, laying withal: That they carried with them sufficient probability; But for that (quoth 1) you should not be displeased and offended with your selves, nor altogether have your eye abroad and look unto others, liften and hear what meaning and interpretation of the faid fentence, was most approved unto our malters and teachers: for there is among the propositions, or positions rather, and Theoremes Geometrical, one above the rest, to wit, When two forms or figures are given and put down, to fet a third thereto, equal to the one, and femblable to the other; for the invention whereof, it is faid, that Pythagoras facrificed unto the gods: for this Theoreme without all doubt is more or, it is iaid, that 1 1,100g of than that, by which he did demonstrate, and prove that the slope line Hypotinus a, availeth as much as the two laterales, which make a right angle in a triangle: Well faid of you (quoth Diogenianss) but what serveth this for the matter now in question? You shall understand soon (quoth I) in case you will call to memory that division in Timans, whereas the Philofopher made a tripartite distribution of those principles, whereby the world had the beginning of generation; of which, the one he called by a most just name, God : the second Matter: and the third Form or Idea: So the matter of all subject things is most disordinate: the Idea of all mouldes and patterns most beautiful: but God of all causes simply the best: Thus would not he admit, or leave any thing, as far forth as possibly might otherwise be, infinite and undeterminate: but adorn nature with proportion, measure, and number, making of all subjects one thing, in quantity equal to the matter, and in quality semblable to the form. Setting therefore before him this proposition, having already twain, a third to it he made, which he doth make and preferve for ever, equal to the matter, and semblable to the form, to wit, the world: which being always in regard of that inbred necessitation ty of a body, subject to generation, alteration, and all kinds of passion, is aided and succoured by the Creator and father thereof, who determine the substance by reason of just proportion, according to the image of the patron, whereby the pourprise and circuit of this universal world is more beautiful, being thus vast and great, then if it had been lesseand competent,

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the reason that the night is more resonant or resounding then the day?

As we fat at supper one evening in Athens with Ammonius, we heard a great tumult and noise which rang all the house over, of people in the street without, crying aloud; Captain, Captain: now was Ammonius then the third time Prator or Captain of the City: He fent forth immediately fome of his menabout him, to fee what the matter was: who presently appealed the hurry, and dismissed those who had raised this outcry: upon which occasion we in the mean while entred into question: Why those who are within house hear them very well that cry without; but they that are abroad hear not so easily those within, crying as loud? Ammonius incontinently made answer and faid, that this question had already been solved by Aristate in this wise: For that the voice of those within being once gotten forth and flown into a wide place of much air, vanisheth away, and is diffipated immediately: whereas the voice of them without, when it is entred in, doth not the like, but is retained and keptelose, and so by consequence more easie to be heard: But there is another thing (quoth he) which require th rather to have a reason rendered thereof, namely: Why in the night feason all voices do resound greater then in the day time, and besides the greatnesse, are more clear, diftinct, articulate, and audible? For mine own part (quoth he) I am of this minde, that the divine providence hath in great wisedome ordained, that our hearing should be more fresh and quick, when as our fight serveth us in little or no stead at all ; for seeing that the air of the night which according to Empedocles,

Wandereth alone, and folitary,

And doth blinde eyes about her carry, is obscure and dark, look how much defect it maketh in our fight, so much it supplies h and requiteth in our eares : but for that of things also which necessarily are done by nature, the causes ought to be fought out, and the proper and peculiar office of a Philosopher and Naturalia, is to buse himfelfe in feeking after the material caules, and instrumental principles; which of all you will first come forth with some probable reason, as touching this matter? whereupon there being some paule and silence for a time, Botthus said thus: When I was my selle a young man, and a student, I made use otherwhiles of those principles which are in Geometry, called Politions: and certain propositions I supposed as undoubted truths, without any need of demonstration: but now will I use some of these which heretofore have been proved by Epicurus, as for example: Those things which be, are carried in that which is not, nor hath any being; for much vacuity or voidnesse there is stored as it were, and intermingled among those Atomes or indivisible little bodies of the aire, which when it is spread abroad in spacious capacity, and by reason of the rarity and thinnesse thereof, runneth to and fro round about : there be a number of small, void, and empty places, among those little motes or parcels scattered here and there, and taking up the whole region: but contrariwise, when they are pent in, and a restraint and compression made of them, being thrust together into a little space; these small bodies being hudled perforce one upon another, leave a large void space, to vague and range abroad: and this dorn the night by reason of cold; for heat doth loosen, disgregate, scatter and diffolve all thick things, which is the reason whythose bodies which either boil, thaw, ormelr, occupie more room: contrariwise, such which gather, congeale, and be frozen, come together close, and be united, leaving an empty place in those vessels wherein they were contained, and from which they be retired: The voice therefore comming among, and lighting upon many of these bodies thus scattered & dispersed thick every where, either is drowned altogether at once or disgregated and broken as it were in pieces, or else meeteth with many impeachments to withstand and stay it: but where there is a space void, and wherein there is not a bodie, it having a free and full course, and the same not interrupted, but plain and continued, cometh so much the sooner unto the ear, and together with that (wiftnesse retaineth, siil the articulate expresse, and distinct found of every word in (peech: for you see how empty veslels, if a man knock upon them, answer better to every stroak, and carry the found and noise a great way off; yea, and many times they yeeld a found that goeth round about, and continueth a good while, redoubling the noise; whereas let a vessel be filled either with solid bodies, or else with some liquor it is altogether deaf and dumb, if I may so say, and yeeldeth no found again; for that it hath no place nor way to passe thorow. Now among solid bodies, gold and flone, because they be full and massie, have a very small and feeble sound, that will be heard any way, and that little which they do render, is foon gone; contrariwife, braffe is very vocal, resonant, (and as one would say) a blab of the tongue: for that it hath much emptinesse in it, and the substance or masse thereof, is light and thin, not compact of many bodies, hudled together, and thrust one upon another; but hath follon and plenty of that substance mingled together, which is fost, yee'ding, and not resisting the touch or the stroak, which affordeth easinesse unto other motions, and to entertaining the voice gently and willingly, fendeth it until it meet fomething in the way which stoppeth the mouth; for then it stayeth and ceaseth to pierce any farther, because of the stoppage that it findeth. And this is it (quoth he, in mine opinion) that causeth the night to be more resonant, and the day lesse; for that the heat in day time which dissolveth the air, canseth the intervales between the Atomes or Motes aboveiaid, to be the imaller: this only I would request, that no man here do oppose himself to contradict the premiles and first suppositions of mine. Now when as Amminium willed me to fay fomewhat, and reply against him. As touching your formost supposals, friend Bestims (quoth I) about the great emptinesse, let them stand, since you will have it so but whereas you have set down, that the said emptinesse much for the motion and ease passage of the voice, I like not well of that supposition; for surely, this quality not to be touched, smitten, or made to suffer, is rather proper unto silence and still taciturnity : whereas the voice is the firsking and beating upon a founding body; and a founding body is that which accordeth and correspondent roir felle, moveable, light, uniform, simple, and pliable, like as is our air for water, earth and fire, be orthernselves dumb and speechlesse; but they sound and speak all of them, when any spirit or air is gotten in, then (I say) they make a noise: as for braffe, there is no voidnesse within fit: but for that mixed it is with an united and equal spirit, therefore it answereth again to claps and knocks, and therewith alrefoundeth: and if we may conjecture by that which oureye feeth and judgeth, iron feemeth to be spongeous, and as it were worm-eaten within, full of holes, and hollowed in manner of honey-combs: howbeit, a mettalit is of all other, that hath the worst voice, and is most mute: there was no need therefore to trouble the night so much in restraining, compressing, and driving in the air thereos so close of the one side, and leaving so many places and spaces void on the other side: as if the air impeached the voice, and corrupted the subflance thereof, confidering it selfe is the very substance, form and puissance of it: over and besides, it should follow thereupon, that unequal nights, namely those that be foggy and misty, or exceeding cold, were more resonant then those that be fair and clear; for that in such nights, those Atomes are clunged cloic together, and look where they come, they leave a place void of bodies: moreover, (that which is easie and evident to be seen) the cold Winter night ought by this reckoning to be more vocal and fuller of noise, then the hot Summers night; whereof neither the one nor the other is true: and therefore (letting this reason, such as it is, go by) I will produce Anaxagoras, who faith: That the sun causeth the air to move and sir after a certain trembling motion, as if it did beat and pant; as it may appear by those little mores and shavings (as it were) in manner of dust. which flutter and fly up and down thorow those holes; whereas the sun-shine passeth, such as some Greeks call rivas: which (faith he) chirming (as it were) and making a humming in the day time, cause by their noise, any other voice or found not so easie to be heard; but in the night season, as their motion cealeth, to consequently their noise also is gone.

After I had thus said, Ammonius began in this wife: We may be deemed haply ridiculous (quoth

he) to think that we can refute Democritus, or to go about for to correct Anaxagoras? howbeit, we must of necessity take from these little bodies of Anaxagoras his devising, this chirming noise beforefaid, which is neither like to be so, nor any wayes necessary: sufficient it will be to admit the trembling motion and stirring of them, dancing as they do in the same light, and by that means disgregating and breaking the voice many times, leatter it to and fro: for the air (as hath been faid already) being the very body and substance of the voice, if it be quiet and setled, giveth a direct, united and continued way unto the small parcels and movings of the voice, to passe along a great way: for calm weather and the tranquillity of the air, is resonant, wheras contrariwile, tempestuous weather is dumb and mute: according to which, Simonides hath thus written:

For then, no blasts of wind arose on high, Shaking true-leaves; that men need once to fear Lest they might break sweet songs and melody, Stopping the found from passage to their car.

For oftentimes the agitation of the aire, permitteth not the full, expresse and articulate form of the voice, to reach into the sense of hearing; howbeit, somewhat it carrieth always thorough from it, if the same be multiplied much and forced aloud: as for the night, in it selfe it hath nothing to stir and trouble the air; whereas the day hath one great cause thereof, to wir, the Sun, as Anaxagoras himselfe hath said.

Then The styllus the fon of Ammonius, taking his turn to speak: What should we mean by this I pray you in the name of Jupiter (quoth he) to attribute this cause unto an invisible motion of the party of the state o which they no fooner fee, but they obey and follow; as if together with the new day, they were regenerate again, and entred into another manner of life, as Democritus faith; fetting themselves unto their businesse and affairs, not without tome noise and effectual cries: in which tenie Ibycus called not impertinently the morning, or dawning of the day Clytus, for that now we begin xxxxii, that is to fay, to hear others, yea, and to speak aloud our selves: whereas the air of the night being for the most part calm and still, without any waves and billows, for that every thing is at rest and repose, by all likelihood conveigheth the voice entire and whole unto us, not broken nor diminished one jor, At these words, Aristodemus of Cypres, who was one of our company: But take heed Thrasyllus, (quoth he) that this which you fay be not convinced and refuted by the battels and marches of great Armies in the night feason, for that upon such an occasion the noise and outcries be no lesse. refounding and clear, how troubled and waving foever the air be, then otherwile; and peradventure there is some cause thereof, proceeding also from our selves; for the most part of that which wee speak in the night season, is of this nature, that either we command some body after a turbulent manner, as if a paffion urged us thereto, or if we demand or ask ought, we cry as loud as we can; for that the thing which weakeneth and maketh us to rife at such a time (when as we should sleep and take our repose) for to speak or do any thing, is no small matter or peaceable, but great and important, hasting us for the urgent necessity thereof unto our businesse, in such fort, that our words and voices which then we utter, go from us in greater force and vehemency.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

How it came to passe, that of the sacred games of prize some use one manner of chaplet, and some another, yet all have the branch of the Datetree ? Also why the great Dates be called Nicolai.

During the folemnity of the 16thmick games, at what time as Softie was the Judge and Director thereof now the fe. and time: other feafts of his I avoided; namely, when as he invited one while many strangers together; and otherwhiles a number of noneelle but Citizens, and those one with another: but one time above the rest, when as he feasted those only who were his greateft friends, and all, men of learning, I my selfeasso was a bidden guest, and present among them; now by that time that the first fervice at the table was taken away, there came one unto the profeffed Orator and Rhetorician Herodes, who brought unto him from a Scholar and familiar of his, who had won the prize, for an encomiastical or laudatory Oration that he had made, a branch of the Date tree, together with a pleated and broided Coronet of flowers: which when he had courteoully received, he returned them back to him again, faying withal that he marvelled why fome of the efacted games had for their prize this Crown, and others that, but generally all, a branch of Date tree: For mine own part (quoth he) I cannot perswade my selfe that this ariseth upon that cause which some alledge: namely, the equality and uniformity of the leaves, springing and growing out as they do, alwayes even and orderly, one just against another directly, wherein they feem to contend and strive a vie, resembling thereby a kind of combat: and that victory it selfe took the name in Greek Nui, as it were un dur, that is to fay, not yeelding nor giving place: for there be many other plants which as it were by weight and measure, distribute nourishment equally unto their boughs and branches growing opposite in that manner, and herein observe exactly a wonderful order and equality: but in my conceit, more probability and appearance of reason they alledge, who imagine and suppose, that our ancients made choice of this tree, because they took a love to the beauty, talneffe, and firait growing thereof; and namely Homer, who compareth the beauty of Naufica: the Phaocian Queen, unto the plant or stem of a fair Date tree: for this you all know very well, that in old time they were wont always to cast upon those victorious champions who had won the prize. Rofes, and Rose champion flowers : yea, and some otherwhiles Apples and Pomegranates, thinking by this means to recompence and honour them: but there is nothing else so much in the Datetree, to commend it to evidently above other trees: for in all Greece fruitit beareth none that is good to be eaten, as being unperfect and not ripe enough: and if it bare here as it doth in Spria and Egypt, the Date, which of all fruits for the lovely contentment of the eye, is of all lights most delightiome, and for the sweetnesse of taste, of all banqueting dishes most pleasant, there were not a tree in the world comparable unto it: and verily the great Monarch and Emperor Angustus by report, for that he loved singularly well, one Nicholaus a Philosopher Peripatetick, in regad that he was of gentle nature and tweet behaviour, tall and stender withal of stature, and besides of a ruddy and purple colour in his visege, called the fairest and greatest Dates, after his name, Nicholaus, and to this day they bear that denomination.

In this discourse, Heredes pieased the company no lesse with the mention of Nicholaus the Philo-sopher, than he did with that which he had spoken to the question: And therefore (quoth Sospis) for much the rather ought we every one to devise for to conferre unto this question propounded, whatloever he is periwaded concerning it: Then I for my part first, brought forth mine opinion as touching the superiority of this Date tree at the lacred games, because the glory of victors and conquerors, ought to endure and continue incorruptible, and as much as possibly may be not age and wax old: for the Date tree liveth as long as any plant whatsoever that is longest lived: and this is testified by these verses of Orpheus:

Living as long as plants of Date trees tall. Which in the head be green and spread withall.

And this is the only tree in manner, which hath that property indeed, which is reported though not formely, of many others: And what is that I namely, to carry the leaves firm and falt, fo as they never fall off i for we do not iee, that either the Laurel or Olive tree, nor the Myrtle, nor any other trees which are faid to fied no leafe, keep always the fame leaves fill: but as the first fall, others put forth, and by this means they continue always fresh and green, living evermore as Cities and great Towns do; whereas the Date tree never loteth any of those leaves which once came forth, but continueth fill clad with the same leaves; and this is that vigor as I take it which men dedicate appropriate especially to the forceof strength of victory.

When Sofpis had made an end of this speech, Protogenes the Grammarian calling by name unto Praxitelie, the Discourser and Historian : Shall we suffer these Orators and Rhetoricians (quoth he) after their usual manner and profession, to argue thus by conjectures and likely probabilities; and can we alledge nothing out of Histories pertinent directly unto this matter: and verily for mine own part, if my memory fail me not, I have not read long fince in the Attique Annals, that Thefeus, who first et out games of prize in the Isle Delos, brake and plucked from the sacred Date tree, a branch, which thereupon was called Spadix; and Pravitelis faid as much: But some men(quoth he) might ask of Thefeus himselie, what reason induced him (when he proposed the prize of victory) to pull a branch from the Date tree, rather then from the Laurel or Olive tree ? and what will you fay. It this be a Pythick prize ? for that the Amphylliones honoured first at Delphos, the victors with a branch of Date tree and Laurel, in honour of Pythius Apollo, confidering that the manner was not to consecrate unto that god, the Laurel or Olive onely, but also the Date tree; like as Nicias didwhen in the name of the Athenians, he defrayed the charges of games, in Delos: and the Athenians at Delphi; and before them, Cypfelus the Corinthian; for otherwife, this god of ours hath evermore loved those games of prize, yea, and was desirous to win the victory, having strove personally himselse in playing upon the harp, in singing, and slinging the coit of brasse; yea, and as some say, at hurl-bats and fist-fight; favouring men also, and taking their part at such combats; as Homer seemeth to testifie, when he bringeth in Achilles, speaking in this wise:

Two champions now, who fimply are of all the army belf.
My plenfure is, shall forth advance is and look who is so bless, and look who is so bless, by god Apolloes grace, As for towin the willow, and honour in that place.

Also when he speaketh of archers, he saith expresly, that one of them who invocated upon Apollo and prayed unto him for help, had good successe, and carried away the best prize; but the other, who was so proud, and would not call upon the god for his aid, missed the mark and scope whereat he shot. Neither is it likely or credible, that the Athenians dedicated their publick place of exercise unto Apollo for nothing, and without good cause; but surely thus they thought, that the same God unto whom we are beholden for our health, giveth us also the force and strong disposition of body, to perform such games and feats of activity. But whereas, some combats there be, sleight and easie: others, hard and grievous: we find in writing, that the Delphians facrificed unto Apollo, by the name of Pyttes, that is to say, the champion at fift-fight: but the Candians and Lacedemonians offered sacrifice unto the same god, surnamed the Runner. And seeing as we do, that the manner is to present in his Temple within the City of Delphos, the Princes or dedications of the spoiles and bootygained from the enemies in war, as also to consecrate unto him the Trophees, is not this a great argument and teltimony, that in this god it lieth most to give the victory and conquest; And as hee went forward, and was minded to say more, Cephifus the son of Theon, interrupted his speech, saying: These allegations (beleeve me) savour not of Histories, nor of Cosmographical Books: but being fetched immediately out of the middle of those Peripatetical discourses, are handled and argued probably to the purpole: and besides, whiles you take up the fabrick or engine, after the man-

net of tragedian Players, you intend as it should seem, to affright by intimating the name of Apollo; net of tragetian I ages, your opinions: and yet (as well beteemeth his goodneffe and bounty) he is indifferent and alike affectionate unto all, in elemency and benignity-but we following the tracks and steps of Solpis, who hath led us the way very well, keep our selves to the Date tree, which affordeth us sufficient matter to discourse thereotagain: for the Babylonians do chant and fing the praises of this tree; namely, that it bringerh unto them three hundred and threescore forts of fundry commodities; but we that are Greeks, have little or no profit thereby: howbeit, good Philosophy may be drawn out of it, for the better instructions of champions and such as are to perform combats of prize in that it beareth no fruit with us: for being a right goodly, fair, and very greattree, by reason of the good habit and disposition thereof, yet is it not here among us, fruitful; but by this flrong conflicution that it hath, it employeth and spendeth all nurture to feed and fortifie the body, after the manner of champions, by their exercise, so as there remaineth but a little behind, and the same not effectual for feed: over and above all this, one quality it hath, proper and peculiar to it felfe alore, and that which agreeth not to any other tree, the which I intend to flew unto you. For the woody subflan, e of this Date tree aloft, if a man feem to weigh and prefie down with any heavy burden, it yeeldeth not, nor Hoop ed under the poile, but curbeth upward archwife, as withflanding that, wherewith it is charged and preffed a and even foir is with those com-batants in facred games for fuch as through feebleneffe of body, or taintneffe of heart feem to yeeld, those the said exercises do, bend and keep under; but as many asstoutly abide, not only with their flrong bodies, but also with magnanimous courage, these be they that are raised up on high and mount unto honour:

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that they who sail upon the river Nilus, draw up water for their use, before day light?

One there was, who demanded upon a time the reason, why the watermen who faile and row upon the river Nilus, provided themselves of that water which they drink, in the night, and not by day, Some laid, it was, because they teared the fun, which by enchasing and heating the water, maketh it more subject to corruption and putrifaction: for whatfoever is warmed or made hot, the same is always more ready and disposed to mutation, and doth soon alter, by relaxation of the proper and native quality that it hath: whereas cold, by restraining, seemeth to contain and keep each thing in the own kind or nature; and water, especially. Now for the truth of this, that the coldnesse of water hath vertue to preserve, the snow is a sufficient testimony, which keepeth flesh a long time sweet, and without corruption; but contrariwise, heat causeth all things to goe out of their own nature, yea, even honey it selfe; for being once boiled, marred it is; but if it continue raw, it not only keepeth it selfe well enough, but helpeth to preferve other things: and for a farther proofe of this matter, the water of lakes and pooles is a principal thing to confirm the same; for as potable it is, and as good to drink in Winter, as any other waters: but in Summer, the same is flark naught, and breedeth diseases: and therefore, since the night answereth to Winter, and the day to Summer, those water men of Nilus above faid, are of this opinion: That water will continue longer before it turn and corrupt, it it be drawn in the night season. To these allegations, which of themselves seemed to carry probability enough, reason also inclineth as an evident and inartificial proof to strengthen and confirm the experience and beleefe of these water-men; for they said, that they drew water, whiles the river was yet ftill and quiet; for in the day time, many men either faile upon it, or otherwise, fetch water from it; many beafts also, passeto and fro in it: whereby it is troubled, thick and muddy; and such water will soon putrifie : for whatsoener is mixed, more eafily taketh corruption, than that which is pure and simple, considering that mixture maketh a fight, and fight cauteth change and alteration. Now, who knoweth not that putrifaction is a kind of mutation? which is the cause that Painters call the mixtures of their colours, by the name of odvers, that is to fay, corruptions; and the Poet Homer, when he speaketh of dying, faith, they did using, that is to say, stain and in est: the common use also of our speech carrieth it, to call that which is unmixed and meer of it selfe apaglov adangelov it aneglov, that is to say, incorrupt, and sincere but principally, if earth be mingled with water, it changeth the quality, and marreth the name of it quite for ever, for being potable and good to drink; and therefore it is, that dormant and dead waters, which frand in hollow holes, are more subject to corruption then others, as being ful of earthy substance; whereas, running streams escape this mixture, and repell the earth which is brought into them : good cause therefore, had Hesiodus to commend

For wholesome we hold that which is uncorrupt: and uncorrupt we take that to be, which is all simple, pure and unmixed: and hereto may be adjoined, for toconsim this opinion of theirs, the fundry kinds and differences of earth: for those waters which run thorow hilly and stony grounds, because they carry not with them, much of the earth or foil, are stronger and more firm, then such as passe along marishes, plains and stars. Now the River Noles keeping his course within a level and fost country; and to speak more truely, being (as it were)blood tempered and mingled with steff, is sweet doubtlesse, and sill of pitces that have a strong and nutritive vertue: but ordinarily, the same runneth mixed and troubled; and so much the rather, sit be stirred and disquieted: torthe moving and agitation thereos, mixed the terrestrial substance with the liquid humor: but when it is quiet and at repose, the same settleth down to the bottom, by treason of the weight. Thus you see why they draw up their water in the night season; and withal, by that means they prevent the sunsing, which always doth carch up and corrupt that which is in all waters most subtileand light.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Of those who come late to supper; where, discoursed it its from whence be received these names of refection in Greek discourse, decroy, and decroy.

My younger ions upon a time had staid longer at the Theater, then they should, to see the sights, and hear the ear-sports which there were exhibited; by occasion whereof, they came too late to supper: whereupon Therus sons called them in mirth and sport xanvas days and con-A seaf day, as one would fay, supper-letting, and night-supping-lads, with other such like names : but they, to be meet and quit with them again, gave them the tearm of 792 x dentres. that is to lay, runners to supper. Herewith one of the elder fort there present, said: That he who came late to his fupper, ought rather to becalled 100 200 because he maketh more hafte with an extraordinary pace, for that he hath seemed to stay too long: to which purpose he related a pretty tearm of Barpace, for that he had reclined to they cooling. To which papered he to and a packy could be sure, the buffon or pleasant jetter to Casar, who was wont to call those, ππθυμωθείπτες, that is to say, desirous of suppers. who at any time came tardy: For (quoth he) although they have business. neffe to call and keep them away, yet for the love of good cheer and fweet moriels they refuse not to come (late though itbe) when loever they are invited. Here came I in with the testimony of Po-Incharmus, one of the great Orators, who managed the State of Athens: in an Oration of his, where making an Apology of his life unto the people in a frequent assembly, hespake in this wise: Loe, my Masters of Athens how I have lived: but besides many other things which I have already alledged, take this moreover: that whenloever I was bidden to any supper, I never came last, for this feemed to be very popular and plaufible: whereas contrariwife, men are wont to hate them as odious persons, and suriy Lords, who came late, and for whom the rest of the company are forced to ous perions, and tury soites in the analysis. But Alexas (quoth he) called not Pittaesa. Then Societies willing to defend the young boyes: But Alexas (quoth he) called not Pittaesa. Zaphabarpidas, because he supposed late in the night, but for that it was ordinary with him to delight in none other guests, and table companions, but base, vile, and obsture perions: for to eat early or in one other guests, and table companions. betimes, was in old time counted a reproach : and it is faid, that this word dxegitiona, that is to fay, a breakfast, was derived of a zegitia, that is to lay, intemperance. Then Theon interrupting his speech: Notio (quoth he) but we must give credit rather unto thole who report the an ient manner of life in old time: for they tay, that men in those days being laborious, painful, and temperate in their living withal took for their repast early in the morning, a piece of bread dipped in Wine, and no other thing, and therefore they called this breakfall of theirs, Acratifma, of Acraton, which is meer and pure wine : and as for 640, it fignifieth those viands which were prepared for repast in the evening; for 24s, betokeneth late in the evening, at what time their manner was to sup; namely, after thay had dispatched their other affairs. Here occasion was given to demand from whence were derived thele words Deigrop, that is to fay, supper, and descoy, dinner: and thought it was that Aristonand Acratosma, fignified both one thing: and for proof hereof, they reported them to Homer, who saith: That Eumaus provided Ariston by the break of day, as appeareth by this verfe:

No sooner did day light appears But they prepared their own * dinner.

And it feemeth very probable that this repail $\frac{\partial E}{\partial x}$, took the name of the morn-tide, and is as much to fay, as $\frac{\partial E}{\partial x}$ now for the refection called $\frac{\partial E}{\partial x}$ proper, that is to fay, fupper, it was fo called, $\frac{\partial E}{\partial x}$ proper $\frac{\partial E}{\partial x}$ and $\frac{\partial E}{\partial x}$ proper is gave repose from their labours; for men used to take their supper after they had done some businesse, or else in the very time that they were about the same; this also may be showed by the restimony of $\frac{\partial E}{\partial x}$ proper from the same $\frac{\partial E}{\partial x}$ properties.

But what time as the woodman minding rest, From hewing trees, his supper soon had drest.

Unlesse a man will haply say, that Ariston, that is to say, a dinner or breakfast, took that name, because folk we to dine or break their tast, with that which first came to their hands, without any labout or dressing thereof in the Kitchinand Harrow, that is to say, supper, was so called, because there was some labout imployed about the dressing thereof: and therefore Lesson, is as much to say, as was some labout reproduced to the Harrow, as one would say, Prantition was given, that is to say, one with much pain and travel: But our brother Lamprias, who naturally was given to soft, some will be a like to be merry and to laugh: Since that (quoth he) we are allowed to great some since that it is to say that and task so idlely as we do, I am able to prove unto you, that the Roman liberty for to prate thus and talk so idlely as we do, I am able to prove unto you, that the Roman words are ten thousand times more properly devised, and expresse their things better than the Greek:

Greek : for they called a supper, Cana, which is as much as xona; for the good sellowship and company of those that supped (as it were) in common together: for the old Romans, howsoever they dined or break their falt ordinarily by themselves alone, yet they supped ever with their friends about them. Now their dinner, they called, Prandium, of the hour or time thereof, as if they would fay mup rodion; for rodion is as much as senting, that is to fay, morning or noon-tide at the farthest; and to repole or rest after dinner, is exptessed by the word indiagen: or else perhaps, Prandium, fignifieth a breakfast or morning repast, when as men do eat before they be & A fire, that is to fay, before they have any need or want of victuals: and now to fay nothing of many things, which they expresse by meer Greek words; as for example, how they call beds, Strata, of seduala; wine, Vinum. expirite oy meet Oteck Wotser: honey, Mel, of μέλι: to tafte, Gustar, of γένσεαχ; to dink one un-to another, Propinare, of αφατίθι ; who can deny, but their word, Comessitatio, that is to say, Banqueting, is derived of our Greek word xounds; and Miscere, that is to say, to temper and mix wine, of κε εάζειν in Greek; for thus !aith Homer:

She took the cup, and once again,

In it see tempered pleasant wine, also a table, they called Menss, because it should be nicoo, that is to say, in the midst; and bread Panis, for that it flaked affrar, that is to fay, hunger; also a chaplet, or garland of flowers, Corona, of the word redo an helmet, or redoor the head, for in one place, Homer called an helmet, or head-piece, securit, that is to fay, Corona, a coronet; likewife, Cadere, that is to fay, to beat or kill, of degen; and Dentes, that is to lay, teeth, of of of offer; and last of all, Labra, that is to lay, lips, of nager Boer, that is to fay, receiving and taking in meat with them. To conclude therefore, either we are to hear fuch derivations as these, without laughing thereat; or else we must not give them so easie accesse (as it were by undermining) unto words, as unto walls; partly to overthrow and beat down fome, and in part to batter and break others.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Of certain Pythagorean precepts, for bidding in any wife to admit swallows into the house, and commanding to ruffle the bed cloaths, so soon as aman is risen.

Stlla of Carthage, upon my return to Rome, after I had been long ablent, invited me to a supper for my welcome home; for so the Romans tearmed such a courtesse; and to bear me company, he bade other friends, and those not many in number; among whom was one Lucius of Tuskane, a disciple of the Pythagorean Philosopher, Moderatus: this Lucius perceiving that our Philinus did eat of nothing which ever had life (as the usual manner of him and other Pythagoreans was to doe) fell into speech as touching Pythagoras himselfe, and affirmed that a Tuskane hee was, not as some others, because his Fathers and Ancestors, were Tuskans, from whom he was descended; but for that he was himselse born, reared, brought up, and taught in Tuskan; which hee proved principally, by certain Symbolical and Allegorical precepts of his; as for example, among others, that he commanded those who were new risen out of their beds, to ruffle the cloaths together; also that the print of a pot or cauldron, should not be left upon the ashes, after it is taken away, but that the after ought to be firred together; Item, that no Swallows should be admitted into the house: likewise that no man should step over a besome, nor keep within house, those creatures which had hooked claws: For these rules, and such like (quoth he) which the Pythagoreans deliver in word, and fet down in writing, the Tuskans only observe and keep indeed. Which For Philo. When Lucius had faid, strange it was thought, and absurd above the rest, to chase and keep out of mela was tur- the house filly Swallows, harmlesse and gentle creatures, as well as those that have crooked clees, which are the most bloody and cruel of all others: for whereas some ancient interpreters gave the into a Swal folution and exposition only, as if covertly it implyed thus much, that we should avoid the compaway, who procured her, ny of fecret whisperers, back-biters and slanderers; Lucius himselfe approved not thereof; for the filter Propae Swallow whispereth not at all; it chattereth indeed and talketh (as one would say) loud enough; to kaliber: own child, and yet not more then Pies, Partridges and Hens. But what think you by this (quoth Sylla) that in regard of the tale that goes of Progne, who killed her young fon Itys, they hate * Swallows for that abominable act, and therefore would feem to cause us for to detest a farre off, such infamous and there is that abominable act, and therefore would been to caute us not to determ a raise of the property of the same and cafes, for which they say, both Teens and the women, partly did perpetrate, and in part suffered himas all cases, for which they say, both Teens and the women that the same day, the same say the same says the same says that the same says the same says that the same says the same says that the same says the same says that the same says that the same says that the same says that the same says the same says that the same says the same says that the same says that the same says that the same says that the same says the same says that the same says that the same says the same says that the same says that the same says the same says that the same says the same say of meat, to the boord, for horrible and unlawful things; whereupon, to this very day, these birds be called Daulides? But that he had Gorgias the Sophister, by occasion that a swallow mewted over his head, and squirted her dung upon him looking up unto her: There be no fair casts (quoth he) Philomela; or is this also common to the rest? for the Pythagoreans do not exclude or banish out of house the Nightingale, * which *For Progre beareth a part in the same Tragedies, and is faulty with the rest. Peradventure (quoth I then) there (as heals is as much reason in the one as the other (O Syllas) but consider, & see whether the Swallow be not goe.) was odious & infamous with them for the same cause that they reject and wil not entertain those creaand an area which have hooked tallons; for the likewise recens upon nears, and concession the ground, See Nata's reth especially, grash oppers, which are facred and musical is moreover, the fliest close by the ground, Comes My- hunting and catching little filly creatures (as Arifforle faith;) furthermore, shee is the onely creature of all the other, that bee under the same roofe with us, which lodgeth there of free cost, living without contributing ought, or paying any rent: yet the flork which hathno covert by our house, nor warmth by our fire, ne yet enjoyeth any benefit, pleasure, or help at all by our means, giveth us otherwhiles some tribute and custome (as it were) for marching only upon the ground; for up and down the goes, killing toades and terpents, mortall enemies to mankind, and lying in wait for our lives; whereas the Swallow having all those commodities at our hands, no sooner hath nourished her young ones, and brought them to some perfection, but away she goes and is no more to be feen, to disloial and unthankfull she is: and that which of all others is worst, the flie and the swallow be the only creatures haunting our houses as they do, that never will be tamed nor fuffer a man to touch and handle them, nay, they will not admit any fellow ship, society, or communion with him, either in work or play: the flie indeed hath some reason to be afraid of us, for that the fustaineth harm by us, and is chased and driven away so often: but the swallow hateth man naturally, the will not truth him, but remaineth alwayes suspicious and untamed : now if we areto take these and such like speeches, not directly according to the literall sense, and as the words only do imply, but rather by way of an oblique reflexion, as the refemblances of things appearing in others: certes, Pythageras proposeth unto us herein, the very pattern of an unthankfull and faithless person, admonishing us not to receive unto our familiar acquaintance and amity, those who for the time, and to serve their own turne, draw neer unto us, and retire themselves under the roof of our house, and that we ought not to make them inward with us, communicating with them, our house, our domestical altar, and those things which are instead of most sacred obligations. When I had thus faid, it feemed that I had given the company encouragement and afsurance to speak, for they began boldly to apply unto the other symbolicall precepts, their morall expositions: And Philinus for his part said, that in commanding to confound the formeofthe pot or caldron imprinted in the ashes, they taught us this lesson, not to leave any mark or apparent impression of anger; but after it hath once done boiling what it will, and is settled and cool ed again, to ridde away all ranckor and malice, yea, and to bury all in perpetual oblivion. As for the shuffling of the bed clothes together, when we are newly risen, some thought there was no hidden matter meant thereby, but fignified only, that it was not feemly or honest, that the mark or print in the bed should remain as an express image to be seen, of the place, wherin man and wife had laine together: But Silla guessed otherwise &conjectured that herein was conteined a dehorttion to divert us from fleeping on bed in day the time, when as even in the very morning the preparation and means to fleep was fo immediately taken away: for that we ought to take our rest and repose in the night, but in the day time to be stirring and about our business, not suffering to remain in our beds so much as the tract of our body; for a man lying asleep, is good for nothing, no more then when he is dead:and hereto feemeth to allude and accord, another precept of the Pythagoreans which they give unto their friends, forbidding them not to ease any man of his burden, but rather to lay on more, and feem to furcharge him still, as not approving any floth or idleness whatfoever: now for that during these discourses, Lucius neither approved nor disproved ought that was faid, but fat still, heard all, faid nothing, and pondred every thing in himselfe: Empedocles calling unto Silla by name, faid as followeth.

HE EIGHTH QUESTION.

Why the Pythagoreans among all other living creatures, absteine most from eating fish?

F Lucius our friend (quoth he) be offended, or take no pleasure in our sayings, it is high time that we should give over and make an end: but if these things fall within their precept for silence; yet this I think ought not to be concealed; but may well be revealed and communicated unto others, namely: What the reason is, that the Pythagoreans abiteined principally from eatting fish? for so much we find written of the ancient Pythagoreans: and I my selfe have fallen into the company and conference of certain disciples of Alexicrates, a man of our time; who fed a little sometimes of other living creatures, yea, and sacrificed them unto the gods; but for no good in the world would they so much as tast of a fish : not as I take it for that cause which Tyndares the Lacedæmonian alledged, who thought that this was done for the honour they had to filence; in regard whereof, the philosopher Empedocles whose name I bear, who was the first that ceased to teach Pythagorically, that is to fay, to give rules and precepts of hidden wildome, calleth fishes Ellopas, as having This one handfolm, that is to say, their voice tied and shut up within; but for they thought, taciturnity to be a fingular and a divine thing, and in one word, that even the gods themselves doe shew by deeds and effects, without voice or speech unto wise men, what their will and pleasure is. Then Lucius mildly and simply answered: That the true cause indeed might per dventure lie hidden still and not be divulged: howbeit, there is nothing to hinder or let us, but that we may render one reason or other which carrieth with it some likelihood and probability: so Theon the grammarian began first to discourse upon that point saying: it was very difficult to shew and prove that Pythagoras was a Tustan born; but for certain known it was, that he had made his abode a long time in Aegypt, and converted with the fages of that countrey, where he approved, embraced, and highly extolled many of their religious ceremonies, and namely that as touching beanes: for Herodotus writeth, that the Aegyptians neither fow, nor ear beanes, no nor can abide fomu has to look upon them: and as for fishes, we are adjured that their priests even at this day, abitein from them, and living as they do, chaste and unmarried, they reluse salt likewife; neither will they endure to eat it as a meat by it felfe, nor any other viands wherein any sea salt commeth; whereof divers men alledge divers and sundry reasons: but there is one true caule indeed, and that is the emnity which they bear unto the lea, as being a favage elem nt, a meet alien, and estranged from us, or to speak more truly, a mortall enemy to mans nature; for the gods are not nourished therewith, as the Stoicks were of opinion: that the stars were fed from thence but contrariwise, that in it was lost the father and saviour of that countrey of Aegypt, which they call the deflux or running out of Ofiris, and in lamenting his generation on the right hand, and corruption on the left, covertly they gave us to understand, the end and perdition of Nilus in the lea: In which consideration, they are of opinion, that lawfull it is not, once to drink of the water, as being not potable; neither do they think, that any thing which it breedeth, bringeth for th, or nourisheth, is clean and meet for man; confidering that the same hath not breath and respiration common with us, nor food and pasture agreeable unto ours; for that the very aire which nourisheth and maintaineth all other living (reatures, is pernicious and deadly unto them, as if they were engendred first, and lived afterward in this world against the course of nature, and for nouse at all : and marvell we must not, if for the hatred they bear unto the sea, they hold the creatures therein, as flrangers, and neither meet nor worthy to be intermingled with their bloud or vitall spirits: seeing they will not deigne so much as to salute any pilots or maxiners whensoever

Sylla commending this discourse, added moreover, as touching the Pythagoreans, that when they facrificed unto the gods; they would especially talt of the primites or parcels of flesh which they had killed: but never was there any fifth that they facrificed or offered unto the gods. Now when they had finished their speech, I came in with mine opinion: As for those Aegyptians squoth I many men there be as well learned, as ignorant, who contradict them, and plead in the behalfe and desence of the sea, recounting the manifold commodities thereof, whereby our lite is more plentifull, pleasant, and happy: as touching the surcease as it were of the Pythagoreans war, and their forbearing to lay hand upon fishes, because they are such strangers unto us, it is a very absurd & aidiculous device; or to fay more truly, it is a cruell and inhumane part, and favoring much of a batharous Cyclops, seeing that to other living creatures they render a reward and recompence, fortheir kindred, consenage and acquaintance, by killing, eating, and consuming them as they do: and wertly reported it is of Pythagoras, that upon a time he bought of the Fishers a draught of fish; and when he had so done, commanded that they should all be let out of the net into the sea again : surely this was not the act of a man, who either hated or despised fishes as his enemies or strangers; considering that finding them prisoners as he did, he paied for their ransome, & redeemed their liberty, as if they had been his kinsfolk and good triends: & therefore the humanity, equity, and mildness of thele men induceth us to think and imagine clean contrary, that it was rather for some exercise of justice, or to keep themselves in ure and custome thereof, that they spared and pardoned those seacreatures; for that all others give men cause in some fort to hurt them; whereas poor fishes offend us in no manner: and fay their nature and will were so disposed, yet cannot they execute the same: moreover, conjecture we may and collect, by the reports, records, and facrifices of our ancients, that they thought it an horrible and abominable thing, not only to eat, but also to kill any beaft that doch no hurt or damage unto us : but seeing in processe of time how much pessered they were, with a number of beafts that grew upon them, and over-spread the face of the earth; and withail being as it is faid, commanded by the order of Apollo at Delphos, to succour the fruits of the earth, which were ready to perish; they began then to kill them for sacrifice unto the gods: yet info doing they seemed to tremble and sear, as troubled in mind, calling this their action and piger, that is to say, to do or perpetrate, as if they did, and committed some great deed in killing a creature having life; and even still at this day they observe a ceremony with all religious preciseness, not to massacre any beast before it hath given a nod with his head, after the libations & essuions of wine upon it, in figne and token of consent; so strict they were and wary to commit no unjust act. Certes, to lay nothing of other beafts, if all men had forborn to kill and eat no more, but pullen and conies, within short time they should not have been able to have dwelt within their towns or cities, nor enjoyed any fruits of the earth: and therefore although necessity at the first had brought in the use of eating flesh; a very hard matter it were now in regard of pleafure, to put down and abolish the same: whereas the whole kind of sea-creatures using neither the same aire and water with us, nor comming neer unto our fruits, but being (as a man would fay) comprised within an other world, and having distinct bounds and limits of their own, which they cannot pals, but immediately it coffeth them their life, for punishment of their treipass giveth unto our belly none occasion or preten e at all, more or less, to run upon them: so that the who'e hunting, arching ard running after fish, is a manifest work of gormandile and dainty feeding; which without any just or lawfull cause, troubleth and disquieteth the seas, and descendeth into the very bottom of the deep; for we have no reason at any time to call the red lea-barbell ant-Bornea that is to fay, corn-devourer; nor the guilt-head Teuynoayds that is to fay wine walter, orgrap-eater, nor yet any mullets, lubins, or sea pikes, σπερμολόγες that is to say, seed-gatherers, as we name divers land beafts, noting them thereby for the harme and annoiance they do unto us : neither can we impute unto the greatest fish in the sea, the least wrong or shrewd turne, where-* Some us: nettered and parlimony, some cat or wezill, mouse, or rat which read with we charge, in our exceeding neerness and parlimony, some cat or wezill, mouse, or rat which read with with western which regard, they precisely containing themselves, not for sear of law only, a sie, naunt out no. in the world that doth them no harme, nor displeasure, nsed to seed on fish less than on any other meat: and admit there were no unjustice in the thing, all busine cutiosity of men in this point, being io needless as it is, bewraieth great intemperance and wastfull gluttony: and therefore Homer in his poem devileth this, that not only the Greeks encamping upon the freight of Hellifpom, abteined wholy from eating fifth, but also that the delicate and dainty toothed Pheacians, the wanton and licorous woers likewise of lady Penelope, dissolute though they were otherwise, and all islanders, were never served at their tables with any viands or cates from the sea, no nor the companions of Ulystes in that great and long voiage of theirs which they had at sea, ever laid hook, leape, or weele, or cast net into the sea for fish, so long as they had a bit of bread, or handfull of meal left:

But when their ship had victuals none, But all therein was spent and gone, even a little before that they laid hands upon the Cowes of the sun, then began they to fish & not iwis for any dainty diffies, but even for necessary food:

With bended hooks, for now their man Great hunger bit, and guts did gnaw.

So that for extreme need they were forced to eat fish, and to kill the sunnes kine: whereby we may perceive that it was a point of fanctimony and chastity, not only among the Aegyptians and Syrians, but the Greeks also, to torbear feeding upon fish; for that besides the injustice of the thing, they abhorred as I think, the superfluous curiosity of such sood.

Hereupon Neftor took occasion to speak: And why (quoth he) is there no reckoning made of my countrey-men and fellow-citizens, no more than of the Megarians? and yet you have heard me to say often times, that the priests of Neptune, whom we call Hieromnemones, never eat fish: for this god is immamed Pytholmias, that is to lay, the President of breeding and generation in the sea: and the race descending from that ancient Hellen, sacrificed unto Neptune, by the name and addition of Patrogeneios, that is to fay, the flock-father and principall Progenitor, being of opinion, that man came of a moist and liquid substance, as also, be the Syrians; which is the very cause they worship and adore a fish, as being of the same kind, generation, and nouriture with themselves : philosophizing and arguing in this point, with more apparence and shew of reason, than Anaximander did, who affirmed not, that men and fishes were bred both in the same places; but avouched that men were first engendered within fishes themselves, and there nourished like their young frie; but afterwards, when they became sufficient and able to shift and help themselves, they were calt forth, and to took land: like astherefore, the fire eatern the wood, whereby it was kindled * Or critical and fet a burning, though it were father and mother both, unto it; according as he faid, who inferted the matriage of * Ceyx among the works of Hesiodus; even so Anaximander in pronouncing, that fifth was both father and mother to men, taxeth and condemneth the feeding thereupon.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

Whether it be possible, that new diseases may be engendred by our meats?

 \mathbf{P}^{Hilo} the physician conflantly affirmed, that the leprose, called Elephania fit, was a disease not known long since for that none of the ancient physicians made any mention of this maladie; whereas they travelled and bused their brains, to treat of other small trifling matters, (I wot not what) and yet such subtilties as the common fortcould hardly comprehend. But I produced and alledged unto him for a witness out of philosophy, Athenodorus, who in the first book of his Epidemiall or popular diseases, writeth, that not only the said leprosie, but also Hydrophobie, that is to fay, the lear of water, occasioned by the biting of a mad dog, were first discovered in the dayes of Astepiada: now as the company there present, marvelled that these maladies should newly then begin, and take their confiftence in nature; fo they wondered as much on the other fide, how lo great and grievous diseases could be hidden so long, and unknown to men: howbeit, the greater part inclined to this second and latter opinion, as being more respective and savourable to man; for that they could not be perswaded, that nature in such cases should in mans body (as it were in some city) fludy novelties, and be evermore inventing & working new matters. As for Diogenianas, he faid, that thepassions & maladies of the soul, held on their common course, and went the customed way fill of their predecessors: And yet (quoth he) wickedness is very manifold in sundry forts, and exceeding audacious, to enterprize any thing; and themind is a mistresse of her-felfe, and at her own command; having puissance to turne and change easily as she thinketh good, and yet that disordinate consusson of hers, hath some order in it is keeping a measure in her passions, and containing her-felfe within certain bounds, like as the fea, in the flowings and tides; in such fort as that the bringeth forth no new kind of vice, such as hath not been known unto those in old time, and of which they have not written for there being many different forts of lufts and defires, infinite motions of fear, as many kinds of pain, and no fewer formes of pleafure; and which require great labour to reckon up and not to give over.

Since when they fift to men befull, nor yet whereupon any new malady or modern passion hath arisen in our body; considering it hath not of it selfe the beginning of motion properly as the soul hath, but is knit and joyned with nature by common caules, and composed with a certain temperature: the infinite variety thereof, wandereth notwithstanding within the pourprise of set bounds and limits; like unto a vessell lying at anchor in the sea, nevertheless doth wave, and is tossed within a round compassfor neither the settled constitution of a disease is without some cause, bringing into the world irregularly and against all law of nature, a generation and power from that which hath no being at all, nor an easie matter is it for a man to find out a new cause, unless withall, hedo set down a new aire, strange water, and fuch meats as our forefathers never tafted of, imagining, that they are run hither to us and never before, out of (I wot not what) other worlds; or imaginary inter-worlds and spaces between; for fick we fall by means of the same things whereof we live; and no peculiar and proper seeds there be of difeases; but the naughtiness and corruption of such things whereby we live, in regard of us, and our own faults and errors besides, about them, are they which trouble and offend nature: these troubles have perpetually the same differences, though the same many times take new names; for these names are according to the ordinance and custome of men; but the maladiesthemfelves are the affections of nature: and so those diseases of themselves finite, being varied and diverfified by these names infinite, have deceived and beguiled us: and as there is not lightly and upon asidden, committed in the Grammaticall parts of speech, or in the Syntaxis, and construction thereof, any new barbarism, solectim, or incongruity; even so the temperatures of mens bodies, have their falls, errors and transgressions, which be certain and determinate, considering that in fome fort, even those things which are against nature, be comprised and included in nature; and this is it, that the witty inventers and devifers offables, would fignifie in faying: That when the giants made war against the gods, there were ingendred certain strange and monstrous creatures every way, at what time as the moon was turned clean contrary, and arose not as as she was wont : and verily, their meaning was, that nature produced new maladies, like unto monsters, but withall, imagine and devife a cause of such change and alteration, that is neither probable nor incredible; pronouncing and affirming, that the augmentation more or less of some diseases, causeth that newness and diverfity in them, which is not well done of them (mygood friend Philip:) for this internition and augmentation may well adde thereunto frequency and greatness; but surely it transporteth not the subject thing out of the first and primitive kind: and thus I suppose the septone or elephaniasis to nothing elie, but the vehemency of these scurvy and scabby infections; as also the Hydrophobie, or vain fear of water, no other augmentation of the passions of stomack or melancholy: and verily, a wonder it were, that we should not know how Homer was not ignorant thereof; for this is very certain, that he calle a dog Augustieg, of this raging accident whereto he is subject: and hereupon men alio, when they are in a rage, be faid likewife auaiar. When Diogenianus had thus discoursed, Philip himselfe, both seemed somewhat to answer and refute his reasons; and also requested meto speak in the behalfe of the antient Physicians, who were thus challenged and condemned for their ignorance or diligence in these principall matters, in case it were true, that these maladies were not of a latter breed and more modern than their age. First therefore, it seemed unto me, that Diogenianus put not this well down for a good supposall, that tentions and relaxations, according to more or less make no differences, not remove the subject matters out of their kind for by this means we should likewise say, that vineger differed not from wine that is sowring, nor bitterness from stipicity or foureness nor darnell from wheat ne yet garden mints from wilde mints: but evident it is, that these do degenerate, yea, and become altered in their very qualities; partly by relaxitations, as the things do languish and lose their heart; and in part, by reason, as they be reenforced, and take vigor: for otherwife, we must be lorced to say, that the slame different not from a white or cleer wind, not a light from a slame, nor trost from dew, nor hail from rain; but that all these be but the inforcements only and tentions of the same thing; and so constantly we shall be driven to affirme, but blindnesse and dim fight differ not, and inordinate passion of vomiting, called Cholera, is nothing different from a keckish stomack and a desire to cast, but only according to augmentation and diminution, more or less: and all this is nothing to the purpose; for if they admit and fay, that this very tention and augmentation in vehemency, came but now of late, as if this novelty were occasioned by the quantity and not the quality, yet the absurdity of the paradox remaineth neverthelesse: moreover, seeing that Sophocles (speaking of those things, which because they had not been in times past, men would not believe to be at this present Isaid very well in this wife:

All kind of things both good and bad, Once at the first their being had

This alto seemeth very probable and to stand with great reason, that maladies xan not forth all at once, at if the barriers had been fet open for the race, and they let out together: but some came once, at a the control of the came alwayes fucceffively behind at the taile of others, and each one took the first beginning at a certain time: And aman may well conjecture and guels (quoth I) that fuch as arole of want and indigence, as also those that came of heat and cold, were the first that affailed our bodies; but repletions, gluttonies, and delicate pleasures, came afterward together with floth and idleness; which by reaion of abundance of victuals, cauled great thore of superfluity and excrements, from whence proceeded fundry forts of maladies; the complication whereor and intermixture one with another, bringeth evermore some new thing or other: for every naturall thing, is orderly, and imited: because that nature is nothing else but order it selfe, or at leastwise the work of order: whereas disorder (like to the fand which Pindarin speaketh of) is infinit and cannot be comprised within any certain number; fo that whatfoever is unnaturall, the fame immediately is unlimited and infinit : for. the truth we cannot deliver but one way; mary to lie, a man may find an infinit number of means, by occasion of innumerable occurrents; also accords muticall and harmonies, stand upon their certain proportions; but the errors that men commit in playing upon the harp or other influment, in fong, and in dancing, who is able to comprehend? although Phrynichus the tragedian poet faid of himselfe thus:

In dance I find as many forts And formes of gestures and disports, As waves in sea, and billowes strong Arise by temp stall night long,

And Chrysppus writeth that the divers complications of the ten propositions, which they call Axioms, and no more, furmount the number of ten hundred thouland; but Hipparchus reproved this, and taught that the affirmative doth contain of connexed propositions one hundred thousand, and bendes, one thousand forty and nine; but the negative of the same propositions comprehendeth three hundred and ten thousand, with a surplusage of nine hundred, fitty and two: and Xeno-grates hath set down, that the number of syllables, which the letters in the alphabet, being coupled and combined together, do afford, amount to the number of one hundred millions, and two hundred thouland over: why should it therefore be thought strange and wonderfull, that our body having in it so many faculties, and gathering still daily, by that which it eateth and drinketh, so many different qualities, considering withall, that it useth motions and mutations, which keep not one time nor the same order alwayes; the complications and mixtures of so many things together, bring evermore new & unusuall kindes of maladie, such as Thucydides wrot, was the peltilence at Athens, conjecturing that this was no ordinary and usuall malady, by this especially, for that the beafts of prey, which otherwise did eat of flesh, would not touch a dead body: those also who fell fick about the red lea (as Agathircides maketh report) were afflicted with strangelymptomes and accidents, which no man had ever read or feen, and among others, that there crawled from them certain vermin like small serpents, which did eat the calves of their legs and the brawnes of their armes; and look whenloever a man thought to touch them, in they would again, and winding about the muskles of the flesh, ingendered inflammations & impostumes with intolerable paine. This pestilent difeate, no man ever knew before, neither was it ever feen fince by others, but by them alone, like as many other fuch like accidents; for there was a man who having been a long time tormented with the difury or difficulty of his urin, delivered in the end by his yard, a barly fraw knotted as it was with joints: and we know a friend and guest of ours, a young man, who together with a great quantity of naturall feed, call forth a little hairy worme or vermin with many feet, and therewith it ran very twiftly: Ariftoile writeth also, that the nurse of one Timon of Cilicia, retired her felle for two months space every year, and lurked in a certain cave all the while, without drink or meat, or giving any other apparence of life, but only that she tooke her breath: certes, recorded it is in the Melonian books, that it is a certain figne of the liver difeated, when the fick party is very butie in fpying, feeking, and chafing the mice and rats about the house; a thing that now adayes is not feem let us not marvell therefore, if a thing be now engendered that never was feen before, and the same afterwards cease as if it had been; for the cause lieth in the nature of the body, which sometime taketh one temperature, and some while another : but if Diogenianus bring a new aire, and a strange water, let him alone, seeing he is so disposed: and yet we know well that the followres of Democritus both fay, and write, that by the worlds which perish without this, and by the strange bodies which from that infinite of worlds runne into this, there arise many times the beginnings of plague and pestilence, yea, and of other ordinary accidents: we will passe over likewise the particular corruptions which happen in divers countries, either by earthquakes, excessive draughts, extreme heats, and unusuall raines, with which it cannot be chosen, but that both winds and rivers, which arise out of the earth, must needs be likewise insected, diseased, and altered: but howsoever those causes we let go, yet omit wemust not, what great alterations be in our bodies, occasioned by our meats and viands, and other diet and ulage of our felves; for many things which before time were not wont to be tafted or eaten, are become now most pleasant dainties; as for example: the drink made of hony and wine; as also the delicate dish of a farrowing swines shape or womb; as for the brain of a beast, it is faid, that in old time they were wont to reject and cast it from them, yea, and so much to detest and abhorre it, that they would not abide to hear one to name it; and for the cucumber, the melon or pompion, the pomecitron and pepper, I know many old folk at this day, that cannot away with their taile: credible it is therefore, that our bodies receive a wonderfull change and strange alteration by such things in their temperature, acquiring by little and little a divers quality, and superfluity of excrements far different from those before: semblably we are to beleeve that the change of order in our viands, maketh much hereto; for the services at the board, which in times past were called the cold tables, to wit, of oisters, sea-urchings, green fallads of taw lettuce, and such other herbs, be as it were the light forerunners of the feast, as transferred now by Plato from the rere-ward to the forefront, and have the first place, whereas before in old time. they came in last: a great matter there is also in those beaver, or fore-drinkings called Propomata, for our ancients would not drink to much as water before they did eat; and now adayes, when as men are otherwise safting and have eat nothing, they will be in manner drunk, and after they have well drenched their bodies, they begin to fall unto their meats, and whiles they be yet boiling, they put into the flomack those things that be attenuant, incisive and sharp, for to provoke and flir up the appetite, and ftillfill themselves up full with other viands: but none of all this hath more power to make mutation in our bodies, nor to breed new maladies, than the variety of fundry fashions, of bathing our flesh: for first and formost it is made soft, liquid, and fluid as ironis by the fire, and afterwards it receiveth the temper and tineture of hardfleed, by cold water: so that methinks if anyone of those who lived a little before us should fee the dore of our stoughes and baines open, he might say thus:

Here into runneth Acheron,

And fire like burning Phlegethon, Whereas in our forefathers dayes, they used their bathes and hot houses, so milde, so kinde, and temperate: that king Alexander the Great, being in a fever, lay and flept within them: yea, the Gaules wives, bringing thither their pots of pottage, and other viands, did eat even there with their childen, who bathed together with them but it feemeth in theie dayes, that those who are within the stouphes and baines, be like unto those that are raging mad, and bark as dogs, they puff and blow like fed (wine, they lay about them and tofs every way; the aire that they draw in, as it were mingled with fire and water, fuffereth no piece nor corner of the body in quiet and reft, it shaketh, tof-ieth, and removeth out of place, the least indivisible parcell thereof, until such time as we come to quench and allay the same thus inflamed and boiling as they do: There is no need therefore O Diogenianus (quoth 1) of forrein and farfetched causes from without, neither of those new worlds and intervals between for to go no further than to our felves, the very change only of the fashion of our diet, is a sufficient means both to breed, and also to abolish and cause to ease any malady in us.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that we take least heed of dreames in the end of Autumn, and give small credit

Florest lighting upon physical problemes or naturall questions of Aristotle, which were brought to Thermopple, for to pais the time away, filled both himselfe with many doubts, as ordinarily men do, who are by nature studious, and also put as many into the heads of others, giving testimony herein to Ariffal; who faith: that much knowledge breedeth many occasions of doubt; as for other questions, they afforded unto us no unpleasant pastime and recreation, in the day time as we walked in the galleries abroad; but that problem concerning dreams, (namely, that they be uncertain, lying, and falle, especially during those months when trees shed their leaves) was set on foot againe (I wot not how) after supper by Phavorinus, when he had done with other discourses: As for your familiar companions my children, they were of opinion, that Aristotle himselfe had sufficiently solved the question, and there needed no further enquiry into the matter, nor any speech more to be made thereof, but even to attribute the cause, as he did, to the new gathered fruits of that leason: for being as they were, fresh and green still in their strength and full of vigour, they engendred in our bodies many ventofities and bred much trouble, and agitation in the humours: for likely it is not, that new winealone doth work, boile, and chafe, nor that oile only, being new drawn and pressed, yeeldeth a noise as it burneth in lamps, by occasion that the heart canseth the windiness and spirit thereof to evaporate and walm out: but we see also that come newly inned, and all fruits of trees prefently upon their gathering, are plump, full, and swelled again, untill such time as they have exhalted forthall that is flatuous, and breathed out the crudities thereof: now that there be certain meats that cause troublesome dreams, and engender turbulent visions and fanfies in our fleep, they brought in and alledged for their testimony the instance of beans, and the head of the poulp or pour-cuttle fish, which they are bidden to abstain from, who would divine and foreshew things that come by dreams. As for Phavorinus, howsoever he was himselfe at all times wonderfully affected and addicted to Aristotle, and one who attributed unto the Peripateticks schoole this singular commendation, that their doctrine carried more probability and resemblance of the truth, than other Philosophers whatsoever; yet at this present he came out with an old rulty reason of Democritustaken out of the imoak (where it had gathered a deale of thick foot) for to furbish, scoure, and make it bright again: for this was the vulgar opinion which Democritus put down fora supposition: That certain images do enter and pierce deep into our bodies through the pores, which as they rife again from the bottom, cause those visions which appear unto through the pithat these came out of all parts wandring; as presented from utentils, habitiments & ne as we have the property of naving thinketh (who thus far forth followeth Democritus & leaveth him there) but also drawing therewith the apparences of the motions of the mind, of counsell, of unual milde affections, as also of vehement paffions, wherewith they entring in, do speak as if they were living things, and diffinelly carry unto those that receive the same, the opinions, the words, the discourses and affections of such as to those same, if in their entrance they retain still the express figures and nothing confused; which they do especially, all while that their way and passage through the aire, cleer and united, is fpeedy, quick, and not empeached by any hinderance: confidering then, that the aire of the Autumnall quarter, in the end when as trees do cast their leaves, hath much asperity and inequality, it turneth ande and putteth by diverfly those images, causing their evidence to be seeble and tranfitory, as being darkened by the tradity and flowness of their pace in the way: whereas contrariwie, when they run forth in great number, and twiftly out of those things that swell with fullness, andburn, as it were, with dehre to be delivered of them, then as they pass they yeeld their resemblances all fresh and very significant. After this, casting his eye upon Autobalus, and smiling withall: Methinks (quoth he) that I perceive you, and those about you, to address your selves already for to maintain a kind of fight against these images, and that you meane to fisten with your hands and catch hold of this old opinion, as it it were some rotten picture, to do it some violence: Go to (quoth Amobalus) will you never leave these fashions, to play with us in this manner? for we know well enough iwis, that you hold and approve the opinion of Ariffole, and that for to give a lustre thereto, you have fet this of Democritus by it as a shadow and foile: that conceit therefore of Democratus, we will turn over and put by, and take in hand for to impugne this reason of Ariforles, which imputethall to these new fruits, and unjustly without all reason, blaming and discrediting that which we all love to well; for both Summer and Autumne will bear witness, that when we eat these fruits, more fresh and green, even at such time as they are most succulent, and verdaft: (as Antimachus faid) our dreams are less lying and deceitfull: but these months which we name, the Fall of the leaf, pitching their tents as it were, and taking up their flandings close to the Winter, have reduced already, both corn of the field, and also the fruits of trees, which remain uneaten by their perfect concoction, to this pass that they look slender, and in some fort riveled, as having loft by this time, that violent, heady, and furious force which was in them. As touching new wine, they that drink it toonest, do it in the month * Anthisteron, that is to say, February, pre- * Some fently after winter, att that day upon which they begin to talt it, we in our countrey call dyans read No. iently after winter, and that day upon which they obtain any the notification of their vember, status to fay, the day of good fortune; but the Athenians name it, of opening their vember, status to fay, the day of good fortune; but the Athenians name it, of opening their vember, tunnes of wine vessels, Pithagia: but so long as the Must or new wine is working still, and in the hear, written, ic, we see, that all men even the very artificers and labourers are affraid to tast of it, and to meddle with cording to all-forbear therefore to flander and blame the good gifts of the gods, and go wee rather another way Theedrust to work for the inquisition of the cause, unto which the very name of the season, and of these windy Gaza. and vain dreams doth lead us: for this time is called φολλοχό@, that is to fay, the fall of the leaf to wit, the end of Autumne; when by reason of cold, and driness, trees shed their leaves, unless it be some which are hot and fatty, by hature, as the olive, the lawrell, and the date trees, or very moilt, as the ivie and myrtle; for such as these, their temperature helpeth, others not, by reason that this glutinous humour which holdeth the leaves upon the tree, continueth not; because that their naturall humidity is congealed with cold, or else dried up, being so feeble and little with all to flourish therefore, to grow, and to be fresh, in plants, and much more in living creatures, commeth of moisture and heat; and contrariwile, cold and driness are deadly enemies: and therefore Homer very properly, is wont to call men who are fresh and lusty sugar, that is to say, moist and fucculent, as also to joy and be merry, he expresseth by the verb lairedy, that is to say, to be hot Contrariwife, that which is dolorous and fearfull, he tearmeth gryedards at neureds, that is to fay, liff and flarkforcold .: a body that is dead, he tearmeth anisas, that is to lay, without moissures as allo exertes, that is to fay, a very anatomy, dried in the imoak, or against the sun; which are two words deviled to traduce and note their extreme driness: moreover, bloud which is the thing within us, of principall strength and vertue, is both hot and moist, but old age is destitute both of the one and the other; now it seemeth that the latter end of Autumne is the very age of the year, having performed his revolution; for as yet the moisture is not come, but the heat is gone already, or at leaftwife is very feeble and that (which is a great figne of cold and driness) this season causeth bodies to be disposed unto diseases. This being laid for a ground necessary it is that the soul should have a sympathy & sellow-seeling of the indispositions of the body, & that when the spirits be incrasfare and thickned; the power and faculty of divination or forefeeing future things, must needs be dimmed and dulled, much like as a mitrour or looking glass, overcast with some thick mist no marvel therefore if it tend and transmit nothing in phantaste and imaginations, that is plain, express, artichlace; evident, and fignificant, so long as it is rough and unpolished, not smooth and resplendent.

The Ninth Book

The Proem.

'His ninth book of Sympoliaques (O Soffiss Senecio) containeth the difcouries held at Athens, during the feastivall (olemnities of the Muses; for that this number of nine, sorteth and agreeth well with the said Muses. Now if the number of questions handled in this book, furmount the ordinary Decade of the former books, you are nothing to marvell thereat, because we ought to render unto the Muses all that apperraineth unto the Muses, without taking away or detaining ought from them, no more than from holy facrifices; confidering that we owe unto them many things besides, and the same more bountiful than this.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Of verses cited and pronounced in season and to good purpose, or otherwise.

A Mmonius being captain of the city of Athens, was definous in favour of Diagenius, to take view and knowledge, how the young men profited, who were students in Grammar, Geometry, Rhetorick, Mufick; whereupon he invited to supper, the most famous regents and masters that were throwout the whole city. There met also with them, and were present, any other learned and studious persons, in great frequency, yea, and inmanner all his friends and samiliars: As for Achilles, verily, at the suneral games and solemnities of Patroelus, he bad only those to sup with him, who had fought hand to hand in single combat to the utterance, with this intent (as it is said) that if happly there had been any choler or heat of revenge inkindled and inflamed between these men, whiles they were in armes, they should now lay down and quit the same, meeting thus at one feast, eating and drinking together at one table: but it hapned clean contrary at this time unto Ammonius; for the jealousie, contention and emulation of these schoolmen and masters of art aforelaid, became the hotter, and grew to the heighth amidst their cups; for by this time, they fell to argue, yea, and to challenge and defie one another, reasoning, and disputing without all order or judgement: whereupon, at the first he commanded the musician Eraton, to sing unto the harp; who began his fong in this wife, out of the works of Hefindus:

Of quarell and contention, There were as then, more forts than one; The Eighth Booke.

for which I commended him, in that he knew how to apply the ditty of his own fong fo well unto the present time; which gave afterwards unto Ammonius of this argument; namely, to disto the precise in feafon, and to good purpose pronounced; sying, That hereinshere appeared not only a good grace, but also ensued otherwhiles great commodity thereof. And presently ensured the system of the present of the system of the syst very mans mouth was full of that Rhapfodian poet; who at the marriage of king * Peclomaus, Philadelwhen he espoused his own sister, and was thought therein to commit a strange and unlawfull act, phila began this long with these verses out of Homer :

Great Jupiter to Juno then did call, His fifter dear and wedded wife withall.

as also another, who being to sing after supper before king Demetrins, at what time as he sent upto him his son Philip, being as yet a very infant, came readily forth with these verses:

This childe, see that you well bring up in vertuous discipline;

As fits the race of Hercules, And eke a son of mine.

archus likewife, when Alexander at supper time slung apples at him, arose from the boardrehearing this verse out of Euripides:

Some good one day, in veritie By mortall hand shall wounded be.

But most excellently of all others, a Corinthian lad, who being led away prisoner, as the city was forced and loft, when Mummius taking a furvey of those children who were born, committed as many of them as had any knowledge in literature, for to write before him, wrot ex tempore these verles:

Thrice and four etimes those Greeks were blest, I say, Whose hap it was, to die before this day.

And by report Mummius took fuch ruth and compassion herear, that he shed tears, and for this youths fake, fet at liberty as many as were of his kindred and alliance. There was remembred alfo. the wife of Theodorus the tragedian, who when the time drew neer, that such poets and actors were to ftrive for the best game, would not suffer him to live with her; but afer he was returned home from the theater, where he had gotten the victory, and gained the prize, when he came toward her, she kissed and welcomed him home with these veries: Onoble fon of Agmemnon, now

To do with me your will, good leave have you.

Semblably, fome there were in place, who hereupon inferred many other verses as unfitly alledged and altogether out of season; for that it was not thought amis or unprofitable, both to know the fame, and to beware thereby; and namely, that which is reported concerning Pompeius Magnus, when he returned from a great expedition and warlike voiage; unto whom his little daughter was presented by her school-master; and for to shew unto him how she had profited inlearning, when a book was brought unto her, the faid school-master opened it, and turned to this place for her to read, which beginneth thus:

From war thou art returned safe and sound, Would God thou hadft been there left dead on ground.

Also, when uncertain newes (without any head or author) was brought unto Caffus Longinus, that his for was dead in a strange countrey, so as he could neither know the truth, nor yet do a-way the doubtfull suspition thereof, there came an ancient senatour to visit him, and said: What Longinus, will you not contemn and neglect his vaine bruit and headless rumor, railed (no doubt) by some malicious person? as if you neither had known nor read this sentence:

No publick fame, nor vox popli Was ever known in vaine to die.

As for him, who when a gentleman in theifle of Rhods, called for a theam, to vary upon, and to shew thereby his learning before the people in a frequent theater, gave him this verse: Avaunt out of this ifle, I do theereed,

Most wicked wretch that lives, and that with speed.

it is hard to say, whether he did of purpose, contumeliously, to deride this poor Grammarian, or committed an errour against his will? But to conclude this discourse of verses inserted aptly and otherwise alledged, did very pretily appeale the stir and tumult among the regents and masters of art abovesaid.

THE SECOND QUESTION, AND THE THIRD.

What is the cause why Alpha, (or A) was ranged first of all other letters? as also, what proportion, the number of vowels and semi-vowels hath been composed and ordained?

Hereas theule and custome was at Athens, during the foresaid seasts in the honour of the Muses, the lots should be carried round about the city, and they that chanced by drawing to be matched together, propounded one unto another queltions of learning: Ammonius fearing lest ome profesiours of one and the same art, should be committed in opposition together, tooke this order, and ordained, that without any lottery at all, a Geometrician might propose a question unto a Grammarian; the Rhetorician unto a mulician, and to reciprocally answer them again by turnes: Hereupon Hermias the Geometrician put forth first unto Protogenes the Grammarian, a queltion, urging him to tell the caule, why A was fer formost of all the letters? Who rendred unto him a reason which goeth for currant in the (thools: For this is certain (quoth he) that vowels may claim by a most just title, the place before all consonants, whether they be mute or semi-vowels: and feeing that of vowels tome be long, others short, and a third tort doubtfull, and as they say, of a double time: these of the last kind, ought by good right to be esteemed of greater worth and puissancethan the rest; and of them, that is, to have and hold the place of a capitainness, which in composition and making of a diphthong, goeth alwayes before the other two, and never commeth behind; and that is Alpha, which never secondeth Iota, or Upfilon so, as that it will in such composition, yeeld or help to make one syllable of those twain: but in a kind of anger and indigcomposition, leap back again unto her proper place: Contratiwile, fet Alpha with whether you will of the other two, fo as she may go before, she will accord very well, and both together will make one entire syllable, as we may see in these words, augen, auden, as also in alas aidelog, and an infinit number of others: thus in these three respects she hath the victory, and carrieth the prize, likeunto those champions who are winners in Quinquertium, or the five severall games, for she hath the vantage above the multitude of other letters, in that the is a vowell: above vowels, because she hath two times, as being one while long, and another while short, & even of these double timed vowels she hath the preeminence, by reason that she standeth alwayes before, and never solloweth or commeth behind others.

When Protogenes had made an end of his speech, Ammonius called unto me by name and said: How now Plutarch, will not you aid Cadmus, being (as you are) a Bootian as he was? for it is faid that he placed Alpha before all other letters, for that Alpha in the Phoenician language fignifieth a beef, reputed among them, not in the second or third place, according to Hesiodus, but even the very first and principall of necessary moveables belonging to a man: Not I (quoth he) for I am bound to succour (what I can) mine own grand-father, rather than the very grandsire of Bacchus; for my grand-father Lampria: was wont to fay: That the first distinct and articulate voice which a man pronounceth, is by the power of Alpha; feeing that the breath and spirit within the mouth, is formed principally by the motion of the lips, which as they are opened and divided a funder, yeeld by that simple overture this voice first, which of all other likewise is most simple, and performed with least adoe, calling neither for the tongue to help it, nor waiting for the use thereof, but issueth forth, even when it lieth still and stirreth not out of the owne place; and therefore it is the first voice that infants utter: hereupon also commeth this word dien, in Greek, which signifieth as much asto hear any voice, for that alwayes fuch a found as A is usually heard: yea, and many other like vocables, as a den, that is to lay, to fing; duxin, that is to lay, to pipe; and daarden, to cry and hollo; yea, and these words aigen, to elevate or lift up, and avoingen, that is to say, to open: not without good canfe tooke these names upon the deduction and lifting up of the lips, whereby such a sound as A, is let forth, and falleth out of the mouth, and therefore the names of other mute confonants, all fave one, are helped by this A, which ferveth as a light to cleer their blindness: for there is but Pi, or P only, wherein the power of this letter or found is not imployed: as for Phiand Chi, the one of them is P, and the other K, pronounced with (b) or an afpiration.

Hereunto when Hermins faid, that he approved well of both reasons: Why do not you then (quoth 1) e xpound and deliver unto us, what is the proportion, if there be any, in the number of letters: for in mine opinion there is, which I collect by this argument, in that the multitude of mute consonants and semi-vowels, in regard one of another, as also in respect of vowels, ariseth not so by chance, but according to the first proportion which we call Arithmeticall, for there being nine, & eight, it comment to past that the middle number between, as it furmounted one, so it is equally sumounted of the other, and the two extreams being brought together, the greater in respect of the lefs, beareth the just proportion of the number of muses, to that of Applis for nine, is artituded to the muses, like as seven, to Applis, which being joyned together, make the duple of that which is in the middle, to wit, of eight, and that by good reason; for that the semi-vowel, between both, do participate the power and efficacy of the extreams, to wit, mutes and vowels; according to the figure here represented:

Mutes, Semi-vowels, Vowels,

Mercury (quoth he) was the first god who found out letters in Egyp: therefore the Aegyptians when they would represent the first letter, do paint Ibis, a sowle dedicated to Mercury: but not well in my judgement, thus to give the precedence and superiority of all other letters unto a beaft that uttereth neither voice nor sound at all: Moreover, unto Mercury is confectated of all numbers.

bers, the quarternary especially, and many there be who have written, that bome he was upon the fourth day of the month: now if you multiply four by four, you arise to fixteen, the just number of those hist letters which were called Phenician, in ented hist by Cado. 11. Of the other letters which afterwards were added to the rest, Pel. mests devised one four: and Stroomder put therewish afterwards were added to the rest, Pel. mests devised one four: and Stroomder put therewish and an end: after it the number of six, because it is known very well to be equal; in all the gates thereof: of these now, if six be multiplied by four, and the first quadrat or tube (8) by the first gates thereof: of these now, if six be multiplied by four, and the first quadrat or tube (8) by the first gates thereof: (3) they bring forth twenty four, the full number of all the letters in the alphabet, while he thus ispacefully. Zopprian the Grammarian was perceived exidently to laugh at him and mumble somewhat between his teeth secretly: but to toon as he had made an end of speech, he would no longer but out he spake and said: That all this was noting else but frivolous bibble-bable: For that (quoth Zopprian) there can no sound reason at all-ve given, but even by adventure and chance it tell out, that so many letters there were, and those placed in such order as they be: Like as chance it tell out, that so many letters there were, and those placed in such order as they be: Like as (quoth he) that the fift verse of Homers I lists, should contain so many syllables just, as the first of the one, should answer in number of syllables even to the sist of the other, is altogether a casual thing, happing so by meer fortune and not otherwise.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether hand it was of Venus that Diomedes wounded?

A Fter this, when Hermius addressed himselse to propose unto Zapprion a question, we inhibited hand stated him. But Maximus the Rhetorician, came with a song setch a far off out of Homer, and demanded of him: Whether hand it was of Yesus that Diomedes wounded? With that Zapprion to quishim again, asked him presently: Of whether leg king Philip halted; The case quoth Maximus is not all one and the same for Demasshath less under the sum on means for to answer this question: but if you consess once that you know not; others there be who will shew you the yesty-place where Homer telleth them who have any wit to conceive, which hand of hers was hart? yesty-place where Homer telleth them who have any wit to conceive, which hand of hers was hart? Zapprion at this speech seemed to be associated and stand in a maxe; whereupon whiles he held his Zapprion at this speech seemed to be associated unto us she place a foresaid: First and formost (quoth Maximus then) considering that the verse runne in this wise:

Maximus then) considering that the verse runne in this wise:

Then leapt a fide 110eus Jons and traverfing his ground, Stept to, and with sharp pointed spear, her hand alost did wound.

It is plain and evident, that if he had meant to have finitten her left hand, he needed not to have leapt at one fide, for he had the left hand of Venus just oppointe unto his own right hand, when he directly at one fide, for he had the left hand of Venus just oppointe unto his own right hand, when he directly afformed her: and more probable it is, and stands to great realion: that his intent was to hurt the affromed had, and that which held Aeneas her stons whom she seemed with violence to carry away, and which being wounded, she might be forced to forgoe her hold, and let his body goe secondly, when Venuswas returned up into heaven, Mintrus by way of scoffing, laughed at her, and sid to Justice in this wise:

No doubs, fair Venus hath fubors d . Some Greekilh dame to lave, And follow one of the fe Troy knights, whom the affects above All other wights: and while the fireak't this lady gently, See, Her foft hand met with fome cold-class, and so camera'd to be.

And verily Impole, that even your selle good fir, an excellent regent and professor as you are, if at any time you would seem to make much of any of your scholers, to stroak and softly to handle him, will not you do it with your left hand, but with the right; and even so, very like it is, that You he most gentle and courteous goddels of all others, in this manner dealt with the Gracian ladies, when she persyaded them unto her mind.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the recson that Plato said, how the foul of Ajax came to the lot, in the 20. place.

This pretty discourse aforesaid, pleased the whole company, and made them all merry, but one Grammarian named H, sas, whom Sospis a protessor in Rhetorick, seeing to sit all silest, sad and leavy, storthat indeed he had sped not very well, whensoever he made proof of his scholer's proceedings) came out with these veries aloud:

Ajax foole, the fon of Telamon, Remained still, and all alone.

and the rest of the verses following, he delivered in an higher note than ordinary, and rehearsed them a oftunto him, in this wife:

But now good fir come hither, that my words you may well hear, Repr. fs your ire, this anger quench, and tame your moody cheer.

But Hrd : grumbling (till in anger, bewraied no less by his cross and impertinent answer, saying: That the ghost of _ajax in heli, took her turn in the twentieth place, and her lot was according to Pl :10, to be transmuted into the nature of a lion: But for mine own part (quoth he) I think many times of the old mans faying in the comedy:

Better it were an affe to be Indeed, than for a manto fee Those live preferr'd in wordly pelf,

Who are for worth behind him life.

Hereat Softie laughing heartily: But I befeech you good Hilat (quoth he) meane while that we are turning into Asses and taking pack-saddles on our backs (if you regard and respect any thing the honour of Place) declare unto us the reason, why he said: That the source of Ajax (him] meane who was Telamons fon) came in the twentieth place to have her choice from the lottery? Which when Hilas flat'y refused to do, (for he thought that they had made a mocking flock of him, because he had but bad success in his former trials:) my brother took the matter in hand: And what say you (quoth he) to this? may it not be for that Ajax carried the name alwayes for beauty, greatnesse and valour, Next afier Peleus son (Isay,) Who was fans peer for prowefs ay?

And you know that twenty makes up the second decade; and the decade or number of ten, is of all numbers principally and most pulfant, like as Achilles was among the princes of the Greeks. With that we all fet up a laughter: Then Ammonius, Well (quoth he) Lamprias, you are disposed thus to jest and play with Hills, but fince of your own accord you have under-taken the charge, to deliver the caufe thereof, let us intreat you'to impart unto us not by way: of iport and metriment, but in good earnest. Lampias was at the first not a little troubled at this challenge, but after he had paufed, and thought upon the matter a while, int the end he spake to this effect: It is an ordinary thing (quoth he) with I lato, to play with us many times merrily, by certainde ised names that he useth: but whensoever heinserteth some fable in any treatife of the sous, he doth it right so berly, and hath a deep meaning, and profound semetherein: for the intelligent nature of heaven, he calleth, a Chariot volant, to wit, the harmonicall motion and revolution of the world: and here in this place whereof we are now in question (to wit, in the end of the tenth book of this Commonwealth) he bringeth in a messenger from hell, to relate news of that which he had there himselse seen and calleth him by the name of $E_{R,0}$ a Pamphylian born, and the son of Armonius, giving us covertly (by an anigmatical conveian e) thus much to understand: That our soules are engendred by harmony, and to joyned to our bodies, but when they be disjoyned, and separate from them, they run together all into aire from every fide, and so returne again from thence unto second generations: what should hinder then but this word " excess, was put down by him not to shew a a truth whereof he spake, but rather dragor, as a probable speech, and conjecturall fiction, or else, a thing spoken (as it should seem) to a dead body, and so uttered * vainly and at a venture in the aire: for Plato alwayes toucheth three causes, as being the philosopher who either first knew, or principally underflood how fatall destiny is mingled with fortune: and again, how our free willis wont to be joyned with either of them, or is complicate with both and now in this place before cited, he sheweth excellently well, what power each of these causes hath in our humane affaires, attributing the choice and election of our life unto free will, (for vertue and vice be free and at the command of no lord) and tying to the necessicity of fatall destiny, a religious life to God-wardin them, who have made a good choice, and contrariwise in those who have made a choice of the worft: but the cadences or chance of lots, which being cast at a venture, and lighting here and there, without order, befail to every one of us, bring in fortune, and preoccupate or prevent much of that which is ours, by the fundry educations or governments of common weale, wherein it hapneth each of us to live: for this I would have every one of you to confider, whether it be not meer folly and without all reason to seek for a cause of that which is done by fortune and casually for if lot should seem to come by reason, there were to be imputed no more to fortune or adventure. but all to some fatall destiny or providence.

Whiles Lamprias delivered this speech, Marcus the Grammarian seemed to count and number (I wot not what upon his fingers to himselse apart: but when he had made an end, , the said Mirem named aloud all those soules or spirits which are called out in Homers Necra: Among which (quoth he) the ghost only of Elpenor wandering fill in the middle confines, is not reckoned with those beneath in another world. for that his body as yet is not interred and committed to the earth: as for the foule of Tirefias allo, it feemeth notto be numbered with the reft,

Townsom now dead Proferpina Alove the rest did give

as also the power to speake with the living, and to understand their state and affaires, even before hehad drunke the bloud of sacrificed beatts: If then (quoth he) O Lamprias you substract these two, and count the rest, you shall find that the soule of Ajax was just the twentieth of those which presented themselves to Wyses; and hereto alluded Plato, as it should seeme, by way of mirth, joyning his fable together with that evocation of fpirits, otherwise called Necyra in Homers Odyffea.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is covertly meant by the Fable, wherein Neptune is feigned to have been vanquished: as also, why the Athenians take out the second day of the month August.

Now then the whole company were grown to accrtaine uprore, Menephyllus a Peripatetick Philosopher calling unto Hylus by name: You see (quoth he) now, that this question was not propounded by way of mockery and contumelious flouting: but you my good friend (leaving this troward and male contented jix, whose name as Sophocles faith, is ominous, and of ill prefage I betake your telfe unto Nepture, and fide with him awhile; who is wont to recount unto us himselse, how he hath been oftentimes overcome, to wit, in this City, by Minerva; at Delphi, by Apollo; in Argos, by Juno; in Egina, by Jupiter; and in Naxus, by Bacchus: and yet in all his repulies, disfavours, and infortunities, he bare himselse alwaies mild and gentle, carrying no rankor or malice in his heart; for proofe hereof, there is even in this City a Temple common to him and Minerva in which there standeth also an altar dedicated to Oblivion: Then Hylas who seemed by this time more pleatantly disposed: But you have forgotten (quoth he) O Menephyllas, that we have abolished the second day or the month August, not in regard of the Moon, butbecaple it was thought to be the day upon which Neptune & Minerva pleaded for the leignory of this territory of Attica. Now I atture you (queth Lamprias) Neptune was every way much more civill and reasonable than Thrasibulus, in case being not a winner as the other, but a loser, he could forget all grudge and malice.

A great breach and defect there is in the Greeke Originall, wherein wanteth the farther handling of this Question, as also five Questions entire following, and a part of the sixth to wit:

7. Why the accords in Musick are divided into three?

8. Wherein differ the intervals or spaces melodious, from those that be accordant?

9. What cause is it that maketh accord? and what is the reason that when one toucheth two strings accord dant together, the melody is ascribed to the base?

10. What is the cause that the celiptike revolutions of Sun and Moone being in number equall, yet we see the Moone oftner eclipsed than the Sun?

II. That we continue not alwaies one and the same, in regard of the daily deflux of our substance. 12. Whether of the swaine is more probable that the number of stars is even or odde?

Of this twelfth Question thus much remaineth as followeth:

Ifander was wont to fay, That children are to be deceived with cockall bones, but men with Lothers: Then Glaucias, I have heard (quoth he) that this speech was used against Polycrates the tyrant; but it may be that it was spoken also to others: But whereby do you demand this of me? Because verily (quoth Soffes) I see that children snatch at such bones, and the Academiques catch at words: for it feemeth unto me, that these stomacks differ in nothing from them, who holding our their clutched fifts play at handy dandy, and aske whether they hold in their close hand even or odd? Then Protogenes arole, and calling unto me by name: Whataile we (quoth he) and what is come unto us that we suffer these Rhetoricians and Orators thus to brave it out, and to mock others, being demanded nothing in the meanetime, nor put to it for to contribute their scot and partunto this conference and these discourses? unlesse peradventure they will come in with this plea, that they have no part of this table talke in drinking wine, as being those who admire and follow Demoss who in all his life time never drank wine : This is not the cau e(quoth I) but the reason is, because we have spurred them no questions: but if you have no better thing to aske, I will propose unto them a cale or repugnancy in contrary laws or conditions, and the same drawn out of Homer,

THE THIRTEENTH QUESTION.

A question as touching repugnant laws, taken out of the third Rhapsody or book of Homers

And what is the case, demanded he againe? I will tellyou (quoth I) and withall propose it units these here: and therefore let them give attentive eare: Alexander Paris in the third book of Honers Ilias, giveth defiance to Menelaus, and challengeth him to a fingle fight, with certaine conditions proteiting in this manner:

do.

Let su between both armies meet wit hout,
Mf [eff e I mean, and Menelaus flout:
To try in fingle fight upon this plaine
To which of us by right shall appertaine Dame Helene, with her goods: For look, who shall Make good his ground, and quit bimselfe withall
So bravely, that the villory be gaine.

Hell or againe publishing unto all and declaring as well to Greeks as Trojans the same challenge and defiance of his brother Paris just hin manner the very same words, saying:

His meaning is, that Greeks and Trojans all Befdes, should for the time surcess and quite Lay down all arms upon the ground withall, Whiles he and Menclaus hards knight, For Helen faire, and all her jewels fight?

And he thus shall the better hand obsaine, With him both Ludy shall and goods remaine.

Now when Menelau had accepted of these conditions, and both sides were sworne to the articles accorded. Agamemnon to ratific the same by his royall affent, spake in this wise:

If Alexander in plaine fight
Shall Menelaus kill:
Dam: Helene he may lead away,
Andher goods at his will:
But fay that Menelaus brave
Do Alexander flay,
The woman then and what she hath
Let him stright have away.

Now for that Menelaus vanquished Paris indeed, but yet berest him not of his life; either side had good plea to defend their cause opposite unto their enemies: for the Greeks pretended a right claime. unto Helena, for that Paris was overcome: and the Trojans impleaded and denied to redeliver her, because he was not left dead in the place: how shall this case then be decided and judged aright in so great a difference and contrariety? Certes it belongeth not to Philosophers nor Grammarians alone; but it is for Rhetoricians also to determine hereof, who are both learned in Grammar and good letters; and withall, well feen in Philosophy, as you be. Then Soffis gave his opinion, and faid, That the cause and plea of the desendant challenged was far better and stronger, as having the Law directly on his fide: tor the affailant and challenger himselse denounceth under what conditions the combate should be performed; which seeing the desendant accepted of, and yeelded unto, it lieth not in their power any more to adde ought thereto: for the condition comprised in the challenge carried no words implying flaughter or death of any fide; but the victory of the one, and the discomfiture of the other; and that with very great reason: for by right the Lady belonged to the better man, and more valiant; and the more valorous manis he who vanquisheth: for otherwife it falleth out many times, that valiant and hardy men are flaine by very cowards; as afterwards Achilles himselfe chanced to be killed by Paris with the shot of an arrow: neither will any man (I trow) say, that Achilles thus slaine was the lesse valiant, or call this the victory; but rather the good fortune of Paris unjustly dealt. whose hap it was to shoot so right; whereas on the other side, Heltor was vanquished by Achille, before he was slain, for that he would not abide his comming, but for feare abandoned his ground and fled: for he that refuseth combate and runneth away is in plaine tearmes vanquished, and hath no excuse to palliate or cloake his deseature; but flatly confesseth his enemie to be his better. And therefore, Iris, comming at first to Helena for to give her intelligence of this combate, faith unto her:

They will in combate fight it out With long speares now for thee: Andlook who wins the vittory, His wife thou nam'd shalt ke.

And afterwards Jupiter himselfe adjudged the prize of victory unto Menelans in these words:

Now plaine it is, the champion bold,

Sir Menelaus hight, Hath quit himselfe a man, andwon The prize in single fight.

For it were a ridiculous mockery to fay. That Paris had conquered Achilles, because he flood behind air off, and with the shot of an arrow wounded him in the soot, who never was ware of him, nor so much as looked for any such thing; and that now when he refused combate, distrusted himselfe, and ran out of the field like a coward to shroud and hide himselfe within the bosome, and between the aimes of a woman, being, as a man would say, disarmed and despoiled of his weapons, even whiles he was alive, his concurrent should not deserve to carry away the victory, shewing himselie the conquerour in openfield; even according to the conditions offered by Paris the chalenger. Then Glaucus taking the matter in hand, impleaded and argued against him thus: First (quoth he) in all Edicts, Decrees, Laws, Covenants, and Contracts, the last are reputed alwairs of greater validity, and do stand more firme than the former: but the second covenants and the last, were they which were declared and published by Agamemnon; in which was comprised, expressly death for the end of the combate, and nor the discomstitute or yeelding of the party conquered: moreover, the former capitulation of covenants, passed only by parole and bare words; but the other which followed after, was sealed and confirmed with an oath, yea, and a curse and exerciation was set thereupon, for whosever should transgerse the fame: neither wasic approved and satisfied by one man alone, but by the whole Army together: in such fort as this latter paction and covenant ought properly and by right to be to called a whereas the former was nothing else but the intimation of a challenge and defiance given; in testimony whereof, Priamus also after the articles of combate were sworm unto, departed out of the field, saying:

Great Jupites and other gods
Immortall now do know,
Whose destiny it is to dye
Upon his overthrow,

For he wift well enough that the covenants of combate were capitulated and accorded upon this condition: and therefore it was, that a little after Hefter faith:

God Jupitet alofs in heaven Who fits upon his throne, The covenants sworne hath not perform'd Which were agreed and sworne.

For as yet the combate remained unarchieved and unperfect, neither had it a certaine and doubte-less conclusion, considering neither the one nor the other of the champions was flaine: so that in mine opinion, there is no contrariety here at all, because the former articles and conditions were comprised in the second: for no doubt, he that killeth hath overcome; but it followeth nor, that he who vanquisheth hath killed his enemy; but to say a truth, we may well plead thus: That Agantemon did not reverse or annull the challenge or defiance pronounced by Hettor, but explained and declared it; neither altered he it, but added rather the principall point thereof, setting down expressly him for victor who killed his enemy; for this indeed is a compleat and absolute victory; whereas all others have evasions, pretended excuses, and oppositions, such as this of Menclaus, who wounded noth is enemy, not so much as pursued and followed after him: like as therefore in sinch cases wherein there is an evident contradiction of laws indeed, the judges are wont to pronounce award and sentence, according to that which is most expressly and clearly set down, leaving that which is doubtfull and obscure; even so in this present case now in question; that covenant which hach an evident conclusion, and admitted tho tergiverfation at all, we ought to esteem more sim and effectuall; suthermore, that which is the chiese and most principall point of all, even he him selfe who is supposed to be the victor, in that he retired not back, nor gave over seeking for him that sled, bur went up and down, to and fro among the troups searching all about,

If haply of this gallant knight.

Sir Paris he might have a fight, tellifie plainly, that his victory was imperfect and of novalidity; confidering that his concurrent was escaped out of his hands, which put him in mind of the words which himselfea little before

The houre of death, to whether of its twaine Is come, let him lie dead upon the plaine: As for the reft-see every one apart, And that with speed, you home in peace depart;

had faid

And therefore it flood him upon necessarily to feek our Alexander, to the end, that having flaine him, he might accomplish the entire execution of the combate, and gaine the end thereof; whereas, neither killing him out of the way, nor taking him prifoner, without all right he demanded the prize of victory: for in very truth he did not so much as vanquish him, if we may gather presumptions and conjecturall arguments, even out of his own words, complaining as he doth of Jupiter, and lamenting to himselfe, that he missed of his purpose, in these words:

O Jupitet, in heaven above,
Moodhore is againe,
More spightfull than thy selfe to me;
Nor cruells to be plaine,
I made account, and so gave out;
Of Patis in this place,
Reveny d to be for all his wrongs,
Andworking my differace:
But now my swordin hand is bursh;
Adj javelin launed in vaine

With force of armes, hath done no hurt, Nor wrought him any paine.

For himselie consesset, that it was to no purpose, that he pierced thorow his enemies shield, and took away his armet that sell from his head, unlesse he had wounded him therewith, and saine him outright.

THE FOURTEENTH QUESTION.

As touching the Muses and their number, certaine points not after a vulgar and common mainer saided,

"His discourse being thus finished, we performed our oblations and libaments to the Muses: and after we had lung an hymnto Apollo, the leader and conductor of the Mules, we chanted alfo to the found of an harpe, as Eraton plaied thereupon, those verses which Hesiodiu wrote concerning the generation and birth of the Muses: when our song was ended, Herides the Rhetoricis an began his speech in this wise: Listenlordings (quoth he) you that would distract and pluck from us Calliope: they say (for sooth) that she converteth with Kings, and not with those who can skill of unfolding fyllogilmes, or who propose difficult questions to such as speake big, and are of magnificent speech, but those rather who do and effect great matters, the works I meane which concerne Orators, Politicians, and Statesmen: and as for Clio, of all the Muses, she admitteth and avoweth the encomiasticall orations, wherein are contained the praises of other artizans; for that in old sime our ancestors called praises, Clea: and Polymneia entertaineth history; which is nothing else but the memoriall or remembrance of many antiquities : and it is reported, that in some places, and namely, in *Chior, they name all the Muses weins, that is to say, memories: as for me, I challenge also to my *Or, Tep- felfe some part of * Enterpe, if it be as Chrysppursaith, that she it is, who hath allotted unto her the gift to entertaine meetings and conferences, with pleasure, delectation, and grace: for an Orator is no lefte aftable infamiliar convertation, than eloquent in pleading causes at the bar, or in opining and delivering his mind in consultations at the Councill table; considering that the art and profession on of an Orator containeth the faculty and feate to win good will, do defend, maintaine, and justifie; but principally, and most of all, we imploy our greatest skill in praising and dispraising; which if we can order artificially and with descritty, we are able to bring about and effect no small matters and contrariwise, if we do unskilfully, and without art, we faile of the marke which we shoot at for this commendable title,

O Godyshis man how acceptable

Is he to all and venerable!

agreeth in my judgement to Orators, rather than to any other persons, who have the skill to speake well and to personade: a girt most requisite, fit, and beiceming those that are to converse with men. Then Ammonius: It were not well done of us (quoth be) O Herodas, if we should be offended and angry with you, although you seem to comprehend all the Muses together in your hand: for that among friends all things are common: and therefore it, is, that Japiter bath begotten many Muses, that every man might draw abundance from them of all good things, and make no spare: for we have not all of us need of the skill in hunting, of military science, of the art of navigation, nor of the mechanicall handicrafts of Artizans; but we all stand in need of learning and erudition,

As many as on fruits do feed,

Which for our use the earth doth breed.

And hereupon it is that Jupiter hath procreated one Minerva, one Diana, and one Vulcan; but many Muses now that there should be nine of them in number just, and neither more or sewer, you will be so good (will you not) as to yeeld us a reason? for I suppose you are well studied in this point, being as you are, so well affected unto them, and so much adorned by their graces. And what great learning (quoth Herodes againe) should there be in that? For every man hath in his mouth the number of nine, and there is not a woman but fingeth thereof, and is able to say, that as it is the first square arising from the first odde number, so it is unevenly odde it selfe, as being divided into three odde numbers equall one to the other. Now surely (quoth Ammenius, and there with smiled) this is manfully done of you, and stouch remembred: but why do you not adde thereto, thus much more, for a corrollary and over-measure, that it is a number composed of the two first cubes, considering that it is made of an unity and an octonary: and after another manner likewise of composition, it standeth of two triangled numbers, to wit, a senary, and a ternary, whereof both the one and the other is a perfect number : but what is the reason, that this novenary or number of nine, agreeth better unto the Muses than to any other gods or goddesses; for nine Muses we have, but not nine Cerefes nor nine Minervaes, nor yet nine Dianas? you are not (I trow) periwaded that the cause hereof is, because the name of their mother Manusouin, containeth just so many letters? Herodes laughed heartily hereas; and after some time of pause and silence, Ammenius follicited us to take the matter in hand, and search the cause thereof. With that my brother began, and faid: Our ancients in old time knew of no more than three Muses; but to prove so much by way of demonstration, before this company, where there be so many wise men and learned clerks, were a meere uncivill and rusticall part, lavouiting of vanity and oftentation; but I affure you, the reason of this number was not (assome affirme) the three kinds of musick or melody, to wit,

* Diatonique, * Chromatique, and * Harmonique; nor by occasion of the three tearmes or bounds * Plain fong which make the intervals in an octave or eight of musick harmonicall, to wit, Nete, Mefe, and Hypate, that is to fay, the Treble, the Meane, and the Base and yet verily, the Delphians so called the

Upon this speech Tryphon the Physician brake out into these words: But what meane you (I pray you) and how hath our poore art offended you, that it is excluded thus out of the temple and lociety of the Mules? Then Dionyfius of Melitus, added moreover, and faid, Nay, you have provoked many of us besides, to complaine up in our discontentment in the same behalfe : for we that are gardeners and husbandmen imployed in agriculture, challenge a right and property in Lady Thalia, ascribing unto her the care and charge of plants and seeds, that they may come up, grow, flower, increase, and be preserved. But herein (quoth I) you do the man manifest wrong; for you have Ceres for your patronesse, surnamed avverdaga, for giving us so many gifts; to wir the fruits of the earth: yea, and Bacchus may go for a patron in this respect, who (as Pindarus faith,)

Taking the charge of trees that grow, Doth caufethem for to bud and blow: The verdure fresh and beauty pure; Of lovely fruits he doth procure,

And we know befides, that Physicians have *Efculapius for their president and tutelar god, who ordinarily allo use Apulo as he is surnamed, Pann, that is to say, the appealer of all paines and maladies, but never as he is, Musegetes, that is to say, the prince and guide of the Muses: True it is indeed, that according to Home:

All mortallmen of gods have need, That they in their affaires may speed.

Howbeit all men require not the help of all gods: But I wonder much at this, that Lamprias (hould tithet forget or be ignorant of that common (aying of the Delphians, who give out; That among them the Mules beare not the name either of founds and notes, or offittings; but whereas the whole world is divided into three principall parts or regions; whereof the first is of those natures which be fixed and not erraticall; the second, of such as are wandering; and the third, of bodies under the fisheare of the moon: these are every one dilitically digested, composed, and ordered by harmonicall proportions, and each of them (as they say) hath a Mule to their keeper and president, to, wit, the first or highest region, Hypare; the last or lowest, Nee: and as for Mefe which is in the middle between, the doth both comprehend and also curne about mortall things, (as much as it is possible, considering they come after) with divine and immortall, yea, and earthly natures with heavenly and celestiall, according as Plan himselfe after a covert and anigmaticall manner hash given us to understand, under the names of the three destinies, calling one. As repos; another, Luches, is and a third, Clashos for as touthing the motions and revolutions of the eight heavenly Spheares, he hath attributed as presidents unto them to many Syrtes in number, and not Mules.

Then Menophlus the Peripatetick comming in with his speech: There is (quoth he) some reafon and probability in the Delphians saying; but surely the opinion of Plato is absurd, in that undto those divine and eternall revolutions of the heavens, he hath assigned instead of Muses the Syrens which are Damons, or powers not very kind and good, nor beneficiall; either leaving out as hed on the Muses altogether, or else calling them by the names of the Destinies, and saying they be the daughters of Necessity: for surely Necessity is a rude thing and violent; whereas Persuason; gentle and gracious; by the meanes of Muses amiable, taming what it will, and in my than doth that grace and Venus of Empedocles. That is true indeed (quoth Ammonius) it abhorreth that violent and involuntary cause which is in our selves, enforcing us to do against our wils: but the necessity which is among the gods is nothing intollerable, nor violent, nor hard to be obeyed or perswaded, but to the wicked, no more than the Law of a City, that unto good men is the best thing that is, and which they cannot pervert or transgresse ; not because it it impossible for them to to do, but for that they are not willing to change the same. Moreover, as touching those Syrenee* of Homer, there is no reason that the sale of them should affright us: for (after an anigmatical and comer, there is no reason that the sale of them should affright us: for (after an anigmatical and comer, there is no reason that the sale of them should affright us: for (after an anigmatical and comer, there is no reason that the sale of them should affright us: for (after an anigmatical and comer, there is no reason that the sale of them should affright us: for (after an anigmatical) and comer, there is no reason that the sale of them should affright us: for (after an anigmatical) and comer, there is no reason that the sale of them should affright us: for (after an anigmatical) and comer, the sale of the sale of them should affright us: for (after an anigmatical) and comer, the sale of the s vert fort) even he signifieth very well unto us, that the power of their song and musick is neither inhumane, nor pernicious or mortall; but fuch as imprinteth in the foules which depart from hence thither, as also to such as wander in that other world after death, a vehement affection to divine and celetiall things, together with a certaine forgetfulnesse of those that be mortall and earthly detaining and enchanting them as it were with a pleasure that they give unto them; in such fort as by reason of the joy which they receive from them, they follow after and turne about with them: now of this harmony there is a little eccho or obscure resonance commeth hither unto us, by the meanes of certaine discourses, which calleth unto our soule, and putteth into her mind such things as then and there are, whereof the greatest part is enclosed and stopped up with the obstructions of the flesh, and pallions that are not fincere: howbeit, our foule, by reason of the generosity wherewith it is endied, doth understand, yea, and remember the same, being ravished with so vehement an affection thereof, that the passion may be compared properly unto most ardent and surious fits of love, whiles fre fill affecteth and defireth to enjoy, but is not able for all that to loofen and free her felfe from the body; howbeit, I do not accord and hold with him altogether in these matters: but it seemethunto me that Plato as he hath formewhat strangely in this place, called the axes and poles of the world and heavens, by the names of spindles, rocks, and diffaves, yea, and tearmed the stars, wherves: so, to the Mules also he hash given an extraordinary denomination of Syrens, as if they related, and expounded unto the fonles and ghosts beneath, divine and celestial things: like as #1/fes in Sophacles faith, that the Syrens were come:

The daughters who of Phorcis were,

That doth of hell the lans declare.

As for the Mules they be affigued unto the eight heavenly spheares: and one hath for her portion the place and region next to the earth: those then which have the presidences and charges of the revolution of those eight spheares, do keep, preserve, and maintaine the harmony and consonance, as well between the wandering planets and fixed stars, as also of themselves one to another; and that one which hath the superintendence of that space between the moone and the earth, and converfeth with mortall and temporall things, bringeth in and infuseth among them, by the meanes of her speech and rong (fotar forth as they be capable by nature and apt to receive the same) the perswasive faculty of the Graces, of musicall measures and harmony: which fagulty is very cooperative with civill policy and humane fociety, in dulcing and appealing that which is turbulent, extravagant and wandering in us, reducing it gently into the right way, from blind-paths and errours, and therefetleth it : but according to Pindarus,

Wherto when Ammonius had given acclamation, alluding (as his manner was) unto the verse of Xenophanes in this wife :

These things do carry good credence And to the truth have reverence.

and withall moved us every one to opine and deliver his advice: I my selfe after some little pause and filence, beganthus to fay: That as Plato himselfe by the etymology of names (as it were by traces) thought to find out the properties and powers of the gods; even so let us likewise place in heaven and over celestiall things, one of the Mules, which seemeth of the heaven to be called thrania. Certes, it standeth to great reason, that these heavenly bodies require not much variety of government for that they have but one simple cause, which is nature but whereas there be many errors, mamy enormities and trespasses, thither we must transfer those eight: one for to correct one fort offaults and disorders, and another for to amend and reforme another : and for that of our life, one part is bestowed inserious and grave affaires, and another in sport and game; and throughout the whole courie thereof it hath need of a moderate temperature and muficall confent: that which in us is grave and ferious (hall be ruled and conducted by Calliepe, Clia, and Thalia. being our guides in the skill and speculation as touching gods and goddefies: as for the other Muses, their office and charge is to support and hold up that which is inclined and prone to pleasure, play, and disport, not to suffer it through weaknesse and imbecillity to run headlong into loosenesse and hestiality; but to keep in represse, and hold it in good and decent order with daming, finging, and playing, such as hath their measures, and is tempered with harmony, reason, and proportion: For mine own part, confedering that Plato admitteth and letteth down in every one two principles and causes of all our actions; the one inbred and naturally to wit, a defire and inclination to pleasures: the other comming from without forth; to wir, an opinion which covereth the best; infomuch, as the one he calleth sometime, Reason, and the other, Passion; and seeing that either of these againe admitteth cauctinonic differences; I fee certainly, that both of them require a great government; and invery truth, an heavenly and divine conduct: and first as touching Reason, one part thereof is civil and royall, namely, that which medleth in politike government, and matters of State: over which is placed, as Hesiodius faith, Calliope; Clio is allotted for her part principally, to advance, colland, and encourage ambition or desire of honour: Polymneia ruleth and preserveth the vertue memorative, and the defire of knowledge and learning, which is in the foule; and hereupon it is, that the Sicyonians of those three Muses which they honour, call one, Polymathia; and unto Enterpe, who attributeth not the skill and speculation of truth in nature; as acknowledging no delights and recreations more pure, beautifull, and honest than it. To come now unto appetites and affections, that which concerneth eating and drinking, Thalia maketh civill, fociable and honelt: whereas, otherwiseit would be inhumane, beastly, and disordered; which is the reason that we say; those men do Bana Con, when they meet together friendly and metrily to make good cheere: but in no wife such as become drunke, and grow to excesse and riotous misdemeanours. As for the accords of love and Venus, Exato is the that performeth them with her prefence; periwading that the action thereof should respect reason and the opportunity of time, cutting off wantonnesse, and quenching the furious heat of lust and pleasure, making it for to determine and rest in faithfull love and amity, and not to end in dissolute and lascivious intemperance. There remaineth yet the pleasure of hearing and seeing, whether the same belong to reason or to passion; or rather appertaine in common to both: the other two Mules, to wit, Melpomene and Terpfichore, are agents over them, which they compose and order in such sort, that as the one becommeth an honest delight, and not an enchantment of the eares; so the other contenteth the eyes as much, though it do not bewitch and corrupt the same,

The whole Chapter following is so defective and faulty in the Originall, that we know not by any conjecturall meanes to supply or reforme it.

THE FIFTEENTH QUESTION.

That in dancing there be three parts, Motions, Gesture, and Shew: what every of them is ? also, what community there is between the art of Poetry and the feat of dancing.

Fter this, there was proposed a tart of cake called Pyramin, as the prize of victory for * chil- * aust, After this, there was proposed a tast of case tailed a firming, as the pitch of the schoole-master, fome read, dren, who dance best: and for umpires and judges were chosen Menissia the schoole-master, fome read, that and Lamprias my brother: for before-time he had danced the warlike moriske very prettily, and was again that held in the dancing ichooles and places of exercise; to have the best grace in gesticulation with his hands when he danced, above all other boies what soever: now when as many had danced and shewed therein more affection than elegancy, and more heart than art ; some there were of the company, who having cholen two more expert than the reft, and who affected greatly to observe the rules of art. prayed them to dance popar maga popar, as one would say, motion after motion, or one hour after another. Hereupon Thrafbuliu the fon of Ammonius, demanded what this tearme poods that is to fay, motion, signified in this place, which ministred matter, and gave occasion unto Ammonia to discourse more as large concerning the parts of dancing; for he said, That there were three parts thereof, namely, oord, shipa, and satis: For that (quoth he) a dance is compounded of motions; gestures, or countenances, like as songs standeth upon founds, and times, or rests between; for paules and flaies are the ends of motions herein; and verily those motions, professors call eopas; but the dispositions and habitudes, what unto which the motions do tend, and wherein they rest andlend: namely, when in the forme and gesture of their body, they represent Apollo or Pan, or some of the le raging Bacche, soas a man at the first fight may acknowledge their part expressy resembled : as for the third part, called seizus, it is not a feigned imitation, but a lively and true demonfiration of the subject matters in the dance : for like as the Poets when they would plainly and barely name Achilles, Wiffes, the Earth, or Heaven, use their proper tearmes to expresse them, and even such as the vulgar know them by; but for the greater emphasis and representation as it were to the life of that which they meane to deliver, they use otherwhiles words of their own making, and bortowed Metaphors: as namely, when they would lignifie the noile of running water, they are wont to lay, they do xenage (the, and xaxxad (the: and for to expresse the flight of arrows, they tell us that they flie Aracióneva Xgods & out, that is to fay:

TOF.

Likewise to expresse that which they would say they devise and come many compositions of names in their verses, as for example : Euripides speaking of Perseus:

Then Gorgon-flayer mounting hie,

In aire of Jupiter didflie.
Semblably Pindarus writing of the horse:

What time as he with courage flout, * Spurlesse, his body gave so strong, To run a race from bout to bout, Upon Alpheus banks along.

Yea, and Homer describing a course at horse-running :

The chariots with braffe and tin, Bedight upon the plaine.

And drawn by fure fwift-footed steeds, Were feen to run amaine.

Even so it is indancing, for that which they call siyes, that is to say, gesture, representeth the forme and the visage: and, that is to say, the motion, expresseth emphatically some affection, action, or power of the mind; but by the shews, which they call Angers, properly and promptly, the very things themselves ;as for example, the earth, the heaven, the assistants or standers by; which being done in order, number, and measure, resemble those proper names which other whiles in Poetry are used, running roundly with the ornaments of their attributes and epithets in this manner:

Themis modelt, venerable: Henusblack-eyed, amiable:

Faire Dione and well favour'd.

Alio, From Hellen came renowned Kings, Of * laws protectors grave,

Sir Dorus, Xanthus, Æolus,

* Who joyed in horfes brave.

for otherwise if Poets should not thus do, their stile would be very base, and their verses starke naught, and without all grace, as if one should pen them in this fort simply without all epithets:

From one descended Hercules, And from another Iphytus, This Ladies fire, her husband eke, And fon, were Kings all in their courfe: Her brethren alfo were the like, And so were her progenitors.

Who lift to know what dame (he was Greece cleaped her Olympias,

For the like faults and errouts are committed at dancing in the forefaid shews, if they carry not a probable likelihood and a grace with them, and the same accompanied with decency and an unaffeeted simplicity: in one word, we may fitly transfer the Apophthegme of Simonides, from painting unto dancing, and say thus, That a dance is a mute poesie, and poesie a speaking dance; insomuch (quoth he) as neither painting dependeth upon poesie, nor poesie of painting, as having no need at all one of the other: whereas between dancing and poetry all things are common, are participating one with another in every thing, and representing, both of them one and the same thing, especially in those songs to dance, which they call Hyporchemata, wherein is performed the most effectuall and lively refemblance of the one, by getture, and of the other, by words and names: fo that poems feem aprly to be compared unto the lines and pourfling in a picture, by which the formes of vifages are drawn; infomuch, as he who hath proceeded well in those Hyporchemata, and is become excellent in that feat, sheweth plainly, that these two arts necessarily have need the one of the other: for he who chanteth out this fong,

The First Book of Philosophers Opinions.

Being minded to write of naturall Philosophy, we thinke it necessary in the fit place, and before all things else to set down the whole disputation of Philosophy, by way of divisions to the end that we may know which is naturall, and what part it is of the whole. Now the Stoicks tay, that sapience or wisdome is the science of all things, as well divine as humane. and that Philosophy is the profession and exercise of the art expedient thereto, which is the only finerame and foveraigne vertue; and the same divided into three most generall vertues; to wir, Natural, Moral, and Verbal: by reason whereof Philosophy also admitteth a threefold distribution; to wit, into Naturall, Morall, Rationall, or Verball: the Naturall part is that, when as we enquire and dispute of the world and the things contained therein: Morall, is occupied in intrearing of the good and ill that concerneth mans life: Rationall of Verball, handleth that which perraineth unto the discourse of reason and to speech, which also is named Logick or Dialectique, that is to say, Disputative. But Aristote and Theophiassum, with the Peripateticks, in manner all, divide Philosophy in this manner; namely, into Contemplative and Retive: For necessary ir is (saythey) that a man (to attaine unto perfection) should be a spectatour of all things that are, and an actor of fuch things as be teemly and decent, and may the better be understood by these examples: The question is demanded, whether the Sun be a living creature, according as it seemeth to the fight to be, or no? He that learcheth and enquireth into the truth of this question, is altogether therein speculative, for he seeketh no farther than the contemplation of that which is; semblably, if the demand bemade, whether the World is infinite? or if there be any thing without the pourprife of the World? for all these questions be meere contemplative. But on the other side moved it may be, How a man ought to live? How he should governe his children? How he is to beare rule and office of State? And lattly, in what manner laws are to be ordained and made? For all these are sought into, in regard of action, and a man conversant therein, is altogether active and practique, CHAP, I. What is Nature?

Sincethen, our intent and purpose is to consider and treat of naturall Philosophy, a think it need-fullto shew first, what is Nature: for absurd it were to enterprise a discourse of naturall things; and meane-while to be ignorant of Nature and the power thereof; Nature then (according to the opinion of Aristosle) is the beginning of motion and rest, in that thing wherin it is properly and principally not by accident: for all things to be feen (which are done neither by fortune nor by necessity, and are not divine, nor have any such efficient cause) are called Naturall, as having a proper and peculiar nature of their own; as the Earth, Fire, Water, Aire, Plants, and living Creatures, Moreover, those other things which we do see ordinarily engendered, as Raine, Haile, Lightning, Presteres, Winds, and luch like i for all these have a certaine beginning; and every one of them was not fo for ever, and from all eternity but did proceed from some original; likewise living Creatures and Plants have a beginning of their motion; and this first principle is Nature: the beginning not of motion only, but also of rest and quiet; for whosoever hath had a beginning of motion, the same also may have an end: and for this cause Nature is the beginning as well of reit as of moving.

CHAP. II. What difference there is between a principle and an element.

A Risfinste and Plate are of opinion, that there is a difference between a Principle and an Element; but Thales Milesius thinketh they be both one: howbeit, there is a great difference between the one and the other; for elements be compounded; whereas we hold, that the first principles neitherbe compounded, nor are any compleat substance: and verily, Larth. Water, Aire, and Fire, we tearme Elements; but Principles we call other Natures in this respect, that there is nothing precedent or before them, whereof they are ingendred; for other wife, if they were northe first they should in no wife be Principles, but that rather were to be so called, whereof they be ingendred, Now certain thingsthere are precedent, whereof earth and water, &c. be composed; to wit, the first matter. without all forme and shape; as also the first forme it selle, which we call Entelechia; and thirdly, Privation. Thales therefore is in an errour, when he faith, that water was both the Element and Principle or first beginning of all things.

> CHAP, III. Of principles or first beginnings, what they be.

Hiles the Milesian affirmed, that Water was the first principle of the whole World: and this man teemeth to have been the first author of Philosophy: and of him took the Ionique sect of Philotophers their name (for many families there were successively of Philosophers) who having thudied Philosophy in Esypt went to Miletum, when he was far stept in yeares, where he maintained this position: That, as all things were made of Water; so all things were to be resolved againe into Water. The reasons of this conjecture of his were these: first, because natural feed is the principle and beginning of all living creatures, and that is of a moilt substance; therefore probable it is, that all other things likewise have humidity for their principle: secondly, for that all forts of plants be nourished by moisture, which if they want they wither and sade away: thirdly, considering that the site or the fun it felle, and the stars is nourished and maintained by vapours proceeding from the waters, the whole world also by consequence consistest of the same: which is the reason, that Homer (suppofing all things to be engendred of water) faith thus:

The ocean sea from whence each thing

Engendred is, and bath beginning. But Anaximander the Milesian holdeth: that Infinity is the principle of all: for every thing proceedeth from it, and relolveth into it againe: and therefore there be engendred infinite worlds, and those vanish againe into that whereof they beengendred : and why is there this Infinity? Because (quoth he) there should never faile any generation, but still have subsistence, howbeit, even he also erreth herein; for that he declareth not what is this Infinity whereof he speaketh, whether it be aire, water, or any other body? he failerh likewise in this, that he putteth down a subject matter, but oventhroweth the efficient cause: for this Infinity whereof he talketh is nothing else but matter; and matter cannot attaine to perfection, nor come into act; unlesse there be some moving and efficient cause. Anaximenes the Milesian maintaineth that aire is the principle of the world; for that all things come of it, and returne unto it: Like as (quoth he) our foule which is aire keepeth us alive; even so spirit and aire maintaine the Being of the whole world: for spirit and aire be two words fignifying both one thing. But this Philotopher is out of the way as well as the rest, in that he thinketh that living creatures be composed of a simple spirit, or uniforme aire: and impossible it is that there should be but one principle of all things, to wit, matter; but there ought withall to be suppoled an efficient cau e: for it is not enough to be provided of filver or gold, for to make a veffell or piece of plate, if there come not unto it the efficient cause, to wit, the gold-smith: semblably we are to fav of brafle, wood, and all other forts of matter.

Anaxagoras the Clazomenian is periwaded, and so teacheth: That the principles of the world, and all that therein is are small like parcels; which he tearmeth Homaomeries; for he thought it altogether abfurd and impossible, that any thing should be made of that which is not; or be dissolved into that which hath no being; for howfoever we take our nourishment simple and uniforme; as for example, eate bread of corne, and drinke water, yet with this nutriment are nourished haires, veines, arteries, finews, bones, and other parts of the body; which being fo, Confesse we must (quoth he likewife, that in this food which we receive are all things which have their Being; and that all things do grow and encrease of that which bath Being: so that in this nourishment be thoseparcels which breed bloud, finews, bones, and other parts of our body, which may be comprehended by discourie of reason; for we are not to reduce all unto the outward sense, to shew and prove that bread and water effect these things: but it may suffice, that in them these parts are conceived by reason: Institute therefore as in nourishment there be parcels semblable unto that which they breed in that regard he called them Homeomeries, affirming them to be the principles of all things; and even so he would have these semblable parcels to be the matter of all things; and for efficient cause, hesetteth down a mind or understanding that ordereth and disposeth all. And thus beginneth he to go to worke, and reasoneth in this wife. All things at first were consumed and hudled together pell-mell; but that mind or understanding doth sever, dispose, and set them in order: in this one thing yet he hath done well, and is to be commended, that unto the matter he hath adjoyned a Archelain an Athenian the son of Apollodoriu, affirmeth, that the principle of all things was the infinite aire, together with the condensation, and rarefaction thereof; of which the one is fire and the other water: and these Philosophers, following by continual succession one upon another after Thales, made that lest which is called Ionique. But from another head, Pythagorus the fon of Mnefurching, and a Samian borne, the first author of the name of Philosophy; held that the principle of all things were Numbers, and their symmetries, that is to say the proportions that they have in their correspondency one unto another; which he calleth otherwise Harmonies; and those elements that be composed of them both, are tearmed by him Geometricall: furthermore, he reckoneth among Principles, Unity, and twaine indefinite; of which, the one tendeth and hasteneth to an efficient and speciall caule, to wir, a Mind, and the same is God; the other unto a passive and materiall cause, namely the visible world: Moreover, he thought that the Denarii or ten, was the absolute nature and perfection of numbers; for that all men; as well Greeks as Barbarians, count until Ten, and when they be thither come, they returne back againe unto unity: over and besides he said, That all the power of Ten confilted within foure, and in a quaternary; the reason is this: that if a man begin at one, and reckon on ftill, numbring upright unto foure, he shall make up ten; surpasse he on e the quaternary, he is gone beyond the denarie; as for example, one and two make three, three thereto arife to fix, put thereto foure, and you have ten: infomuch as number collected by unities refleth in ten; but the force and puissance thereof lieth in foure. The Pythagoreans therefore were wont to sweare by the quaternary or number of soure, which they held to be the greatest oath that they could take; as appeareth by this Diffinction:

I sweare by this quaternity, That yeelds our soules fountaine, Which of natures evernity. Dath feed and root com aine.

And our foule (as he faith) doth confilt of the quaternary number; for there is in it understanding, science, opinion, and sense; from whence proceedeth al. manner of art and knowledge, and whereupon we our telves are called reasonable: as for understanding, it is that unity; for that it conceiveth and knoweth not but by unity; as for example, There being many men, they are not every one in particular subject to our senses, but incomprehensible and infinite; mary in our understanding we conceive and comprehend this one man alone, unto whom none is like: and to in our cognation, we confider one man only; but if he be confidered particularly apart, they are infinite: for all these genders and kinds are in unity; and therefore when the question is asked of a particular man, what he is? we yeeld a general defin tion, and say, He is a reasonable creature apr to discourse by reason; and so likewite of this or that horse, we must answer, That he is a living creature, having a property and to incernie or this or that none, we muit answer, I maine is a ning creating naring a property to neigh. Thus you see how understanding is unity, whereby we understand these things: but the binary or number of two is by good right an indefinite iciente: for all demonstration and proof of any science, yea, and moreover, all manner of ivilogisme or argumentation, doth collect a conclusion which was doubtfull, or certaine premised propositions, confessed as true: whereby it sheweth eafily another thing, whereof the comprehention is science; and so it appeareth, that sience by a likelihood is the binary number but opinion by good reason may be said, the ternary number by comprehension; for that opinion is of many, and the ternary number implyeth a plurality or multitude, as we may see by the Poet when he faith: Thrice Lappy men

Those Greeks were then.

And for this cause Pythagoras made no reckoning of three, whose seet bare the name of Italigne, for that he (not able to endure the tyrannical dominion of Polycrates) departed from Samos, his native Country, and went to keep his schoole in Italy,

Heraelytus and H. ppafus the Metapontine, were of opinion, that Fire was the principle and beginning of all: for of fire, say they, all things are made, and in fire they shall have an end; and when it is extinct and quenched, the univerfall world is in this manner engended and framed: for first and formost the grossest part thereof being condensate and thrust together into it selfe, becommethearth, and afterwards, when the same earth is resolved by fire, it turneth to be water; which when it doth evaporate, is converted into aire: againe, the whole world, and all the bodies therein contained, shall be one day consumed by five in that generall conflagration and burning of all: whereby he concludeth, that fire is the beginning of all things, as that whereof all was made, and the end likewise, for that all things are resolved into it.

Epicurus the Athenian, son of Neocles, following the Philosophy of Democrisus, faith, That the principles of all things be certaine Atomes, that is to fay, little bodies indivisible, and by reason only perceptible, the tame folid, and admitting no vacuity not engendred, immortall, erernall, incorruptible, such as neither can be broken, nor receive any forme of the parts, ne yet be otherwise altered: Thele (quoth he) being perceptible and comprehended by reason, move notwithstanding in emptinesse, and by emptinesse; and as the same voidnesse is infinite, so the said bodies also be in number infinite: howbeit, thele three qualities are incident unto them, figure, bigneffe, and weight: for Democritus allowed them but twaine to wit, bigneffe, and figure, but Epicurus added unto them a third, namely, poife or ponderofity, For these bodies (gnoth ne) must of necessity move by the permission of the weight; otherwise they could not possibly stir: the figures also of their bodies, (hetaid) were comprehensible and not infinite; and their were neither hooked nor three-forked, ne yet round in manner of a ring, for such formes are apt to breake: as for the Atomes them elves, they be impassible and infrangible, having certaine figures, no otherwise perceptible, but by reason; and such a body is called fromos, not in this regard, that it is the least of all, but for that it cannot be divided as being impassible, and admitting no vacuity: and therefore he that namethan Atome, faith as much, as infrangible, impassible, and without vacuity: now that there is such an indivisible body called Atomos, it is apparent, for that there be elements eternall, bodies void, and an Empedacles an Agrigentine, the fon of Meton, faith, There be four celements, Fire, Aire, Water, and Earth; allo two principall faculties or powers, namely, accord, and difcord, or amity and enmity, of which, the one hath puissance to unite, the other to dissolve; and these be his words:

Foure feed, androots of all things than you fee, Now liften first, and hearken what they be: Lord Jupice with his ignipotence, And Lady Junoes vitall instance, Rich Phito, and dame Nestis weeping ay, Who with her teares ou feed-fourse weets alway.

By Jupiter he meaneth fiery heat, and ardent skie; by Juno giving life, the aire; by Pluto, the earth;

by Nestis, and this humane fountaine of natural feed, water.

Socrates the ion of Sophronifest, and Plato the ion of Arifon, both Athenians, (for the opinions of them both, concerning the world and all things therein, be the iame J have fet down three piniciples, God, Matter, and Idea, that is to iay, Forme: God is a univerfull spirit or Mind: Matter is the first and principall subject of generation and corruption: Idea, an incorporall substance, resing in the thoughts and cogitations of God; which God is the generall soule and intelligence of the world.

Arifforeles of Singira, the fon of Nichomachus, hath put down for Principles these three, to wis a certaine some called Emelechia, Matter, and Privation: for elements, source, and for a fish Quintescence, the heavenly body which is immutable.

Zeno, the fon of Mnafem, a Citiean born, holderth for two principles, God, and Matter: whereof the one is an active and efficient canfe, and the other passive; and besides, four elements.

CHAP. IIII. How the World was framed.

This world then became composed and formed in a round figure, bending and coping after this manner: those Atomes or indivisible bodies, having an accidentary and inconsiderate motion, ftirring continually, and most strictly, happen many of them to encounter one another and meet together; in which regard they differ in figures and magnitudes: now when they are thus gathered and heaped up together in one, the greater fort of them, and fuch as were most ponderous, fetled altogether downward; as many of them as were finall, round, even, smooth, and slippery, those being beaten upon by the encounter of these weighty bodies, were repulsed, driven back, and forced upward; but when that force which drave them aloft began to faile, and gave over once to fend them up higher, not being able to fall downward againe; for that they were empeached, they were of necessity enforced to enter into those places which were able to receive them: to wir, such as were round about them : unto which a mighty number of bodies being wound together in an heape, and by means of the repercussion, enterlaced one within another, they engendred and brought forth the heaven; and afterwards others of the same nature; yet of divers formes (as hath been said before) being likewise driven up aloft, accomplished the nature of Stars. Moreover, the multitude of those bodies yeelding a vapour and exhalation, did beat forward and drive the aire; which by stirring and motion, being converted into wind, and comprising therewith the Stars, turned them about with it; and so maintaine unto this day, that revolution which they have aloft. Of those bodies then, which fetled below, was made the earth; and of such as mounted on high, the heaven, the fire, and the aire: but round about the earth, by occasion that there was much matter yet left, and the same incrasfate and thickned by the forcible driving of the winds, and the breathing of the stars: all that part thereof which was more subtile, and of a thinner forme and confishance, gathered round together, and engendred the element of water, which being of a liquid and flowing nature, ran downward to hollow places lying low, which were able to receive and hold them: or elie the water of it felie where it staied and rested made concavities and hollow places underneath. Thus you see after what manner the principall parts of the world were first engendred and made,

CHAP. V. Whether All be One.

He Stoick Philosophers held opinion that the world was one, which they called man, That is to fay, All, and the same of corporall substance.

Empedacles affirmed, that the world indeed was one; but All and the world were not both one; for the world (quoth he) is but a smallportion of All: and as for the rest beside, it is but an idle and dull matter.

Plato proveth his opinion, that the world is but one, by conjecture; and guesseth All to be one, by three presumptions or probable arguments. First, for that otherwise the world were not perfect and accomplished, if it comprised not All within it felse. Secondly, it should not be like unto the patterne, if it were not one and uniforme. Thirdly, it would not be incorruptible, in case there were any thing without it, But we are to answer Plato, and say against him, that the world is perfect although it comprehend not all things: for man is perfect enough, and yet all things be not companied.

prized in him. Moreover, there be many examples drawn from one patterne, as we may fee in statues, houses, and pictures: and how is it persed; if anything may turne without it? Finally, incorruptible neither is it, nor can it be, considering it had a beginning in a kind of Nativity.

Methodorus faith, That as it were an abjurd and impertment speech to say, that in a great field there grew but one eare of corne; 10 it were as strange a matter, that in this infinity there should be but one world: and that there be in number infinite, it appearest by this, that there be cause sinsinite for if the world were shirte, and all the causes infinite whereof it is made it cannot choose but of necessity there should be like wise infinite: for where all the causes be, there must need stheesses of the world be either these Atomes or the Elements.

CHAP. VI. From whence it came that Men had the notion of God.

'He Stoick Philosophers define the Essence of God in this wife; namely, To be a spirit full of in-I relligence, and of a fiery nature, having no forme, but transforming himselfe into whatsoever he will, and refembling all things. The notion and apprehension men had of him, first, by conceiving the beauty of those things which are object to their eyes: for no beautifull thing hath been made by chance, and at adventure, but composed and framed by some ingenious and operative Art: now that the heaven is beautifull it appeareth by the forme, colour, and bignesse thereof, by the variety also of the stars disposed therein: moreover, the world is round in manner of a Ball, which figure of all other is principall and most perfect, for it alone resembleth all the parts; for being round it felfe, it hath the parts likewise round. For this cause Platosaid, That our mind and reason (the most divine part of man) is lodged and feated in the head, which commeth neere unto a round figure: as for the colour, it is faire and lovely; for it flandeth upon the zure or blew, which being more darkethan purple hath notwithlanding a bright and resplendent quality, in such sort by the exceeding frength of that lightfome hew, it cutteth and pierceth thorow fo great an intervall and spacioulnesse of the aire, as it may be evidently seen in so mighty a distance: in regard also of the greatneffe thereofit is right beautifull; for, of all things that be of one and the same kind, that which invironeth and couraineth the rest is ever fairest; as we may see in a living creature, and a tree: befides, to confummate and accomplish the beauty of the world there be the coelestial fignes which appeare unto our eye ; for the oblique circle of the Zodiack isembelished with twelve divers and sundry images,

Wherein the Crab is to be feen,
The Lion after it;
The Vigin, and two forked * Clees,
The Scorpion with his bit,
The Archer and the Capricorne,

And after these copie in course

But less of all, the double Twins,
Make up the dozen full,

Befides an innumerable fort of other configurations of stars, which God hath made in the like arthes and roundities of the world; whereupon Euripides wrote thus:

The starry splendour of the skie, Which xeovor some do call, The wondrous work of that most wise Creator, Lord of all.

Thus then we apprehended hereby the notion of God; for the fun, the moor, and other flars, after they have performed the course of their revolutions under the earth come to rise againe allike in toolour, equall in bignesse, and retaining alwaise still the fame places and times; whereupon they who deliver unto us the manner of Gods service and worship declare the same unto us after three sorts; the fifth naturall; the second, fabulous; and the third, civill; that is to say, testified by the statuses and ordinances of every City and State: the naturall is taught by Pholiophers; the fabulous, by Poets; the civill and legall, by the Customes of each City; but all this doctrine and manner of teaching is divided into seven from the state of the statuses and the same prehension of God by states that shew above, seeing how they are the cause of great symphony and accord, and that they keep a certaine constant order of day and night, of Winter and Sammer, of rising and setting, yea, and among those living creatures and fruits which the earth beneath bringeth forth: whereupon, it hath been thought, that heaven was the stater, and earth the mother to these for that the powring down of showers and raine seemed instead of naturall seeds, and the earth as a mother, to conceive and bring the same forth. Men also, seeing and considering the stars alwaies 3-61975; that is to say, behold and contemplate: therefore they called the same and moone, Sc. Ded, that is to lay, gods, of the word ser, that is to lay, to run, and Deager, that is to fay, to behold. Now they range the gods into a second and third degree; namely, by dividing them into those that be profitable, and such as are hurtfull, calling the good and profitable, Jupiter, Juno, Mercary, and Ceres; but the noisome and huttfull, woras, that is to lay, maligne spirits, egenvous, that is to fay, furies; and Ares, that is to fay, Mars, whom they detected as bad and violent, yea, and devised means to appease and qualifie their wrath. Moreover, the fourth and fifth place and degree, they attributed unto affaires, passions and affections; namely, love, Venue, lust, or desire; and as for affaires, they had hope justice, good policy, and equity. In the first place, be those whom the Poets have fained; for Hesiodus being minded to set down a father for the gods begotten and engendred, devised and brought in such progenitors as these,

* That is to

Towit, fir Ceus and Crius,

Hyperion, and Japetus.

Whereupon, all this kind is named Fabulous. But in the feventh place, are those who were adorned with divine honours, in regard of the great benefits and good deeds done unto the common life of mankind, although they were begotten and borne after the manner of men; and fuch were Herenles, Castor, Pollux, and Bacchus; and these, they said, had an humane forme: for that as the most noble and excellent nature of all, is that of gods; so of living creatures, the most beautifull is man, as adorned with fundry vertues above the rest, and simply the best, considering the constitution of his mind and foule: they thought it therefore meet and reasonable, that those who had done best, and performed most noble acts, rejembled that which was the most beautifull and excellent of all other.

CHAP. VII.

Ome of the Philosophers, and namely, Diagoras of the Isle of Melos, Theodorus the Cyrenzan, and Euemerus of Teges, held resolutely, that there were no gods. And verily, as touching Euemerus, the Poet Callimachus of Cyrene, writeth covertly in Iambique verses, after this manner:

All in a troupezinto that Chappell go, Without the walls, the City not far fro; Whereas sometime that old vain-glorious affe, When as he had the image cast in brasse, Of Jupiter, proceeded for to write Those wicked books, which shame was to indite.

And what books were they? even those, wherein he discoursed that there were no gods at all. And Euripides the tragadian Poet, although he durst not discover and let abroad in open tearmes the same for feare of that high Court, and Councill of Areopagus, yet he signified as much, in this manner; for he brought in Sifrphus as the principall author of this opinion, and afterwards, favourizeth even that ientence of his, himfelfe; for thus he faith:

The time was when the life of man was rude, And as wild be fts, with reason not endu'd, Disordinate, when wrong was done alway, As might and force in each one bare the fway.

But afterwards, these enormities were laid away, and put down, by the bringing in of Laws: howbeit for that the Law was able to represse injuries and wicked deeds, which were notorious and evidently seen and yet many men notwithstanding offended and sinned secretly; then some wise man there was, who confidered and thought with himselfe, that needfull it was alwaies to blindfold the truth with some devised and forged lies, yea, and to perswade men, that

A god there is, who lives immortally, Who heares, who fees, and knows all wondrously.

For away (quoth he) with vain dreames and poeticall fictions, together with Callimachus, who faith: If God thou knowst well, his power divine,

All things can well performs and bring to fine.

For God is not able to effect all things: for lay there be a God, let himmake how black, fire cold, him that fitteth or lieth to fland upright, or the contrary at one instant and even Place himselfe, that speaketh so big, when he saith: That God created and formed the world to his own patterne and likenesse smelleth herein very strongly of some old * dotards soolerie: to speake according to the * Bernset - Poets of the old comedy: For how could he look upon himselfer (quot he) to hear the world he'd on the post according to his own similar de or how hath he made it round in manner of a globe, being himselfer to the could be a considered to he are not a c felfe lower than a man? Anax ogor as is of opinion that the first bodies in the beginning stood still and stirred not : but then the mind and understanding of God digested and aranged them in order, yea, and effected the generations of all things in the universall world. Place is of a contrary mind, faying, That those first bodies were not in repose but that they moved confuledly and without order: whereupon God (quoth he) knowing that order was much better than diforder and confusion, disposed all these things; but as well the one as the other have herein faulted in common; for that they imagined and deviled, that God was entangled and encumbred with humane affaires; as also that he framed the world in regard of man, and for the care that he had of him: tor furely (living (as he doth) happy and immortall, accomplished with all forts of good things, and wholy exemptirom all evill, as being altogether imployed and given to prefer and maintaine his own bearitude and immortallity) he intermed eth not in the affaires and occasions of men; fer so he should be as unhappy and miserable as some artizan, mason, or labouring workman, bearing heavy burdens, travelling and swearing about the shortes of the world. Againe, this gold of whom they speake of necessity either was not before the creation of the world, at what time as those first bodies lay still unmoveable, or stirred consusedly: or else if he were before, he either flept or watched, or did neither the one nor the other: but as the former of these we may not admit, for that God is éternall; so the latter we cannot consesse: for if God slept from all eternity and time out of mind, he was no better than dead: for what is eternall fleep other than death? but birely God is not subject to death; for the immortal lity or God, and this vicinity to death are much distant at under and cannot stand both together: but if we say that God was awake all that while; either he was defective in his bleffed state of selicity; or elle he enjoyed the same compleat: but in the first condition God is not happy; for what soever wanteth ought of selicity cannot be happy: and verily in the second state he is not better: for if he were defective in nothing before, to what putpose busied he himielse in such vaine enterprises? moreover, if there be a God, and that by his prudent care mens affaires be governed, how commeth it to passe that wicked men prosper in the world, and find fortune their indulgent mother, but the good and honest suffer the contrary, and seele her to be a curil step-dame? for King Agamemnon, as the Poet faith,

A knight with all most valourous. was by an adulterer and adulteresse surprised and murdered treacherously: and Hercules one of his race and kindred, after he had rid and purged the life of man from io many monsters that troubled his repote was poiloned by Deianeira, and to by indirect means loft his life.

Thales faith, that God is the foule of the world.

Anaximander is of opinion, that the stars be celestiall gods. Democritus is periwaded, that God is a mind of a fiery nature, and the foule of the world.

Prthagor as affirmeth, that of the two first principles, Unity was God, and the soveraign good; which is the very nature of one, and is Understanding it selfe: but the indefinite binary, is the devill and evill, about which is the multitude materiall, and the vifible world.

Socrates and Plate do hold, that he is one and of a simple nature, begotten and borne of himselfe alone truly good: All which tearmes and attributes tend unto a Mind: to that this Mind is God, a forme separate apart, that is to say, neither mingled with any matter, nor entangled and joyned with any thing passible whatsoever.

Aristotic supposeth, that this supreame God is an abstract forme settled upon the round spheare of the univerfall world, which is an heavenly and colettiall body, and therefore tearmed by him, the fifth body or quintaessentia: which coelestiall body being divided into many spheares coherent by nature, but separate and distinct by reason and understanding, he thinketh each of these spheates to be a kind of animall, composed of body and soule, of which twaine, the body is coelestiall, moving circularly; and the foule, reason, unmovable in it selfe, but the cause in effect of motion,

The Stoicks teach after a more generall manner, and define God to be a working and artificiall fire proceeding methodically and in order to the generation of the world, which comprehendeth init leifeall the ipermaticall proportions and reasons of feed; according to which every thing by fatall deffiny is produced and commeth forth: also to be a spirit piercing and spreading through the whole world; howbeit, changing his denomination throughout the whole matter, as it paffeth by transition from the one to the other: Semblably that the world is God, the stars likewise and the earth yea, and the supreame mind above in heaven.

Finally, Epichrus Conceiveth thus of the gods, that they all have the forme of man, and yet be perceptible only, by reason and cogitation in regard of the subtile parts, and fine nature of their imaginative figures: he also affirmeth, that those other four enatures in generall be incorruptible, to wit, the atomes, vacuity, infinity, and resemblances, which also be called semblable parcels and elements.

CHAP. VIII. Of Damons and demy-gods, otherwise named, Heroes.

O this Treatise of the gods, meet it is to adjoyne a discourse as touching the nature of Damons and Heroes.

Thales, Pythagoras, Plato, and the Stoicks, hold that these Damons be spirituall substances: and the Heroes soule separate from their bodies; of which sort, there be good and bad: the good Heroes are the good soules, and the bad Heroes the bad soules; but Epicurus admitteth none of all this.

CHAP. IX. Of Master.

Atter is the first and principall subject exposed to generation, corruption, and other mutati-

The Sectaries of Thales and Pythagoras, together with the Stoicks, do say, that this Matter is vatiable, mutable, alterable, and fluxible, all wholly thorow the universall world.

The disciples and followers of Democritum are of opinion, that the first principles beimpassible; to wit, the imall indivinible body, Atomos, Voidnesse, and Incorporall.

Aristorie and Plate do hold, that Matter is corporall, without forme, shape, figure, and quality, in the own nature and property; but when it hath received formes once it becommeth (as it were) a nurse, a mold, patterne, and a mother. They who set down for this Matter, water, earth, fire, or aire, do not fay, that now it is without forme; but that it is a very body: but such as affirme, that these Atomes and indivisible bodies be the said Matter, make it altogether formelesse.

CHAP. X.

Dea is a bodilesse substance, which of it selse hath no subsistence, but giveth figure and forme un-I to shapelesse matters, and becommeth the very cause that bringeth them into shew and evidence. Secrates and Plate suppose, that these Ideas be substances separate and distinct from matter, howbeit, subfifting in the thoughts and imaginations of God, that is to say, of Mind and Understanding, Aristotle admitteth verily these formes and Ideas, howbeit, not separate from matter, as being the partterns of all that which God hath made.

The Stoicks, such as were the scholars of Zeno, have delivered, that our thoughts and conceits

CHAP. XI. Of Caules.

A Cause is that whereupon dependent or followeth an effect, or by which any thing hapneth.

Place hath set down three kinds of Causes, and those are distinguished by these tearnes; By which, Of which, and For which; but he taketh the most principall to be that, By which; that is to fay, the efficient cause, which is the mind or understanding.

Pythagoras and Aristotle do hold, that the principall Causes be incorporall; and as for other Causes, either by participation or by accident, they are of a corporall substance: and so the world

But the Stoicks are of opinion, that all Causes are corporall, inasmuch as they bespirits.

CHAP. XII. Of Bodies.

Body is measurable, and hath three dimensions, length, bredth, and depth, or thicknesse, Or Athus: A Body is a masse that resisteth, touching naturally of it selle; or that which occupieth

Plato faith, that a Body is neither heavy nor light of it selfe naturally, so long as it abideth in the own proper place; but being once in a strange place, it hath first an inclination, and upon it a motion and impulsion, either to weight or lightnesse.

Arifforle is of opinion; that earth simply is most ponderous, and fire lightest : that aire and water be of a middle or doubtfull nature between both, sometime heavy and otherwhiles light-

The Stoicks hold, that of the foure elements two be light, namely, Fire and Aire: other two be heavy; to wit, Water and Earth: for, light is that, which of the own nature, and not by any compulsion or instigation removeth from the proper middle where it is: heavy also is that which naturally tendeth to the faid middle; but the middle it selfe, is in no wife heavy.

Epicurus saith, that Bodies are not comprehensible; that the first Bodies be simple; but all the compositions of them have their weight and ponderosity: also, that the Atomes do move, some plumberight down; others, at one side; and some againemount alost, and that by impulsion and concussion.

CHAP. XIII. Of the smallest Bodies.

Mpedacies is of opinion, that before the foure elements there were certaine small parcels or frag-ments, as one would say, elements before elements; and those were of semblable parts, and the fame all round.

Heraclitsu

Heraclitus commeth in with (I know not what) petty scrapings or shavings, exceeding small, and the same not divisible into parts.

> CHAP. XIIII. Of Figures.

A Figure is the superficies circumscription, and accomplished lineament of a body. The Pythagoreans affirme, that the bodies of the foure elements be of a sphærick or round figure; only the highest of them (to wit, fire) is pyramidall, or sharpe pointed above.

> CHAP. XV. Of Colours.

A Colour is the visible quality of a body.

The Pythagoreans called Colour, the outward superficies of the body. Empedocles defined it to be that which is fit and agreeable to the waies and passages of the fight. Plato faith, it is a flame tent from bodies, having certaine parcels proportionable to the eye-fight, Zeno the Stoick holdeth, that Colours be the first figurations of any matter.

The followers of Pythagoras affirme these to be the kinds of Colours, White, Black, Red, and Yellow; and that the divertity of Colours artieth from a certaine mixture of Elements: but in living creatures, the same proceedeth from the variety of their * places and fundry aires.

> CHAP, XVI. Concerning the Section of Bodies.

THE Secaries of Thales and Pythagoras are of opinion, that bodies be passible and divisible infi-Democritus and Epicurus hold, that this section staieth either at the Atomes indivisible, or at those small bodies which have no parts, neither doth this division (say they) passe infinitely. Aristotle saith, that divided they be in infinitum, potentially, but actually not.

> CHAP. XVII. Of Mixture and Temperature.

Heancient Philosophers affirme, that this mxiture of Elements is by way of alteration: but Anaxagoras and Democritus fay, it is done by apposition.

Empedocles composeth the elements of smaller masses, which he supposeth to be the least bodies and as a man would fay, the Elements of Elements.

Plato would have the three bodies (for he deigneth not them, either to be called, or to be, Elements) to be convertible one into the other, to wit, water, aire, and fire : but as for the earth, it cannot be turned into any one of them;

> CHAP. XVIII. Of Voidnesse or Vacuity.

"He naturall Philosophers of Thales his schoole, all untill you come unto Plato, have generally disavowed and reproved this Vacuity: As for Empedocles thus he writeth:

In all the world so spacious, Nought is void or superfluous.

Leucippus, Democritus, Demetrius, Metrodorus, and Epicurus, hold, that the Atomes be infinite in multitude, and Voidnesse infinite in magnitude.

The Stocks affirme, that within the world there is no Voidnesse, but without there is infinity. Aristotle is of opinion, that without the world there is no such Voidnesse, as that the heaven by the meanes thereof may draw breath, for that it is of the nature of fire.

> CHAP. XIX. Of Place.

Place faith, that Place is that which is fusceptible of formes, one after another, which is by way of Metaphor or translation to expresse the first matter, as a nurse receiving and embracing all. Ariftotle taketh Place to be the extreame superficies of the continent, conjunct, and contiguous to the content,

CHAP.

CHAP. XX. Of Roome or Space.

The Stoick, and Epicurus do hold that there is a difference between Voidnesse, Place, and Rooms for Voidnesse (lay they) is the folitude or vacuity of a body: Place, that which is fully occupied and taken up with a body: but Roome or Space, that which is occupied but in part; as we may see in a rundlet or barrell of wine.

CHAP. XXI.

Placethinkethit to be the moveshle image of the terminal placethinkethit to be the moveshle image of the starting. Plato thinketh it to be the moveable image of the eternity, or the intervall of the worldsmotion: but Eratosthenes affirmeth it to be the course of the sun.

> CHAP. XXII, Of the Essence of Time.

PLate faith, that the Effence of Time is the moving of heaven: but many of the Stoick hold it; to be the moving it selfe; and most of them affirme, that Time had no beginning of generation, Plato is of opinion, that engendred it is according to our conceit and capacity.

> CHAP. XXIII, Of Motion.

D'Athagoras and Plato affirme, that Motion is a certaine difference and alteration in matter. Ariffotle giveth out, that it is the actuall operation of that which is moveable, Democritus faith, that there is but one kind of Motion, to wit, that which tendeth obliquely, Epicurus maintaineth twaine, the one direct and plumbe, the other fide-long.

Erophilus is of opinion, that there is one motion perceptible in reason, and another object to Heraclius excludeth all station, rest, and repose out of the world: For this (quoth he) belongeth unto the dead, but perpetual! Motion agreeth to eternall substances; and perishable Motion to substances corruptible.

> CHAP. XXIV. Of Generation and Corruption.

Parmenides, Melissus, and Zeno, rejected wholly all Generation and Corruptions for they thought the universall world to be unmoveable: but Empedocles and Epicurus, and all those who held the world to be made of a masse and heap of small bodies hudled together, bring in and admit certaine concretions and diffipations; but in no wife Generations and Corruptions to speake properly, faying, that these come not according to quality by way of alteration, but according to quantity by collection and heaping together.

Pythagoras, and as many as suppose matter to be passible, hold, that there is properly indeed Generation and Corruption: for they say that this is done by the alteration, mutation, and resolution of the elements.

CHAP. XXV. Of Necessity.

 T^{Hales} faith, that Necessity is most potent and forcible, for it is that which ruleth the whole world.

Pythagoras held that the world was possessed and compassed with Necessity. Parmen'des, and Democritus were of opinion, that all things were made by Necessity, and that defliny, justice, providence, and the Creator of the world, were all one.

> CHAP. XXVI. Of the Essence of Necessity.

PLato referreth some events to providence, and others he attributeth to Necessity. Empedocles faith, that the Essence of Necessity is a cause aprio make use of the principles and elements.

Democritus affirmeth it to be the refishance, the * lation, motion, and percussion of thematter.

Plato

is agent to the matter. CHAP. XXVII,

Of Deftiny.

Eraclitus affirmeth, that all things were done by fatall Destiny, and that it and Necessity be both lone.

Plate admitteth willingly this Destiny in the soules, lives, and actions of men; but he inferreth withall a cause proceeding from ourselves.

The Stocks likewise according with the opinion of Plato, do hold, that Necessity is a cause invincible, most violent and inforcing all things: also that Destiny is a connexion of causes interlaced and linked orderly: in which concatenation or chaine, there is comprised also that cause which proceedeth from us in such fort as some events are destined, and others not.

> CHAP. XXVIII. Of the substance of Destiny.

 $\mathbf{H}^{Eraclitus}$ faith, that the fubstance of Destiny is the reason that pierceth throughout the substance of the universall world.

Plato affirmethic to be an eternall reason, and a perpetuall law of the nature of the whole world. Chrysippus holdethic to be a certaine puissance spirituall, which by order governeth and adminifireth all things. And again in his book of definitions he writeth thus: Destiny is the reason of the world, or rather thelaw of all things in the world, administred and governed by providence: or else the reason whereby things past, have been; things present, are; and suture things, shall be.

The Stoicks are of opinion that it is the chaine of causes, that is to say, an order and connexion, which cannot be furmounted and transgressed.

Posidonus supposeth it to be the third after Jupiter; for that Jupiter is inthe first degree; Nature in the fecond; and fatall Destiny in the third.

> CHAP, XXIX, Of Fortune.

DLato defineth Fortune to be (in things proceeding from mans counsell and election) a cause by accident, and a very catuall confequence.

Aristotle holderh it to be an accidentall cause in those things which from some deliberate purpose and impulsion tend to a certaine end, which cause is not apparent, but hidden and uncertaine. And he putteth a difference between Fortune and rash adventure: for that all Fortune in the affaires and actions of this world is adventurous: but every adventure is not by and by Fortune; for that it conistethin things without action: againe, Fortune is properly in actions of reasonable creatures; but adventure, indifferently in creatures, as well unreasonable as reasonable, yea, and in those bodies which have neither life nor foule.

: Epicurus faith, that Fortune is a cause which will not stand and accord with persons, times, and Anaxagoras and the Stoicks affirme it to be a cause unknown, and hidden to humanereason : for that some things come by necessity, others by fatalt destiny; some by deliberate counsell, others by Fortune, and iome againe by caluality or adventure.

> CHAP, XXX. Of Nature.

Mepodocles holdeth that Nature is nothing; only that there is a mixture and divultion, of lepara-tion of Elements: for in this manner writeth he in the first book of his Philicks:

-nd ada This one thing more I will yet fay, Of things that be humane.

And Mortall, mature none there is, And deaths end is but vaine.

A mixture and divulfion, Of Elemets and of all, and the state of the contract Which men do Nature call.

Opinions of Philosophers.

The Second Book of Philosophers Opinions.

Having now finished the Treatise of Principles, Elements, and such other matters linked and concurring with them: I will turne my pen unto the discourse as touching their effects and works composed of them, beginning first at that which is most spacious and capable of all things.

Of the World.

Prinagoras was the fift who called the Roundle that containeth and comprehendeth all, to wit, the World, Kópuso: for the orderly discrition observed sharein the World, κόσμον : for the orderly digestion observed therein.

Thates and his disciples held, that there is but one World.

Democritus, Epicurus, and their schollar Metrodorus affirme, that there be innumerable Worlds in an infinite space according to all dimensions and circumstances.

Empedacles faith, that the course and race of the Sun is the very circumscription of the bounds and limits of the World; and that it is the very confinement thereof, Selencus held the World to be infinite.

Diogenes affirmed the universality to be infinite: but the World finite and determinate.

The Stoicks put a difference between univerfall and whole: for they fay, that the univerfall together with voidnesse is infinite: and that the whole without voidnesse is the World: so as these termes, the Whole, and the World, be not both one.

CHAP. II. Of the figure and forms of the World.

He Stoicks affirme the World to be round: fome fay it is pointed or pyramidall: others that it is fashioned in manner of an egge; but Epicarus holdeth, that his Worlds may be round, and it may be that they are apt besides to receive other sormes.

CHAP. III. Whether the World be animate, or endued with a soule:

A LL other Philosophers agree, that the World is animate, and governed by providence : but De-mocritus, Epicurus, and as many as maintaine Atomes, and withall bring in Vacuity, that it is neither animate, nor governed by providence, but by a certaine nature void of reason.

Aristotle holdeth, that it is not animate wholly and throughout all parts; nor sensitive, nor reafonable nor yet intellectuall or directed by providence: True it is (quoth he)that collectiall bodies be capable of all these qualities, as being compassed about with spheares both animate and vitalle whereas bodies tetrestrial and approaching neere unto the earth, are endued with none of them: and as for the order and decent composition therein, it came by accident, and not by prepensed reafon and countell.

CHAP. IIII. Whether the World be incorruptible and eternall.

Prinageras and Plate affirme, that the World was ingendred and made by God; and of the own nature (being corruptible) shall perish for sensible it is, and therefore corporall showbeir, in regard of the divine providence, which preserveth and maintaineth it, perish it shall never.

Epicurus faith, that it is corruptible, for that it is engendred, like as a living creature or a plant. Xenophanes holdeth the World to be eternall, ingenerable, uncreated and incorruptible.

Ariffotle is of opinion, that the part of the World under the moone is passible; wherein the bodies also adjacent to the earth be subject to corruption, CHAP. V. Whereof the World is nourished.

A Riffiote fairh, that if the World be nourifhed, it is likewife corruptible, and will perifh i but o it is, that it hath no need of nouriture, and so by consequence it is eternall. Plato is of opinion, that the world yeeldeth unto it selfe nouriture of that which perisheth, by way Philolaus affirmeth, that there is a twofold corruption; one while by fire falling from heaven, and another whileby water of the moon, powred forth by the circumgyration and turning about of the aire; the exhalations whereof become the food of the world. CHAP.

At which Element began God the Fabrick of the World

THe Naturalists do hold, that the creation of the world began at earth, as the very center there-1 of ; for that the beginning of a spheare or ball is the center.

CHAP. VI.

Pythagoras faith, that it beganat Fire, and the fifth element.

Empedocles faith, that the first thing separate apart was the skie or fifth essence, called Ether ; the fecond, Fire; after which, the Earth; of which being thrust close and pressed together by the violence of revolution sprang Water, from which Aire did evaporate: also, that heaven was made of that Skie or Quintessence; the Sun, of Fire; and of the other elements were constipate and felted(as it were) terrestriall bodies, and such as be neare the earth.

Plato is of opinion, that this visible world was formed to the mold and patterne of the intellectuall: that of the visible world the soule was first made; and after it; that which is corpulent: that of the fire and earth, first; that which standeth of water and aire, second.

Pythagoras affirmed, that of the five folid bodies, which are also called Mathematicall; the Cube (that is to fay, a iquare body, with fixe faces) went to the making of the earth; of the pointed Pyramis, was made fire ; of Octoedra or folid body with eight bases, the earth; of Icosiedra with twenty fides, the water; of Dodecaedra with twelve faces, the supreame spheare of the universall world: and himselfehereinalso doth Pythagorize.

CHAP. VII. Of the order of the Worlds Fabrick.

Parmenides imagineth certaine coronets (as it were) interlaced one within another, some of a rare substance, others of a thick, and the same mixed of light and darknesse between that the body which containeth them altogether was as firme and folid as a wall.

Leucippus and Democritus enwrapped the world round about with a tunicle or membrane, Epicurus held, that the extremity of some worlds were rare; of others thick; and that of them, some were movable, others immovable.

Plate setteth down Fire first; secondly, the Skie; then Aire; afterwards, Water; and last of all.

Earth; but otherwhiles, he conjoyneth the Skie unto Fire.

Ariftoile rangeth in the first place the impassible Aire, which is a certaine fifth body; and after it; the Elements passible, to wir, Fire, Aire, Water, and the Earth last: of all which unto the coelestials bodies he attributeth a circular motion; and (of the others fituate beneath them) unto the lighter kind, the ascent or rifing upward ; unto the weightier, descent or setling downward, Empedocles is of opinion, that the places of the elements are not alwaies steady and certaine, but that they all interchange mutually one with another,

CHAP. VIII. What is the cause that the World bendeth or copeth forward.

Diogenes and Anaxagoras affirme, that after the World was made, and that living creamres were produced out of the Earth, the world bowed (I wot not how) of it felfe, and of the own accord, to the Southerne or Meridionall part thereof; haply by the divine providence so ordering all, that some parts of the world should be habitable, others inhabitable, according to excessive cold, extreame heat, and a meane temperature of both.

Empedocles faith, that by reason that the aire gave place to the violence of the Sun, the two Bears * Artick & or Poles*bended, and inclined: as for those parts which were northerly, they were elevated and mounted aloft; but the foutherne coasts were depressed and debated as much; and so accordingly the whole world,

CHAP. IX. Whether without the world, there be any vacuity.

He schoole of Pythagoras holdeth, that there is a voidnesse without the world, to which, and I out of which the world doth draw breath: but the Stoicks affirm, that into it the infinite world by way of conflagration is refolved.

Posidonius admitteth no other infinity, than as much as is sufficient for the dissolution thereof. In the first book of vacuity, Aristotle faith, there is voidnesse.

Plato affirmeth, that there is no emptinefie at all, either without or within the world,

CHAP. X. What be the right sides, and which be the left, in regard of the world.

Prhazoras, Plato, and Aristotle do take the East for the right part, and the West for the left.

Opinions of Philosophers.

Empedoclessaith, that the right side bendeth toward the summers Tropick; and the lest toward the Tropick of winter.

CHAP. XI. Of Heaven, and what is the substance thereof.

Naximenes affirmeth the exterior circumference of heaven to be earthy. A Empedocles faith, that Heaven is folid, being made of aire condensate by fire, after the manner of chryfall; and that it containeth the fiery and airy nature in the one and the other hemispheare, Arifforle holdeth, that Heaven is composed of the fifth body above fire, or else of the mixture of hear and cold.

CHAP. XII.

Of the division of Heaven: and namely, into how many circles it is divided.

Hales, and Pythagoras with his followers do fay, that the spheare of the whole Heaven is parted into five circles, which they call certaine Zones, cincures, or girdles; of which circles, one is called the Arctick, and is alwaies to be seen of us; a second, the summer Tropick; a third, Equinoctiall the fourth, winter Tropick; and the fifth, the Antartick circle : which is evermore unfeen : as touching the oblique or crooked circle, called the Zodiack, which lieth under the other three middle circles above named, it toucheth them all three as it passeth, and every of them are cut in right angles by the Meridian, which goeth from Pole to Pole.

Pythagoras was the first (men lay) that observed the obliquity of the Zodiack : whic invention nevertheleffe Oenopides the Chian, ascribeth to himselfe, as if he were the author of it.

CHAP. XIII. What is the substance of the Stars, and how they were made and composed,

"Hales affirmeth them to be terrestriall, and nathlesse fiery and ardent. Empedacles holdeth them to be enflamed by that fire, which the skie containing withinit selfe, do violently send forth at the first excretion. Anaxagoras faith, that the skie which environeth is indeed of the own effence of a fiery nature; but by the vilent revolution of it selle snatcheth up flones from the earth, and letting them on fire they become Stars.

Diagenes thinketh, that Stars be of the substance of a pumish stone, as being the breathing holes of the world: and againe, the same Philosopher saith, that they be certaine blind-stones not apparent; howbeit, falling often to the earth, are there quenched, as it hapneth in a place called aryof a orands, that is to fay, Goats rivers, where there fell sometime a stone-star in sorme of fire.

Empedacles holdeth, that the fixed Stars which wander not, befastned to the chrystall skie; but the planets are loofe and at liberty.

Plato giveth out, that for the most part they be of fire, and yet neverthelesse they participate with other elements in manner of glue or fodder.

Xenophanes is of opinion, that they confift of clouds inflamed, which notwithstanding are quenched every day, and afterwards againe be fired in the night in manner of coles: as for the rifing and fetting of Stars, they be nothing elfe but their catching fire and quenching.

Heraclides and the Pythagoreans hold, that every Star is a world by it selfe, containing an earth, an aire, and a skie, in an infinite coelectiall nature; and these opinions go current in the verses of Orpheus, for they make of every Star a world. Epicarus reproveth none of all this, but holdeth still that old note of his: It may to be,

CHAP. XIIII. The forme and figure of Stars.

"He Stoick: fay, that the Stars be sphearick or round like the world, the sun and moon. Cleant bes ho'deth them to be pointed and pyramidall. Anaximenes faith, they stick fast in the chrystalline skie, like a number of nailes. Others imagine, that they be fiery plates, like unto flat pictures.

CHAP. XV. Of the order and situation of Stars.

 \mathbf{V} Enorrates supposeth that the Stars move upon one and the same superficies: but other Stoicks as-Afirme, that there be some afore others in height and depth.

Democritus rangeth the fixed Stars first; next the Planets; and after them, the Sun, the Moon, and Plato, after the fituation of the fixed Stars, fetteth in the first place that which is called Phanon, to wit, the Star of Saturne; in the second, Phaeton, which is the Star of Jupiter; in the third, Pyroeis, that is to fay, fiery or ardent, and it is that of Mars; in the fourth Phosphorus, and that is Venus; in the fifth Stilbon, which is Mercury; in the fixth, the Sun; and last, in the seventh, the Moon, Of the Mathematicians some accord with Plano, others place the Sun in the midit of them all. Anaximander, Metrodorus the Chian, and Crates affirm, that the Sun is placed highest of all, next to him the Moon, and under him the fixed Stars and the Planets.

CHAP. XVI. Of the lation and motion of the Stars.

Naxagoras, Democritus, and Cleanthes, do hold, that all Stars do move from east to west. Aleman and the Mathematicians fay that the Planets hold an opposite course to the fixed stars, and namely from the west to the east.

Anaximander faith, they be carried by their spheres and Circles, upon which they are fastned. Anaximenes is of opinion, that they roll as well toward the earth, as turn about the earth, Plato and the Mathematicians hold, that the course of the Sun, of Venus, and of Mercury, is the fame and equal.

CHAP. XVII.

From whence the Stars have their illumination.

Etrodorus thinketh, that all the fixed Stars have their light from the Sun. Heraclitus, and the Stoicks say that the Stars be nourished by exhalations arising from the

Aristotle opineth, that the celestial bodies need no nurture, for that they are not corruptible but

Place and the Stoicks hold, that all the world and the stars likewise be nourished of themselves,

CHAP, XVIII. Of the two ftars named Dioscuri, to wit, Castor and Pollux.

 $X^{Enophanes}$ doth maintain that the lights like stars which appear otherwhiles upon ships, are thin X and subtile clouds, which after a kind of motion do shime. Metrodorus faith, they be certain glittering sparkles glancing and leaping out of their eys who behold them with fear and aftonishment.

CHAP. XIX. Of the fignification of Stars, and how commeth Winter and Summer.

 P^{Lato} faith, that the tokens and fignifications both of Winter and Summer, proceed from the righting and fetting of Sun, Moon, and other Stars, as well fixed as wandring. Anaximienes faith, that none of all this is occasioned by the Moon, but by the sun only, Endoxus and Aratus affirm them to be in common, by means of all the Stats: and Aratus sheweth its much in these verses:

These radiant stars and lights so evident, As figns, God hath fet in the firmament, Distinct, in great fore-fight, throughout the years To shew how all the seasons ordered were:

CHAP. XX. Of the Suns substance.

A Naximander affirmeth, that the Circle of the Sun is eight and twenty times bigger then the Carth, having an hollow apis about it, like (for all the world) unto a charrior wheele, and the same full of fire: in one certain place whereof, there is a mouth, at which the fire is seen; as out of the hole of a flute, or such like pipe, and the fame is the Sun.

Xenophanes holdeth, that there is a certain gathering of small fires, which by occasion of moist exhalations, meet together; and they all (being collected) make the body of the Sun, or elfe (quoth

he) is a cloud fet on fire. The Stoicke fay, that the fun is an enflamed body * intellectual, or humour inflamed, proceeding * rolein

Plate imagineth it to confift of much fire. Anaxagoras. Democritus and Metrodorus suppose it to be a masse of iron, or a stone inslamed. Aristotle is of opinion, that it is a sphere out of the fifth body, Philolans

Philadan the Pythagorean, is perfwaded that it is in manner of a glaffe, receiving the reverberation of all the fire in the world, and transmitting the light thereof unto us (as it were) thorow a tannife or fitainer, in fach fort, as that fiery light in heaven relembleth the Sun: then that which proceedeth from it, is in form of a mirror: and thirdly, there is a splendour, which by way of reflexion from that mirror, is spread upon us: and this call we the Sun, as it were the image of an image.

Empedacles is of this mind, that there be two Suns, the one an original and primitive fire, which is in the other hemisphere of the world; and the same filling this hemisphere of ours, as being always fituate full oppolite to the reflexion of the resplendent light thereof: as forthis that we fee, it is the light in that other hemisphere, replenished with air mixed with heat, and the same is occasioned by refraxion from the earth, that is more round, entring into the Sun, which is of a Chrystalline nature, and yet is trained and carried away together with the motion of that fire. But to fpeak more plainly and inccinety in fewer words, this is as much to fay, as the Sun is nothing elfe, but the reflexion of that light of the fire which is about the earth.

Epicarus imagineth the Sun to be a terrestrial spisstude of thicknesse, yet spungeons (as it were) and hollow in manner of a pumice stone, and in those holes lightned by fire, > CHAP, XXI. Of the Suns magnitude.

Naximander is of opinion, that the Sun is equal in bigneffe to the earth; but the Circle from A which he hath his respiration, and upon which he is carried, is eight and twenty times bigger then the whole earth.

Anaxagoras faid, it was by many degrees greater then all Peloponnessus.

Heraclitus held, that it was a mansfoot broad.

Epicatus àgain affirmed, that all abovefaid might be ; or that it was as big as it appeared to be, at leastwife a little under or over.

> CHAP. XXII. Of the Suns form.

A Naximenes imagined that the Sun was flat and broad, like unto a thin place of mettal.

Herachtus supposed it to be made like unto a boat somewhat curbed downward & turning up. The Storeks suppose it to beround, like unto the whole world and other stars. Epicarus faith, that all this may be well enough.

> CHAP, XXIII, Of the Solftices or Tropick of the Sun.

Anaxugoras faith, that they are occasioned by the repulse of the air, about the Beares or Poles, which the Sunhimfelie (by thrutting and making thick) causeth to be more powerful.

Empedacler all ribeth the reason thereof to the uphere, that containeth and impeacheth him from passing farther; as also to the two Tropick Circles.

Diogenes imagineth, that the Sun is extinct by the cold, falling opposite upon the head. The Stoich affirm, that the Sun passeth thorow the tract and space of his food and passure lying under him, which is the Oceansea or the earth, upon the vapours and exhalation whereof he feedeth.

Plato, Pythagoras and Ar stolle hold, that this is occasioned by the obliquity of the Zodiack Circle thorow which the Sun paffeth biale; as also by reason of the Tropick Circles, which environand guard him about : and all this, the very iphere it felie doth evidently shew.

> CHAP. XXIV. Of the Suns Ecclipfe.

Hales was the fift who observed the Suns ecclipie, and said, that it was occasioned by the Moon, which is of a terrestrial nature, when as in her race, she cometh to be just and plumb thinder him; which may be plainly teen as in a mirror by fetting a bason of water underneath. Anaximander faid, that the Sun became ecclipfed, when the mouth or tunnel (at which the heat of his fire conteth forth) is closed up. Herail mi is of opinion, that this happeth, when the body of the Sun which is made like a boat, is turned upfide down to as the hollow part thereof is upward and the keel downward to our fight,

Xenophanes affirmeth, that this cometh by extinction of one Sun, and the riling of another again in the east : he addeth moreover, and reporteth, that there is an ecclipse of the Sun, during one whole month; as also one entire and universal ecclipse, in such manner, as the day seemeth to be

Others ascribe the pause thereof, to the thicknesse of clouds, which suddenly and after an hidden manner, overcast the rundie and plate of the Sun.

Ariftarchus reckoneth the Sun among the fixed Stars, faying, that it is the earth which rolleth and turneth round about the Suns Circle, and according to the inclinations thereof, the Suns lightfome body cometh to be darkened by her shade.

Xenoplianes holdeth, that there be many Suns and Moons according to the divers Climates, Tracts, Sections, and Zones of the Earth: and at a certain revolution of time, the rundle of the Sun falleth upon Iome Climate or Section of the Earth, which is not of usinhabited; and so marching (as it were) in some void place, he suffereth ecclipse: he also affirmeth, that the Sun goeth indeed infinitly forward fill, but by reason of his huge distance and retract from us, seemeth to turn round about.

CHAP. XXV. Of the Moons (ubstance.

A Naximander faith, that the Moon is a Circle, xix, times bigger then the Earth, and like as that of the Sun, full of fire; that the fuffereth ecclipfe when her wheele turneth: for that he faith, that circle relembleth the wheele of a charrior, the curvature or felly whereof, is hollow and full of fire; howbeit, there is an hole or tunnel, out of which the fire doth exhale.

Xenophanes faith, that the Moon is a thick, compact, and felted cloud. The Stoicks hold, that she is mixed of fire and air.

Plato affirmeth, that the standeth more of fiery substance.

Anaxagoras and Democritus do hold, that the Moon is a folid and firm body all fiery, containing in it, champion grounds, mountains and vallies.

Heracliuns is of opinion that it is earth overfipread with milts.

Pythagorus also thinketh that the body of the Moon is of the nature of fire,

CHAP. XXV I.

Of the Moon magnitude,

He Stoicks pronounce flatly that the Moon is bigger then the earth, like as the Sun also. Parmenides affirmeth it to be equal in brightness to the Sun, & that of him she hath her light;

CHAP. XXVIII. Of the Moons illumination.

A Naximander faith, that she shath a light of her own, but the same very rare and thin.

Antiphon affirmeth, that she shineth with her own light; and whereas she is otherwhiles hidden, it proceedeth from the opposition of the Sun; namely, when a greater fire cometh to darken a lelle, a thing incident to other stars.

Thales and his followers holds that the Moon is lightned by the Sun.

Heracitus supposeth, that the case of the Sun and Moon is all one, for that both of them being. formed like a Boat; and receiving moist exhalations, they feem in our fight illuminate; the Sun brighter of the twain, for that he goeth in a more clear and pure air, and the Moonin that which is more troubled, which is the reason that she seemeth more dark and muddy.

GHAP. XXX. Of the Moons apparition, and why she seemeth to be earthly.

"He Pythagoreans affirm, that the Moon appeareth terrestrial, for that she is inhabited round about, like as the earth wherein we are, and peopled as it were with the greatest living creatures, and the fair plants; and those creatures within her, be fifteen times stronger and more puis-* integral (and the thin bole with us, and the same yeeld forth no excrements, and the "day there, is in that pro-

Having fummarily, and after a curfory manner treated in the former books; of ceeleftial bodies, and refling in the confines thereof, which is the Moon, I will addresse my selfe in this third book to discourse of Meteors, that is to say, of sich impressions as be engendered in the air above, to the Berwein the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the situation of the Earth: the which men hold generally between the circle of the Moon and the circle of the circle of the Moon and the circle of the circle of the circle of the Moon and the circle of the circle o rally to be instead of the prick or center in that compasse of the universal Globe, And hereat will I begin.

CHAP. I. Of the milk way, or white Circle Galaxia.

His Galaxia is a cloudy or mifty circle, appearing always in the skie; and called it is the Milk way, of the white colour which it doth represent.

Of the Pythagoreans some say, it is the inflammation or burning out of some star removed, and falling out of his proper place, which hath burnt round about all the way as it passed, from the very time of Phaethon his conflagration. Others hold, that in old time the race and course of the Sun was that way. Some are of opinion, that it is a speculary apparition, only occasioned by the reflexion of the Sun beams against the cope of He aven, even as we observe it to fall out between the rainbow and thick clouds. Metrodorus

Metrodorus affirmeth it to be caused by the passage of the sun : for that this is the solar circle. Parmenides is of opinion that the mixture of that which is thick, with the rare or thin, engendereth this milky colour, Anaxagora faith, that the shadow of the earth refleth upon this part of heaven, at what time as the Sun being underneath the earth, doth not illuminate all throughout.

Democritus is perswaded, that it is the resplendent light of many small stars, and those close together, shining one upon another, and so occasioned by their spissitude and astriction.

-Aristole would have it to be an inflammation of a dry exhalation; the same being great in quantity and continued: and to there is an hairy kind of fire under the skie, and beneath the Planets.

Possidonius supposeth it to be a consistence of fire, more clear and subtile than a star: and yet thicker then a splendeur or shining light.

CHAP. 11.

Of Comets, or blazing Stars: of stars seeming to shoot and fall: as also of fiery beams appearing in the air.

Ome of Pythagoras Scholars affirm, that a Comet is a Star of the number of those which appear Inot always, but at certain prefixed seasons after some periodical revolutions do arise.

Others affirm it to be the reflexion of our fight against the Sun, after the manner of those resemblances which shew in mirrors or looking glasses.

Anaxagoras and Democritus lay, that it is a concourse of two stars or more meeting with their lights together.

Aristotle is of opinion, that it is a confidence of a dry exhalation enflamed.

Strato faith, that it is the light of a star enwrapped within a thick cloud, as we see it ordinarily in our lamps and burning lights.

Heraclides of Pontus holdeth it to be a cloud heaved and elevated on high, and the same illuminated by some high light also: and the like reason giveth he of the bearded blazing star called Pagonias. Others (like as all the Peripateticks) affirm, that the beam, the column, and such other meteors or impressions are made after the same manner by divers configurations of clouds in the Epigines supposeth a Comet to be an elevation of spirit or wind mixed with an earthly substance.

Boethus imagineth it to be an apparition of the air, let loose as it were, and spread at large. Diogenes is periwaded that Comers be Stars.

Anaxagorasfaith, that the Stars which are faid to shoot, be as it were sparkles falling from the elementary fire : which is the cause that they are quenched and gone out so quickly.

Metrodorus supposeth, that when the Sun striketh violently upon a cloud, the beams or raies thereof do sparkle, and so cause this shooting of stars as they tearm it.

Kenophares would bear us in hand, that all fuch Meteors and Impressions as these be constitutions or motions of clouds enflamed.

CHAP, III. Of thunders, lightnings, flashes, presters, or fiery blasts, and tempestuous whirlwinds

A Naximander supposeth, that all these come by wind: for when it hapneth that it is conceived and enclosed within a thick cloud, then by reason of the subtilty and lightnesse thereof, it breaketh forth with violence: and the rupture of the cloud maketh a crack; and the divultion or cleaving, by reason of the blacknesse of the cloud, cauteth a shining light.

Metrodorus faith, when a wind chanceth to be enclosed within a cloud gathered thick and close together, the faid wind by burfting of the cloud maketh a noise; and by the firoak and breach it shineth; but by the quick motion carching hear of the Sun, it shooteth forth lightning; but if the said lightning be weak, it turneth into a Prester or burning blase, Anaxagorasis of opinion, that when ardent heat falleth upon cold, that is to say, when a portion of celestial fire lighterh upon the airy substance; by the cracking noise thereof is caused thunders by the colour against the blacknesse of the cloud, a slashing beam; by the plenty and greatnesse of the light, that which we call lightning; and in case the fire be more grosse and corpulent, there arifeth of it a whirlwind; but if the same be of a cloudy nature, it engendereth a burning blast called

The Stoicks hold thunder to be a combat, and smiting together of clouds: that a flashing beame, is a fire or inflammation proceeding from their attrition: that lightning is a more violent flashing, and Prester, lesse forcible.

Aristotle supposeth, that all these Meteors come likewise of a dry exhalation, which being gotten enclosed within a moist cloud, seeketh means, and striveth forcibly to get forth: now by attrition and breaking together, it causeth the clap of thunder; by inflammation of the dry substance, a flashing beam; but Presters, Typhons, that is to say, burning blasts, and whirlewinds, according as the ftore of matter is, more or leffe, which the one and the other draweth to it; but if the same be hotter, you shall see Prester, if thicker, look for Typhon.

CHAP, IIII. Of Clouds, Rain, Snow, and Haile.

Naximenes faith that clouds are engendered when the air is most thicks which if they coagulate A fill more and more, there is expressed from them a shower of rain: but in case this matter as it falleth, do congeale, it turneth to be fnow; but fay it meet with a cold moilt wind and be furprized therewith, it proveth haile, Metrodorus suppoteth, that clouds be composed of a waterish evaporation elevated, Epicurus of meer * vapors : also that as well the drops of rain as haile stones, become round by the long way of their descent.

CHAP, V. Of the Rainbow.

A Mong those Meteors or impressions engendered in the aire, some there be which have a true fubstrance indeed, as rain and haile: others again, have no more but a bare appearance, without fible bodies any real subsidence, much like as when we are within a ship, we imagine that the continent and firm land doth move: and among those which are in appearance only, we must range the Rainbow Place faith, that men derive the Genealogy of it from Thanmas, as one would say, from wonder, because they marvelled much to see it: according as Homer sheweth in this verse:

Like as when mighty Jupiter the purple rainbow bends, Thereby to mortal men from heaven a wondroustoken sends, Which either tempelts terrible, or woful war portends.

And hereupon it is, that some have made thereof a fabulous device, and given out, that she having a bulls head, drinketh up the rivers. But how is this Rainbow engendered, and how cometh it to to appear? Certes, we see by lines, either direct and ftraight, or crooked, or else rebated and broken: which though they be obscure, and appear not evidently, yet are perceived by cogitation and discourse of reason, as being bodilesse. Now by right lines we behold things, some in the air, and othersthorow transparent ftones and horns; for that all these consist of very subtile parts: by crooked and curbed lines, we look within the water: for our eye-fight doth bend and turn again perforce, by reason that the matter of the water is more thick: which is the cause, that we see the mariners Oare in the fea afar off, as it were crooked. The third manner of feeing, is by refraction, and so we behold objects in mirrors; and of this fortisthe Rainbow: for we must consider and underftand, that a moist vapour being lifted up aloft, is converted into a cloud; and then within a while by little and little,, into small dew drops: when as therefore, the Sun descendeth westward, it cannot chule, but every Rainbow must needs appear opposite unto it in the contrary part of the skie: and when our fight falleth upon those drops, it is rebated and beaten back: and by that means there is presented unto ita Rainbow: now those drops are not of the form and figure of a bow, but reprefent a colour only: and verily the first and principal hew that this bow hath, is a light and bright red : the second, a deep vermillion or purple : the third, blew and green : Let us consider then, whether the said red colour appear not, because the brightnesse of the Sun beating upon the cloud, and the sincere light thereof ressected and driven back, maketh a ruddy or light red hew: but the second part more obscure, and rebating the said splendor through those dewy drops, causeth a purple tindure, which is (as it were) an abatement of red: and then as it becometh more muddy still, and darkning that which diftinguisheth the sight, it turneth into a green: and this is a thing which may be proved by experience: for if a man take water directly against the Sun beams in his mouth, and spit the same forward, in such sort, as the drops receive a repercussion against the said raies of the Sun, he shall find that it will make (as it were) a Rainbow. The like befalleth unto them that are bleer-eyed, when they look upon a lampor burning light.

Anaximent supposeth, that the Rainbow is occasioned by the Sun shining sull against a grosse, thick and black cloud, in fuch fort, as his beams be not able to pierce and firike thorow, by reason that they turn again upon it, and become condensate. Anaxagoras holderh the Rainbow to be the refraction or repercussion of the Suns round light against a thick cloud, which ought always to be opposite full against him, in manner of a mirror: by which reaton, in nature it is faid, that there appear two Suns in the country of Pontus.

Metrodorus faith, when the Sun shineth thorow clouds, the cloud seemeth blew, but the light looketh red.

CHAP. VI. Of Water-galls or streaks like rods, somewhat resembling Rainbows.

THese rods and opposite apparitions of Suns, which are seen otherwhiles in the skie, hap-Pen through the temperature of a subject matter and illumination: namely, when clouds are feen not in their natural and proper colour, but by another, canfed by a divers irradiation: and in all there, the like passions fall out both naturally, and also are purchased by accident, CHAP,

CHAP. VII. Of Wind:s.

Naximander is of opinion, that the Wind is a fluxion of the aire; when as the most subtile and Aliquid parts thereof be either firred, or melted and resolved by the Sun.

Opinions of Philosophers.

The Stoicks affirm, that every blatt is a fluxion of the aire and that according to the mutation of regions, they change their names ; as for example, that which bloweth from the darknesse of the night and Sun letting; is named Zephyriu; from the East and Sun riling, Apelioter; from the North, Boreas; and from the South, Libs.

Metrodorns Supposeth, that a waterish vapour being enchased by the heat of the Sun, produceth and raileth thele winds : and as forthole that be anniverlary, named Etefie, they blow, when the air about the North pole is thickened and congealed with cold, and so accompany the Sun, and flow (as it were) with him, as he retireth from the Summer Tropick, after the Æltival Solflice.

CHAP, VIII, Of Winter and Summer.

Mp-docles and the Stoicks do hold, that Winter cometh when the air is predominant in thicks before, and is forced upward; but Summer, when the fire is in that wife predominant; and is Thus having discoursed of the impressions alost in the aire, we will treat also (by the way) of those which are seen upon and about the earth.

CHAP, IX. Of the Earth: the substance and magnitude thereof.

Heles with his followers affirm, there is but one Earth. Oecetes the Pythagorean, maintaineth twain; one here, and another opposite against it, which the Antipodes inhabit.

The Stoicks say, there is one Earth, and the same finite. Xenophanes holdeth, that beneath it is foundedupon an infinite depth; and that compact it is Metrodorus is of opinion, that Earth is the very sediment and ground of the water; like as the Sun is the residence of the air, Hales, the Stoicks and their school affirm the Earth to be round, in manner of a globe or ball.

Anaximander resembleth the Earth unto a column or pillar of stone, such as are seen upon the superficies thereof.

Anaximenes Comparethit to affattable; Leucippus, unto a drum or tabour : Democritus faith, that it is in form broad, in manner of a platter, hollow in the midft.

THe disciples of Thales maintain, that the Earth is seated in the midst of the world.

Xenonlanes affirmed what is was first sounded and are the midst of the world. Xenophanes affirmeth, that it was first founded and rooted as it were to an infinite depth. Philolaus the Pythagorean faith, that fire is the middle, as being the hearth of the world, in the second place he rangeth the Earth of the Antipodes: and in the third, this wherein we inhabit, which lieth opposite unto that counter earth, and turneth about it : which is the reason (quoth he) that those who dwell there, are not seen by the inhabitants here.

Parmenides was the first Philosopher, who see out and limited the habitable parts of the Earth, to wit, those which are under the two Zones, unto the Tropicks or Solfticial circles.

CHAP. XII. Of the bending of the Earth.

 $D^{\gamma_{thagorat}}$ is of opinion, that the earth enclineth toward the Meridional parts, by reason of the rattly which is in those South coasts: for that the Septentrional tracks are congealed, and frozen with o'd, whereas the opposite regions be inflamed and burnt.

D. mecritus yee deth this reason; because of the ambient air is weaker toward the South (quoth he) the Earth as it groweth and encrealeth, doth bend to that fide: for the North parts be intemperate: whereas contrativale the Southern parts are temperate: in which regard it weigheth more that way whereas indeed it is more plentiful in bearing fruits, and thosegrowing to greater aug-

CHAP. XIII.
The motion of the Earth.

Some hold the earth to be unmoveable and quiet but Phildaus the Pythagorean faith, that it moves the round about the fire, in the oblique circle, according as the Sun and Moon do.

Heraclides of Ponins, and Ecphanius the Pythagorean, would indeed have the Earth to move, howbeit not from place to place but rather after a turning manner like unto a wheele upon the Exel tree, from West to East, round about her own center.

Democritus faith that the Earth at first wandered to and fro, by reason as well of smalnesse as lightnesses the waxing in time thick and heavy, it came to rest unmoveable.

CHAP. XIIII. The division of the Earth, and how many Zones it hath.

Prihagoras faith, that the earth is divided into five Zones proportionably to the sphear of the universal heaven; to wit, the Artick Circle, the Tropick of Summer, the Tropick of Winter, the Equinoctial and the Antartick. Of which the middleshoot doth determine and set out the very midt and heart of the earth: and for that cause it is named Torrida Zonas that is to say, the burnt climate: but that region is habitable, as being temperate, which lieth in the midst between the summer and the winter Tropick.

CHAP. XV.
Of Earthquakes.

Hales and Democritus attribute the cause of Earthquakes unto water.

The Stoicks thus define and say, Earthquake is the moisture within the earth subtiliated and reloved into the air, and so breaking our perforce.

Anaximenes is of opinion, that rarity and drinesse of the earth together, be the causes of Earthquake: whereof the one is engendered by exceffixe drought, the other by gluts of rain.

Anaxagoras holdeth, that when the air is gotten within the earth, and meeteth with the superficies thereof, which it findeth tough and thick, so as it cannot get forth, it shaketh it inmanner of trembling.

Arifeste alliedgeth, the Antiperiftafis of the circumstant cold which environeth about onevery. fide, both above and beneath: for heat endeas overth and maketh haste to mount alost, as being by nature light. A dry exhalation, therefore anding it selfe enclosed within and stayed, striveth to by nature light. A dry exhalation, therefore anding it felfe enclosed within and stayed, striveth to make way through the cliss and chinks of the earth, in which businesse it cannot chuse but by turning to and frow up and down disquiet and shake the earth.

Merodorus is of mind, that no body being in the own proper and natural place can fir or move, unleffe fome one do actually thrust or pull it. The earth therefore (quoth helbeing fituate in the own place, naturally moveth not: how soever some places thereof may remove into others, Parmenides and Democritus reason in this wifer for that the earth onevery side is of equal distance, and confineth still in one counterposite, as having no cause wherefore it should incline more to the one side than to the other: therefore well it may shake onely, but not stir or remove for all that.

Anaximent saith, that the earth is carried up and down in the air, for that it is broad and star.

Others fay, that it floateth upon the water, like as planks or boards, and that for this cause it mo-

Plate affirmeth, that of all motions there be fix forts of circumflances, above, beneath, on the right hand, on the left, before and behind. Allo that the earth cannot possibly move according to any of their differences; for that on every side it lieth lowest of all things in the world, and by occanion thereof restert unmoveable, having no cause why it should encline more to one part then to another, but yet some places of her because of their rarity do jog and shake.

Epicarus keepeth his old tune, faying it may well be, that the earth being shogged, and as it were rocked and beaten by the air underneath, which is grosse and of the nature of water, therefore moveth and quaketh. As also, it may be (quoth he) that being hollow and full of holes in the pasts below; it is forced to tremble and shake by the air that is gotten within the caves and concavities, and there enclosed.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Sea, bow it was made and cometh to be bitter.

A Naximander affirmeth, that the Sea is a refidue remaining of the primitive humidity, whereof the Sun having burnt up and confumed a great part, the rest behind he altered and turned from the natural kind by his excelsive ardem theat.

Anaxageratis of opinion, that the faid first humidity being diffused and spread abroad in manner of a poole or great mear, was burnt by the motion of the Sun about it: and when the oilous substance thereof was exhaled and consumed, the rest settled below, and turned into a brackish and bitter saltnesse, which is the Sea.

Empedacles faith, that the Sea is the sweat of the earth, enchased by the sun, being bathed and washed all over aloft.

Antifon thinketh it to be the sweat of heat, the mosture whereof which was within, being by much seething and boyling sent out, becommeth salt; a thing ordinary in all sweats.

Metrodorus supposeth the Sea to be that moissure, which running thorow the earth, retained some part of the density thereof, like as that which passeth through ashes.

The diciples of Plato imagine, that so much of the elementary water which is congealed of the air by refrigeration, is sweet and fresh; but whatsoever did evaporate by burning and inflammation, became salt.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Tides, to wit, the ebbing and flowing of the sea, what is the cause thereof?

A Riffule and Heraclitus affirme, that it is the fun which doth its as who flirreth, raifeth, and Acarrieth about with him the most part of the windes, which comming to blowus on the Ocean, cause the Atlantick sea to swell, and so make the slux or high water; but when the same are allayed and clean down, the sea falleth low, and so cause the areas and ebbe or low water.

Pytheas of Marieils, referreth the cause of flowing to the full Moon, and ebbing to the Moon in the wane

Plate attribute thall to a certain rifing of the waters, faying, There is fuch an elevation, that through the mouth of a cave carrieth the Ebbe and Flow to and fro, by the means wheteof, the feas do rife and flow contrarily.

This Halo is made after this manner: between the body of the Moon, or any other Star, and our eye-fight, there gathere the groffe and milty bir, by which air, anon our fight coment to be reflected and diffulfed and afterwards the same incurrent upon the faid Star, according to the exterior circumference thereof, and thereupon appeareth a circle round about the fart, which being therefore he is called Halo, for that it feement that the apparent imprefilion is close unto that, upon which our fight to enlarged, as is before faid, doth fall, CHAP, II, Of the Soul.

Hales was the first that defined the soul to be a nature moving always, or having motion of it

Pythagoras faith, it is a certain number moving it felf: and this number he taketh for intelligen e or understanding

Plato supposeth it to be an intellectual substance moving it selfe, and that according to harmoni-

Aristoile is of opinion, that it is the first Entelechia or primitive act of a natural and organical body, having life potentially. Dicearchus thinketh it to be the harmony and concordance of the four elements.

Asclepiades the Physician definethic to be an exercise in common of all the senses together, CHAP. III. Whether the foule be a body, and what is the substance of it.

LI these Philosophers before rehearsed, suppose that the soul is incorporal, that of the own na-Ature it moveth and is a spiritual substance, and the action of a natural body, composed of many organs or instruments, and withal having life.

But the Sectaries of Anaxagoras have given out, that it is of an airy substance, and a very body.

The Stocks would have the foul to be an hot spirit or breath.

Democritus holdeth it to be a certain fiery composition of things perceptible by reason, and the fame having their forms spherical and round, and the pullance of fire, and withal to be a body.

Epicerus faith, it is a mixtion or temperature of four things, to wit, of a certainfire, of (I wot not what) air, of an odd windy subtrance, and of another fourth matter, I cannot tell what to name it, and which to him was sensible.

Heraclitus, affirmeth the foul of the world to be an evaporation of humors within it: as for the foul of living creatures, it proceedeth (quoth he) as well from an evaporation of humors without, as an exhalation within it felfe, and of the same kind.

CHAP. IV. The parts of the Soul.

Prinagorus and Plato, according to a more general and remote division, hold, that the foul hath two parts, that is to fay, the Reasonable and the unreasonable; but to go more neer and exactly to work, they fay, it hath three; for they subdivided the unreasonable part into Concupiscible and I-

The Stoicks be of opinion, that composed it is of eight parts, whereof five be the senses natural, to wit, fight, hearing, (melling, tasting, and feeling; the fixth is the voice; the seventh generative, or spermatical, and the eighth, understanding, which guideth and commandeth all the rest by certain proper organs and infruments, like as the Polype fifth by her clees and hairy branches.

Democritus and Epicurus feet down two parts of the foule; the Reafonable feated in the breft, and the Unreasonable spread and dispersed over all the structure of the body besides.

As for Democritus, he affirmeth, that all things what foever, have a certain kind of foul, even the very dead bodies, for that always they do manifelly participate a kind of heat and fensitive faculty, notwithstanding the most part thereof be breathed forth, and yeelded up.

CHAP, V. Which is the Mistresse and commanding part of the Soul, and wherein it is.

Plao and Democritus place it in the head throughout: Strato between the two eye-brows: E-rafitratus in the membrane or kell that enfoldeth the brain, & it he calleth Epicranus: Herophilus within the ventricle or concavity of the brain, which also is the basis or foundation of it: Parmenides over all the breit, and with him accordeth Epicurus: the Stoicks all with one voice hold it to be in the whole heart, or elfe in the spirit about the heart : Diogenes in the cavity of the great Artery of the heart, which is full of vital spirit: Empedocles in the consistence or masse of blood: others in the very neck of the heart: some in the tunicle that lappeth the heart: and others agains in the midriff: some of our modern Philosophers hold, that it taketh up and occupieth all the space from the head downward to the Diaphragma or Midriff above said: Pythagoras supposeth that the vital part of the foul is about the heart, but the reason and the intellectual or spiritual part, about the head.

CHAP. VI. The motion of the Soul.

PLanois of opinion, that the foul moveth continually; but the intelligence or understanding is immoveable, in regard of local motion from place to place.

Aristoile faith, that the foul it selfe moveth not, although it be the author that sules and directeth all motion showheit, that by an accident, it is not devoid of motion, according as divers forts of bodies do move.

CHAP. VII. Of the Souls immortality.

Prhagora: and Plate affirm the foul to be immortal; for in departing out of the body, it retireth to the foul of the universal world, even to the nature which is of the same kind.

The Stoicks hold, that the foulgoing from the body, if it befeeble and weak, as that is of ignorant persons, seleth downward with the grosse consistence of the body; but if it be more firme and puillant, as that is of wife and learned men, it continueth " even unto the conflagration of all, Democritus and Epicurus tay, that it is corruptible, and perisheth together with the body.

Pythagoras and Plato are of opinion, that the reasonable part of the soul is immortal and incorruptible; for that the foul, if it be not God, yet the work it is of eternal God: as for the unreason- Some inable part, it is mortal and subject to corruption.

CHAP. VIII. Of the Senses and sensible objects.

"He Stoick thus define Sense: Sense (say they) is the apprehention of the schleive organ. But Sense is taken many ways; for we understand by it, either an habitude or faculty natural, or a frible action, or elfe an imagination apprehensive; which all are performed by the meanes of an instrument tensitive; yea, and the very eighth part of the soul abovenamed, even that which is principal, to wir, the discourse of reason, by which all the rest do consist: Again, the spirits intellectual, are called fenfitive inftruments, which from the faid principal understanding teach unto all the

The Sense (quoth Epioneur) is that parcel of the foul which is the sensitive power at selfe, and the effect which proceeders from it, so that he taketh Sense in two forts, for the power, and effect.

Plate defineth Senfe to be the fociety of the body and foul, as touching external objects; for the faculty and power of Senie is proper to the foule, the infrument belongeth to the body; but both the one and the other at prehendeth external things, by the means of the imaginative faculty, or the Leucippus and Democritus do say, that both Sense and intelligence are actuated by the means of certain images represented from without upto us, for that neither the one nor the other, can be performed without the occurrence of some such image.

CHAP. IX. Whether Senses and Fanfies be true or no?

Tille Stoich hold, that the Senles be true; but of Imaginations, as some be true, so others are Epicurus supposeth that all Senses and Imaginations be true : marry of opinions, some be true, others falle : and as for the Sense, it is deceived one way only to within things intelligible : but imagination after two forts: for that there is an Imagination as well of fensible things, as of intelligible.

Empedocles and Heraclides lay, that particular Senses are effected according to the proportion of their pores and passages; namely, as the proper object of each Sense is well disposed and fitted.

Democritus affirmeth, that there be more Senses in brute beafts, in the gods, and in wife men.

CHAP. XI.

After what manner is effected Sense, Notion and Reason, according to disposition or affection.

He Stoicks are of opinion and fay, that when a man is engendered, he hath the principal part of his foule, which is the understanding, like for all the world unto a parchment or paper ready to be written in; and therein he doth register and record every several Notion and cogitation of his: for those who have perceived any thing by Sense, (as for example sake, have seen a white thing) when the tame is gone out of their eye, retain it fill in memory: now after they have collected together many semblable memories of the same kind, then they say, they have experience; for experience is nothing elie but an heap or multitude of like forts: but of notions and thoughts, some be natural, which are caused in manner aforesaid, without any artificial means; others comeby our study, and by reaching, and such alone properly and indeed are called Notions; the other bee named rather conceptions or anticipations; and Reason for which we bear the name of Reasonable, is accomplished by those anticipations in the first seven years: and intelligence is the conception in the understanding of a reasonable creature : for phantasie when it lighteth upon the reasonable foul is then called Intelligence, taking the denomination of understanding, which is the cause that these imaginations are not incident unto other creatures; but such as are presented unto gods and us both, those are only and properly imaginations; whereas those which offer themselves linto us, are imaginations in general, and cogitations in special: like as Deniers, Testons, or Crowns being considered apart in themselves, are Deniers, Testons and Crowns; but if you give them for the hire of a ship, then bendes that they are Demers, &c., they be also the fare, to rierry or passage,

CHAP, XII.

What difference there is between Imagination, Imaginable, Imaginative, and Imagined:

Hrysippus saith, there is a difference between all these sour; and first, as for * Imagination, it is a pathon or impression in the soul, shewing the selfe same thing that made and imprinted it: as for example; when with our eyes we behold a white, it is a passion or affection engendered by the fight in our foul, and we may well fay, that the faid white is the subject or object that moveth and affectethus : semblably in smelling and touching, and this is called Phantasie, a word derived of sale or sor, which light or clearnesse; for like as the light sheweth it selfe, and all charis comprised in it; so the Phantase or imagination represente thit selfe, and that which made it. Imaginable is that which maketh imagination, as white, cold, and what foever is able to move or affect the foul, is called imaginable,

Phantaltick or Imaginative, is a vain attraction; even an affection or passion in the soul, which cometh not from any object imaginable; like as we may observe in him that fighteth with his own fhadow, or in vainflingeth forth his hands : for in true phantafie; or imagination, there is a fubject matter named Imaginable: but in this Phantastick of Imaginative there is no luch object or subject

Phantaime or * Imagined, is that unto which we are drawn by that vain attraction : a thing ulu-Phentaime or: amagined, is that unto which we are drawn by that vain attraction; a thing unal with those who are either furious, or surprized with the malady of melancholy: for Orestee in the Tragedy of Europides when he utterest these speeches,

Of fight, and how we do see.

Democritus and Epicurus supposed, that sight was caused by the intromission of certain images others by an infinuation of beams, returning to our eye-sight, after the occurrence of an object.

Empedoclis

Empedacles hath mingled the faid images and beames together, calling that which is made thereof. the raies of a compound image. Hipparchus holdeth, that the beams fent out and launced from the one eye, and the other comming to be extended, in their ends meet together, and as it were by the one eye, and the other comming to be extended, in their ends meet rogether, and as it were by the touching and classing of hands, taking hold of external bodies, catry back the apprehension of them unto the visive power.

Plate attributeth it to the corradiation or conjunction of fight, for that the light of the eyes reachest a good way within the aire of like nature, and the light likewite is fining from the visible bodies, cuteth the aire between, which of licelies is almost and notation; and location detuit it together with the fiery power of the eye; and this is it which is called the conjunct light of corradiation of the Platonicks.

How the Soule commeth to be sensitive; and what is the principall and predominant part thereof.

The Stoicks are of opinion, that the supreame and highest part of the Soule is the principall and the guide of the other: to wit that which maketh imaginations, causeth assens, performeth fences, and moveth appetite: and this is it which they call the discourse of reason. Now of this prinrenes, and movetal appetite. and this is a time to the springing from it, and which are spread through the cipall and soveraign part, there be seven others springing from it, and which are spread through the red of the body, like unto the armes or hairy branches of a poulp fish: of which seven the natural sense make five; namely, Sight, Smelling, Hearing, Talting, and Feeling. Of these the Sight is a spirit sense that the chief the natural sense the sight is a spirit sense that the chief the sense that the sens pating from the chiefest part unto the eyes: Hearing, a spirit reaching from the understanding to the eres: Smelling, a spirit issuing from reason to the nostrils: Tasting, a spirit going from the toresaid principall part unto the tongue: and last of all Feeling, a spirit stretching and extended from the same predominant part, as far as to the fensible superficies of those objects which are ease to be felt and handled. Of the twaine behind, the one is called genitall feed, and that is likewife a spirit transmitted from the principall part unto the genitories or members of generation: the other which is the seventh and last of all, Zeno calleth Vocall, and we, Voice; a spirit also, which from the prinepail part passeth to the wind-pipe, to the tongue, and other instruments appropriate for the voice, and to conclude, that Missisher selfe and Lady of the rest is seated (as it were in the midst of her own world) within our round head, and there dwelleth.

CHAP. XXII. Of Respiration.

Empedocles is of opinion, that the first Respiration of the first living creature was occasioned, when the humidity in young ones within the mothers wombe retired, and the outward aire came to increed in place thereof, and to enter into the void vessels now open to receive the same: but afterwards the naturall heat driving without forth this airy substance for to evaporate and breath away, cuifed expiration: and likewife when the same returned in against there enfined in pration, which gave new entrance to that aereous substance. But as touching the respiration that now is, he thinketh it to be when the bloud is carried to the exterior superficies of the body; and by this sluxion doth drive and chase the airy substance through the nostrils, and cause expitation; and inspiration when the blond returned inward, and when the aire reentreth with all through the rarities which the blond hath left void and empty. And for to make this better to be underflood, he bringeth in the example of a Clepsidre or water houre-glasse.

Asclepindes maketh the lungs in manner of a tunnell, supposing that the cause of Respiration is the aire, imooth, and of jubrill parts which is within the breast, unto which the aire without, being thick and groffe, floweth and runneth; but is repelled back againe, for that the breaft is not able to receive any more, nor yet to be cleane without: Now when as there remaineth still behind some little of the subtile aire within the breast, (for it cannot all be cleane driven out) that aire without rechangeth againe with equal force upon that withih, being able to support and abide the weight thereof: and this compareth he to Phylicians ventoles, or cupping glaffes. Moreover, as touching voluntary Respiration, he maketh this reason, that the smallest holes within the substance of the

Herophilus leaveth the motive faculties of the body unto the nerves, arteries, and muscles: for thus he thinketh and faith; that the lungs only have a naturall appetite to dilation, and contraction, that isto fay, to draw in and deliver the breath, and so by consequence other parts. For this is the proper action of the lungs, to draw wind from withouts wherewith when it is filled there is made another attraction by a lecond appetition; and the breast deriveth the said wind into it: which being likewife repleat therewith, not able to draw any more, it transmitteth back agains the superfluitythereof into the lungs, whereby it is fent forth by way of expiration: and thus the parts of the body reciprocally fuffer one of another, by way of interchange. For when the lungs are occupied indilatation, the breaft is bused in contraction; and thus they make repletion and evacuation by a mutuall participation one with the other; in fuch fort as we may observe about the lungs four mamer of motions. The first, whereby it receives the aire from Without sthe second, by which it transfuerth into the breaft that aire which it drew and received from without; the third, whereby it admittethagaine unto it felfe that which was sent out of the breast; and the sourth, by which it fendeth quite forth that which fo returned into it. And of these motions two bedilarations, the one occasioned from without, the other from the breast: and the other two, contractions; the one when the breaft draweth wind into it: and the other when it doth expell the aire infinnated into it. But in the breat parts there be but two only, the one dilatation when it draweth wind from the lungs, the other contraction, when it rendreth it againe.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Passion of the body; and whether the soule have a fellow-feeling with it, of paine and dolour

THe Stoicks lay, that affections are in the passible parts, but senses in the principall part of the loule, Epicurus is of opinion, that both the affections and also the senses, are in the passible places : for that reason which is the principall part of the soule he holdeth to be unpassible.

Strato Contrariwise affirmeth, that as well the Passions of the soule, as the senses, are in the said principall part, and not in the affected and grieved places; for that in it confifteth patience, which we may observe in terrible and dolorous things, as also infearefull, and magnanimous persons.

The Fifth Book of Philosophers Opinions.

CHAP. I. Of Divination.

PLate and the Stoicks bring in a fore-deeming and fore-knowledge of things by inspiration or divine inflinct, according to the divinity of the soule; namely, when as it is ravished with a sanaticall spirit or revelation by dreames: and these admit and allow many kinds of divination.

Xenophanes and Epicurus on the contrary fide abolish and annull all Divination whatsoever. Pythagoras condemneth that only which is wrought by facrifices.

Aristorie and Dicecrehus receive none but that which commeth by Divine inspiration, or by dreames; not supposing the soule to be immortall, but to have some participation of Divinity.

CHAP. II. How Dreames are canfed.

Emocritum is of opinion, that Dreames come by the representation of images. Strate faith, that our understanding is I wot nothow, naturally, and yet by no reason, more sensitive in sleep than otherwise, and therefore sollicited the rather by the appetite and desire of Herophilus affirmeth, that Dreames divinely inspired come by necessity; but natural Dreames by by this meanes, that the foule formeth an image and representation of that which is good and commodious unto it, and of that which must ensue thereupon: as for such as be of a mixt nature of both, they fall out casually by an accidentallaccesse of images; namely, when we imagine that we see that which we defire; as it falleth out with those who in their sleep thinke they have their paramours in their armes.

CHAP. III. What is the Substance of Naturall seed.

A Ristorle defineth Seed to be that which hath power to move in it selfesor the effecting of some fuch thing, as it was from whence it came.

Pythagora taketh it to be the soame of the best and purest bloud, the superfluity and excrement of nouriture; like as bloud and marrow.

Alem con faith, it is a portion of the braine.

Place supposeth it to be a decision or deflux of the marrow in the back bone, Epicurus imagineth it to be an abstract of soule and body.

Democritus holdeth, that it is the geniture of the fleshly nerves proceeding from the whole body, and the principall parts thereof.

CHAP. IIII.
Whether genitall Seed be a body.

Encippus and Zeno take it to be a body; for that it is an abstract parcell of the soule, Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristate acknowledge indeed and confesse, that the power and some of Seed is bodileffe; like as the understanding, which is the author of motion; but the matter thereof lay they, which is shed and sent forth, is corporall.

Streto and Democritus affirme the very puissance thereof to be a body, howbeit, spirituall, CHAP. V. Whether females send forth Seed as well as males.

P'thagorat, Epicurus, and Democritus hold, that the Female likewise dischargeth Seed; for that it hath seminary vessels turned backward; which is the reason that she hath lust unto the act of ge-

Arifforle and Zeno be of opinion, that the female delivereth from it a moist matter, resembling the sweat which commeth from their bodies, who wrestle or exercise together: but they will not have it to be Seed.

Hippon avoucheth that Females do ejaculate Seed no lesse than Males, howbeit the same is not effectuall for generation, for that it falleth without the matrix: whereupon it commeth to paffe that fome women, though very few, and widdows especially, do cast from them Seed without the company of men and he affirmeth, that of the male Seed, are made the bones, and of the female the flesh.

CHAP, VI. The manner of Conception

A Referte thinketh, that Conceptions come in this manner: when as the matrix drawn before from the naturall purgation, and therewithall the monthly tearmes fetch fome part of purebloud from the whole mafte of the body, so that the males genitall may come to it, and so concur to engender: Contrariwise, that which hindereth conception is this, namely, when the matrix is impure orfull of ventofities; as it may be by occasion of seare, of forrow, or weaknesse of women; yea, and by the impuissance and defect in men.

CHAP. VII. How it commeth that Males are engendred, and how Females.

Parmenides maintaineth the contrary, and faith, that Males were bred toward the Northern quarteresfor that the aire there is more groffe and thicker than eliewhere : on the other fide, Females toward the South, by reafon of the ratity and inbellity of the aire,

Hipponax attributeth the cause hereof unto the leed, as it is either more thick or powerfull, or thinner and weaker.

Anaxagoras and Parmenides hold, that the feed which commeth from the right fide of a man, ordinarily is cast into the right side of the matrix; and from the lest side likewise into the same side of the matrix : burif this ejection of feed fall out otherwise cleane crosse; then Females be engendred; Leophanes, of whom Aristotle maketh mention, affirmeth, that the Males be engendred by the right genitory, and females by the left.

Hop Monsters are engindred. E Meddeles affirmeth, that Monflers beengendred either through the abundance of feed; or dec. division of the feed into fundry parts; or elfe through the declination therefore our of the right ways the declination therefore our of the right ways the declination that the feed into fundry parts; or elfe through the declination therefore our of the right ways the dark that the feed into fundry parts; or elfe through the declination of the feed into fundry parts; or elfectively the feed into fundry parts; And tome Phyticians there be, who lay, that at fuch a time as monflets be engendred the matrix full state begins first hill from the begins first hill from the begins first hill from the begins first hill for the begins for that it is differed with wind;

What is the reason that a woman, though of continue she accompanieth with a man, doth not conceive.

Dleeles the Physician rendreth this reason, for that fome do send forth no seed at all; or leffe in quantity than is sufficient, or such in quality, which has no vivisicant or quickning power; or elle it is for defect of heat; of cold, of moisture, or drinesse; or last of all, by occasion of the paralyse or resolution of the privy parts and members of generation.

The Stoicky lay the cause hereof upon the obliquity or crookednesse of the mansmember, by occasion yhereof, he cannot shoot forth his seed directly; or essentially reason of the disproportion of the parts, as namely, when the matrix lieth too far within, that the yard cannot reach unto it. Eraffbratus findeth fault in this case with the matrix, when it hath either hard callofities, or too much carnofity; or when it is more rare and ipungeous; or elfe smaller then it ought to be; Mmm 3

CHAP. X.

How it commeth that two Twins and three Twins are borne.

Mpedocles faith, that two Twins or three, are engendred by occasion either of the abundance. Cor the divultion of the feed.

. Asclepiades affigneth it unto the difference of bodies, or the excellence of seed : after which manner we fee how fome barley from one root beareth two or three stalks with their eares upon them. according as the feed was most fruitfull and generative.

Erasistratus attributeth it unto divers conceptions and superfactations, like as in brute beasts; for when as the matrix is cleanfed, then it commeth foon to conception and superfatation,

The Stoicks alledge to this purpose the cels or conceptacles within the matrix; for as the seedfalleth into the first and second, there follow conceptions and superfectations, and after the same fort may three Twins be engendred.

How commeth it to passe that children resemble their parents or progenitors before them.

E Mpedacles affirmeth, that as similitudes are caused by the exceeding force of the genicall seed; so the dissimilitudes arise from the evaporation of naturall heat contained within the same seed. Parmenides is of opinion, that when the feed descendeth out of the right side of the matrix, the children be like unto the fathers, but when it passets from the left side, unto the mothers.

. The Staicks opine thus; from the whole body and the foule paffeth the feed, and so the similitudes do forme of the same kinds, the figures & characters, like as a painter of the like colours straweth the image of that which he feeth before him : also the woman for her part doth confer genitall feed, which if it be prevalent, then the infant is like unto the mother; but if the mans feed be more predominant, it will resemble the father.

CHAP. XII.

How it falleth out that children resemble others, and not their fathers and mothers.

"He most part of the Physicians affirme this to happen by chance and adventure, but upon this occasion, that the feed, as well of the man as the woman waxeth cold, for then the infants refemble neither the one nor the other.

Empedacles attributeth the forme and resemblance of young babes in the wombe, unto the strong imagination of the woman in time of conception; for many times it bath been known, that women have been enamoured of painted images and flatues, and fo delivered of children like unto

How it commeth that some women be barren, and men likewise unable to get children:

DHysicians hold, that women bebarren by reason that the matrix is either too streight, overrare, or too hard; or elie by occasion of certaine callosities or carnosities: for shat the women themselves be weaklings and heartlesse, or do not thrive but mislike; or else because they are fallen into some Cachexia and evill habit of body; or by reason that they are distorted, or otherwise

Diocles faith, that men in this action of generation are impotent, for that fome fend forth no feed arall, or at least wife in quantity lefte than is meet, or such as hath no generative power; or because their genitals be paralyticall or relaxed; or by reason that the yard is crooked, that it cannot cast the feed forward; or for that the genital members be disproportioned and not of a competent length, confidering the distance of the matrix.

The Stoicks lay the fault upon certaine faculties and qualities, discordant in the parties themselves that come together about this businesses; who being parted one from another, and conjoyated with others uniting well with their complexion, there followeth a temperature according to nature, and a child is gotten between them.

> CHAP, XIIII, ... Why Mules be barren.

A Leman is of opinion, that Mulets, that is to fay, male Mules be not able to engender, for that their feed or geniture is of a thin substance which proceedeth from the coldnesse thereof. The Females also, because their shaps do not open wide enough, that is to say, the mouth thereof doth not gape sufficiently; for these be the very tearmes that he useth

Empedocles blameth exility or smalnesse, the low positure, and the over-streight conformation of the matrix, being to turned backward and tied unto the belly, that neither feed can be directly cast into the capacity of it, nor if it were carried thither would it receive the same Unto whom Diocles also beareth witnesse, saying, Many times (quoth he) in the dissection of Anatomies we have seen such matrices of Mules; and it may be therefore, that in regard of such causes some women also be barren.

CHAP, XV.

Whether the Infant lying yet in the mothers wombe, is to be accounted a living creature or no.

 \mathbf{P}^{Lao} directly pronounceth that fuch an Infant is a living creature: for that it moveth, and is fed within the belly of the mother.

The Stoicks say, it is a part of the wombe, and not an animall by it selfe. For like as fruits be parts of the trees, which when they be ripe do fall; even so it is with an Infant in the mothers wombe. Empedocles denieth it to be a creature animall, howbeit that it hath life and breath within the belly : marry the first time that it hath respiration is at the birth; namely, when the superfluous humidity which is in such unborne fruits is retired and gone, so that the aire from without entreth into the void veffels lying open.

Diogenes faith, that fuch Infants are bred within the matrice inanimate, howbeit in heat, whereupon it commeth that naturall heat, so soon as ever the Infant is turned out of the mothers wombe is drawn into the lungs.

Herophilus leaveth to unborne babes a moving naturall; but not a respiration; of which motion the finews be the inftrumentall cause; but afterwards they become perfect living animall creatures, when being come forth of the wombe they take in breath from the aire,

> CHAP. XVI. How unborne babes are fed in the Wombe.

Democritus and Epicutus hold, that this unperfect fruit of the wombe receiveth nouriflament at the mouth; and thereupon it commeth, that to foon as ever it is borne it feeketh and nuzzeleth with the mouth for the breast head, or nipple of the pap : for that within the marrix there becertaine teats, yea, and mouths too, whereby they are nourished.

The Stoick; fay, that it is fed by the secundine and the navell; whereupon it is that Midwives prefently knit up and ty the navell string fast, but open the Infants mouth; to the end that it be acquainted with another kind of nourishment.

Aleman affirmeth, that the Infant within the mothers womb feedeth by the whole body through Out for that it sucketh to it and draweth in manner of a spunge, of all the food, that which is good

CHAP. XVII.
What part of the Child is first made perfect within the mothers belly.

The Stoicks are of opinion, that the most parts are stamed all at once; but Aristote saith, the back bone and the loines are first framed like as the keele in a ship. Alemaon affirmeth, that the head is first made, as being the seat of reason. Physicians will have the heart to be the first, wherein the veines and arteries are.

ciwe I character in the CHAP. XVIII.

EMpedacles thinketh, that when mankind was first bred of the earth, one day then, by reason of the flow motion of the Sun was full as long, as (in this age of ours) ten months; and that in procede of time, and by succession it came to be of the length of seven months: And therefore (quoth he) infigures borne either at ten or leven months end do ordinatily live: the nature of the world beinglo accordomed in one day to bring that fruit to maturity after that night, wherein it was committed into the wombe thereof.

Timess faith, that they be not ten months, but are counted nine, after that the monthly purgations stay upon the first conception: and so it is thought that infants be of seven months which are not; forthat he knew how after conception many women have had their mentrual flux.

Polybus, Diocles, and the Empiricks know, that the eight months child also is vitall; howbeit in Iome fore feeble, for that many for feeblenesse have died so borne : ingenerall, and for the most part ordinarily none are willing to reare and feed the children borne at the leventh month; and yet many have been so borne and grown to mans estate. Aristotle and Hippocrates report, that if in seven months the matrix be grown full, then the Infantfeeketh to get forth; and such commonly live and do well enough; but if it incline to birth, and be not infliciently nourished, for that the navel is weake, then in regard of hard travell, both the mother is in danger, and her fruit becommeth to mislike and thriveth not: but in case it continue nine months within the matrix then it commeth forth accomplished and perfect.

Polybus affirmethic to be requifite and necessary for the vitality of infants, that there should be 127, daies and a halfe, which is the time of fix months compleat; in which space the sun commeth from one Solltice or Tropick to another: but such children are sald to be of seven months, when it falleth out that odde daies left in this month are taken to the seventh month. But he is of opinion, that those of eight months live not; namely, when as the infant hasteneth indeed out of the womb. and beareth downward, but for the most part the navell is thereby put to stresseand retched and so cannot feed, as that should, which is the cause of food to the infant,

The Mathematicians beare us in hand and say, that eight months be dislociable of all generations. but seven are sociable. Now the dissociable signes are such as meet with such stars and constellations which be Lords of the house: for if upon any of them falleth the lot of mans life and course of living, it fignifieth that such shall be unfortunate and short lived. These dissociable signes be recked ned eight in number : namely, Aries with Scorpio is unfociable; Tauru with Scorpio is unfociable; Gemin with Capricorne ; Cancer with Aquarius ; Leo with Pifces; and Virgo with Aries: And for this cause infants of seven months and ten months belivelike, but those of eight months for the infociable diffidence of the world, perish and come to naught.

> CHAP, XIX, Of the generation of animall creatures; after what manner they be engendred; and whether they be corruptible.

Hey who hold that the world was created; are of opinion, that living creatures alse had their I creation or beginning and shall likewise perish and come to an end.

The Epicureans, according unto whom Animals had no creation, do suppose that by mutation of one into another, they were first made; for they are the substantial parts of the world: like as Anaxagor as and Europider affirme in these termes: Nothing dieth, but in changing as they do one for another, they show fundry formes.

Anaximander is of opinion, that the first Animals were bred in moisture, and enclosed within pricky and sharpe pointed barks; but as age grew on they became moredry, and in the end, which the said barke burst and clave in sunder round about them, a small while after they survived.

Empedacles thinketh, that the first generations, as well of living creatures as of plants, were not wholly compleat and perfect in all parts, but disjoyned, by reason that their parts did not cohere and unite together: that the fecond generations when the parts begun to combine and close together feemed like to images: that the third generations were of parts growing and arising mutually one out of another; and the fourth were no more of jemblable, as of earth and water, but one of another; and in some the nourishment was incrassate and made thick, as for others the beauty of women provoked and pricked in them a luft of spermatike motion. Moreover, that the kinds of all living creatures were diffinet and divided by certaine temperatures; for such as were more familiarly enclined to water, went into water; others into the the aire for to draw and deliver their breath to and fro, according as they held more of the nature of fire; fuch as were of a more heavy temperature were be-Rowed upon the earth; but those who were of an equall temperature uttered voice with the whole

How many forts of living creatures there be whether they be all fensitive and endued with reason.

THere is a Treatife of Ariffotle extant, wherein he putteth down four kinds of Animals, to wit, I Terrestriall, Aquaticall, Volatile, and Colestiall: for you must thinke, that he calleth Heavens, Stars, and the World, Animals; even as well as those that participate of earth; yea, and God he defineth to be a reasonable Animal! and immortall, Democritus and Epicurus do say, that heavenly Animals are reasonable.

Anaxagoras holdeth, that all Animals are endued with active reason; but want the passive underflanding which is called the interpreter or truchment of the mind.

Pythagoras and Plato do affirme, that the foules even of those very Animals which are called unreafonable and brute beafts are endued with reason; howbeit they are not operative with that reason; neither can they actuate it, by reason of the distempered composition of their bodies, and because they have not speech to declare and expound themselves: as for example, apes and dogs which ut-they have not specified each and expected and diffined specific the specified and diffined specified the specified and diffined specified specified the specified specified and diffined specified s but fare like unto those who be furious; for the principall part of the soule, to wit, Reason is defectuous and empeached.

CHAP. XXI.

Within what time are living creatures formed in the mothers wombe.

E Mpedacles faith, that men begin to take forme after the thirty fixth day; and are finished and kinic in their parts within fifty daies wanting one.

Asclepiades faith, that the members of males, because they be more hot, are joynted, and receive shape in the space of 26 daies, and many of them sooner; but are finished and compleat in all limbs within fifty daies: but the females require two months ere they be fashioned, and source before they come to their perfection; for that they want naturall hear. As for the parts of unreasonable creatures, they come to their accomplishment sooner or later, according to the temperature of the elements,

CHAP, XXII,

Of how many elements is composed each of the generall parts which are in us.

E Mpedocles thinketh, that fielh is engendred of an equall mixture and temperature of the foure ele-Liments; the finews of earth and fire, mingled together in a duple proportion; the nailes and clees in living creatures come of the nerves refrigerate and made cold in those places where the aire toucheth them; the bones, of water and earth within: and of thele foure medled and contempered together iweat and teares proceed.

> CHAP. XXIII. When and how doth man begin to come to his perfection.

HEraclitus and the Stoicks suppose, that men do enter into their perfection about the second septimane of their age, at what time as their natural seed doth move and run: for even the very trees begin then to grow unto their perfection; namely, when as they begin to engender sheir feed; for before then unperfect they are, namely, so long as they be unripe and fruitlesse: and therefore a man likewise about that time is perfect : and at this septenary of years be beginneth to conceive and understand what is good and evill, yea, and to learn the same.

*Some thinke that a man is confummate at the end of the third septimane of yeares, what time *This I as he maketh use of his full strength, CHAP. XXIIII. In what manner Sleep is occasioned, or death.

A Lemann is of this mind, that fleep is caused by the returne of bloud into the consuent veines; and Waking is the diffusion and spreading of the faid bloud abroad: but Death the utter deparation.

Empedacles holdeth that Sleep is occasioned by a moderate cooling of the naturall heat of bloud within us: and Death by an extreame coldnesse of the said bloud, Diogenes is of opinion, that if bloud being diffused and spread throughout, fill the veines, and withall drive back the aire fetled thereabout into the breast, and the inseriour belly under it, then ensueth Sleep, and the brest with the precordiall parts are hotter thereby: but if that aireous substance in the veines expire altogether, and exhale forth, presently followeth death.

Plate and the Stoicks affirme, that the Cause of sleep is the remission of the spirit sensitive, nor by way of relaxation and discent downward, as it were to the earth; but rather by elevation aloit, namely, when it is carried to the interffice or place between the brows, the very feat of reason: but when there is an entire resolution of the spirit tensitive, then of necessity Death dothensue.

CHAP, XXV. Whether of the twaine it is, that fleepeth or dieth, the Soule or the Body?

A Referle verily supposeth that Sleep is common to Body and Soule both: and the cause thereof his a certaine humidity, which doth steame and artie in manner of a vapour out of the stomack and the food therein, up into the region of the head, and the naturall heat about the heart cooled thereby. But death he deemeth to be an entire and totall refrigeration; and the same of the Body only, and in no wife of the Soule, for it is immortall.

Anaxagoras faith, that Sleep belongeth to corporall action; as being a passion of the Body and not of the Soule : also that there is likewise a certaine death of the Body, to wit, the separation of it

Leucippus is of opinion, that Sleep pertaineth to the Body only, by concretion of that which was of hibile parts; but the excessive excretion of the animall heat is Death: which both (faith he) be passions of the Body and not of the Soule.

Empedocles faith that Death is a separation of those elements whereof mans Body is compounded: according to which position, Death is common to Soule and Body: and Sleep a certaine dissi-CHAP. pation of that which is of the nature of fire,

CHAP

CHAP. XXVI. How Plants come to grow, and whether they be animate.

PLato and Empedocles hold, that Plants have life, yea, and be animall creatures which appeareth (fay they) by this, that they wag to and fro, and fireth forth their boughs like armes; also, that when they be violently strained and bent, they yeeld; but if they be let loose they returne againe, yea, in their growth are able to overcome weight laid upon them.

Arifole granteth that they be living creatures, but not animall; for that animall creatures have motions and appetites, are sensitive and endued with reason.

The Stoicks and the Epicureans hold, that they have no foule or life at all: for of animall creatures fome have the appetitive and concupifible foule, others the reasonable: but Plantsgrow after a fort casually of their own accord, and not by the meanes of any soule.

Empedacles saith, that Trees sprang and grew out of the ground before animall creatures; to wit, ere the Sun desplayed his beames, and before that day and night were distinct. Also that according to the proportion of temperature, one came to be named, Male, another, Female; that they shoot up and grow by the power of heat within the eath; in such fort, as they be parts of the earth, like as unborne fruits in the womb be parts of the matrix. As for the smits of trees, they are the superfluons excrements of water and fire: but such as have defect of that humidity, when it is dried up by the heat of the Summer, lofe their leaves: whereas they that have plenty thereof keep their leaves on fill! as for example, the Laurell, Olive, and Date tree. Now as touching the difference of their luyces and fapours, it proceedent from the diversity of that which nourifiched them, as appeared in Vines: for the difference of Vine trees maketh not the goodnesse of Vines for to be drunke, but the nutriment that the territory and foile doth afford.

CHAP. XXVII. Of Nourishment and Growth.

Mp:docles is of opinion, that animall creatures are nourified by the substance of that which is proper and familiar unto them; that they grow by the presence of natural lheat; that they diminish, sade and perish through the default both of the one and the other. And as for men now adaics living, in comparison of their ancestors, they be but babes new borne.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How Animall creatures came to have appetite and pleasure.

Mpedacles supposeth, that Lust and Appetites are incident to animals creatures, through the defect of those elements which went unto the framing of each one: that pleasures arise from humi; dity: as for the motions of perils and such like, as also troubles and hinderances, &c. * * *

CHAP. XXIX.

After what fort a Feaver is engendred, and whether it is an accessive to another malady,

E Rafifiratus defineth a Feaver thus: A Feaver (quoth he) is the motion of bloud, which is entred into the veines or veffels proper unto the spirits, to wit, the arteries a and that against the will of the patient; for like as the sea when nothing troubleth it lieth still and quiet; but if a boisterous and violent wind be up and bloweth upon it contrary unto nature it surgeth and riseth up into billows even from the very bottome; so in the body of man, when the bloud is moved, it invadeth the vitall and spirituall vessels, and being set on fire, it enchaseth the whole body. And according to the same physicians opinion, a Feaver is an accessary or consequent comming upon another disease.

But Diocles affirmeth, that Symptomes apparent without forth, do shew that which lieth hidden within: Now we see that an Ague solloweth upon those accidents that outwardly appeare; as for example, wounds, inflammations, impostumes, biles and botches in the share and other emunctories.

CHAP. XXX. Of Health, Sicknesse, and old age.

Lemaon is of opinion that the equal dispensing and distribution of the faculties in the body, to A Lemann is of opinion that the equal diplening and distribution of the faculties in the bodys in wit, of mositure, heart, drincs(e, cold, bitter, sweet, and the rest, is that which holdest and maintaineth Health; contratiwise, the Monarchy, that is to say, the predominant loveraignty of any of them cauleth ficknesse: for the predomination and principality of any one bringeth the corruption of all the other, and is the very cause of maladies: the efficient in regard of excessive heat or cold; and the materiall in respect of superabundance, or defect of humours; like as in some there is want of bloud or braine; whereas health is a proportionable temperature of all these qualities.

Diocles supposeth, that most diseases grow by the inequality of the elements, and of the habit and

Erafistratus

Erafiftratus faith, that ficknesse proceedeth from the excesse of feeding, from crudities, indigestions, and corruptions of meat: whereas good order and suffisance is Health.

The Stoicks accord hereunto and hold, that old age cometh for want of natural heat; for they who are most furnished therewith, live longest, and be old a great time.

Accepiades reporteth, that the Athiopians age quickly, namely, when they be thirty years old; Allelpinder reporters, that the extinopian age quitty, namely, when they be entirely ears old; by reason that their bodies be over-hear, and even burnt again with the sun; whereas in England and all Britains, folk in their age continue 1 or years 3 for that those parts be cold; and in that people the natural heat by that means 18 united and kept in their bodie; for the bodies of the excibiopians are more open and rare; in that they be reliaved and resolved by the suns hear; Contrastivité their bodies who sive toward the North Pole; bemore compact; knit and falt, and therefore; such are long-lived.

It is was fitter and more agreeable for marking. for the even number implyeth a kind of discord and division, in respect of the equal parts in it, meet for fiding, quarrel, and contention: whereas the odd number cannot be divided so just and equally but there will remain somewhat still in common for to be rarted. Now among all odd numbers, it feemeth that Cinque is most nuptial; and best beseeming marriages for that Trey is the first odd numbers. ber, and Deuz the first even; of which twain, five is compounded as of the Male and the Female.

III.

What is the cause that there being many Temples of Diana in Rome, into that only which standard in the Partician street, men enter not.

r. Note not because of a Tale which is told in this manner; In old time a certain woman being come whither for to adore and worship this goddesse, chanced there to be abused, and suffer violence in the honour: and he who forced her, was torn in pieces by Hounds: Upon which accident, ever after, a certain superstitutious sear possesses, that they would not presume to go into the said Temple.

ΙV

Wherefore is it, that in other Temples of Diana men are wont or dinavily to fet up and festen Harts bern; onely in that which is upon moune Aventine; the horns of Oxen and other Beess are to be seen.

May it not be, that this is respective to the remembrance of an ancient occurrent that sometime befel? For reported it is that long since in the Sabines country, one Antion Corasion had a Cow, which grew to be exceeding sait and, wonderfulling withal above any other; and a tertain Wizzad or Soothlayer came unto him and said. How predeftined it was that the City which sacrificed that Cow unto Diank in the mount Avientine, should become most spuisant and rule all test; This Corasion boulhold set wanted to adeliberate purpose to actifice the said Cow accordingly: but a certain boushold set wanted to a deliberate purpose to actifice the said Cow accordingly: but a certain boushold set wanted to a history in the present of the Priest of Diana, Conclusive with the matter: and therefore when Antion Continue presented himselfs for to a person himself it is the reverse of those that sacrificed was for ode: now whiles Antion was gone to wash himselfs into the river; Sorvins steps into his place, prevented his return, facrificed the Cow unto the goddeste, and sailed up the horns when he had to done, within her Temple, Juba thus relates this history, and Varro likewise, saving that Varro expressely setted not down the name of Antion, neither doth he write that it was Cornelius the Priest, but the Sexton onely of the Church that thus begulled the Sabine.

Why are they who have been falfy, reported dead in a firange Country, although they, return home give, met received nor fuffered to enter directly at the doors, but forced to climb up to the tiles of the home, and for yet down from the roof interthe houle?

Mare rendereth a a reason hereof, which I take to be altogether fabulous: for he writeth, that during the Sicilian war, there was a great bard fought upon the lea, and immediately uponit, there ran a rumoni of many that they were dead in this fight; who notwithflanding, they returned home fate, died all within a little while after 1, howbeit, one there was among the zet, who when he would have entred into his own houle, found the door of the own accord faft thut up against him 1, and for all, the fortible means that was made to open the lame, yet it would not prevalled, whereupon this man taking up his lodging without just before his door, as helper inthe najit, had a vision which advertised and taught him how he should from the roofe of the houle let himself down by a rope, and so get in now when he had so done, he became fortunate ever after, all the rest of his life: and he lived to be a very aged man; and hereof arose the forestald custome, which always afterwards was kept and observed.

But haply this failhion may feem in some fort to have been derived from the Greeks: for in Greeks they thought not those pure and clean who had been carried forth for dead to be enterted, or whole specified in the fact of the pure and clean who had been carried forth for dead to be enterted, or whole specified in the fact of frequent the company of others, not difficult to come neer unto their satisfiees. And there goeth a report of a cream man named Aristings, one of those who had been possessed with this superflittion, how he sent unto the Oracle of Applies Delphos, for to make supplication and prayer unto the god, for to be delivered out of this penjlexed anxiety that croubled jum by occasion of the said custome or law then in forces and that the Prophetelle Problem unto the said custome or law then in as an infant new born unto women for to be new washed, to be wrapped inswalling cloaths, and to be sucked with the breath-head: after which, all such others, whom we call Historopotmous, that is to say, those whose graves were made, as if they had been dead, did the semblable. Howbeit, some doing, that before Arishmus was born, these creemonies were observed about those Historopotmis and that this was a right ancient custome kept in the semblable case: and therefore no marvel it is, that the Romans also thought, that such as were supposed to have been once buried, and ranged with the dead in another world, ought not to enter in at the same porth, out of which they goe, when they purpose to sacrifice unto the gods, or at which they re-enter when they return from facilities but would have them from above to descend through the tiles of the roof into the close honse, with the aire open over their heads: for all their purifications ordinarily they performed without the house abroad in the air.

VI. Why downmen kisse the lips of their kinsfolks?

Is it as most men think, for that women being forbidden to drink wine, the manner was brought up: That whensever they met their kinsfolk, they should kis their lips, to the end they might not be unknown, but convicted if they had drunk Wine? or rather for another reason, which Asynghale the Philosopher hath alledged? for as touching that occasion, which is so famous and commonly voiced in every mans mouth, yea, and reported of divers and sundry places; it was no doubt the hardy attempt executed by the dames of Troy, and that upon the coasts of Italy; for when the menupon their arrival were landed: the women in the mean while set fite upon their ships, forvery defire that they had to see an end at once, one way or other of their long voyage, and to be delivered from their tedious travel at sea: but fearing the sury of their men, when they should return, they went forth to meet their kinssolk and friends upon the way, and welcomed them with anamiable embracing and sweet kifes of their lips; by which means having appealed their angry mood; and recovered their favours, they continued ever after, the customs of kind greeting and loving salaty attains in this manner.

Or was not this a priviledge granted unto women for their greater honour and credit; namely, to be known and feen for to have many of their race and kindred, and those of good worth and re-

Of because it was not lawful to espouse women of their blood and kindred, therefore permitted they were to entertain them kindly and familiarly with a kisse, so they proceeded no farther; infomuch as this was the only mark and token left of their consanguinity. For before time, they might not marry women of their own bloods no more then in these days their Aunts by the Mothers side, or their Sisters: and long it was eremen were permitted to contract marriage with their Course germans; and that upon luch an occasion as this. There was a certain man of poor estate and singli living, howbeit otherwise of good and honest carriage, and of all others that mannaged dhe public affairs of Statemost popular and gracious with the Commons: who was supposed to keep as his espoused wife a kinswoman of his and cousen german, an inheritresse; by whom he had great wealth, and became very rich ifor which he was accused judicially before the people: but upon a special savor that they bare unto him, they would not enquire into the cause in question but not only suppressed his bill of enditement, and let her go as quit of all crime, but also even they, enacked a statute: by vertue wherof, lawful it was for all men from that time forward to marry, as far as to their Cozen-germans, but in any higher or neerer degree of consanguinty, they were expressly forbidden.

May it not be, for that, as Solon ordained that the Donations and Bequests, made by those that die shall stand good, unless they be such as a man hath-granted upon necessity, or by the inducement and flattery of his wise: in which provide, he excepted necessity, as forcing and constraining the will and likewise pleasure, as deceiving the judgement: even so have men suspected the mutualgists passing between the busband and the wise, and thought them to be of the same nature.

Or was it not thought, that giving of prefens was of all other the leaft and worft fign of amity and good will (for even strangers and sinch as bear no love at all use in that for to be giving) and in that regard they would banish out of maritage such kind of pleasing and currying savour: to the end that the mutual love and affection between the parties should be free and without respect of salary and gain, even for it selfs and nothing elle in the world.

Of because women commonly admit and entertain strangers, as corrupted by receiving of presents and gifts at their hands, it was thought to stand more with honour and reputation, that wives should love their own husbands, though they gave them nothing by way of gift.

Ortather, for that it was meet and requisite, that the goods of the husband should be common to the wife, and to the wife likewise of the husband: for the party who receiveth a thing in gift, doth learnto reputethar which was not given, to be none of his own, but belonging unto another: to that man and wife in giving never so little one to another, despoil and defraud themselves of all that is beside.

What should be the Reason that the Romans when they returned from some voyage out of a far and forrain countrey, or only from their farm into the City; if their wiveswere at home, used to send a messenger unto them before, for to give warning and advertisement of their comming?

Elther it was because this is a token of one that beleeveth and is verily perswaded that his Wife intendeth no lewduesse, nor is otherwise bused then well; whereas to come upon her at unawares and on a sodain, is a kind of forlaying and surprize. Or for that they make haste to fend them good news of their comming, as being affured that they have a longing defire, and do expect flich

Or rather because themselves would be glad to hear from them some good news, to wit, whether they shall find them in good health when they come, and attending affectionately and with great

Or else because women ordinarily, when their husbands be away and from home, have many pety businesses and house affairs: and other whiles there fall out some little jars and quarrels with in doors with their fervants, men or maidens: to the end therefore all fuch troubles and inconveniences might be overblown, and that they might give unto their husbands a loving and aimable welcome home, they have intelligence given unto them before hand of their arrival and approach,

What is the cause that when they adore and worsh p the gods, they cover their heads but contrariwise when they meet with any honourable or worshipfall persons, if their heads haply were then covered with their robe; they discouir the same, and are bare-headed.

POr it feemeth that this fashion maketh the former doubt and branch of the question more diffi-cult to be associated and if that which is reported of Aneas be true i namely, that as Diomedes palfed along by him whiles he facrificed, he covered his head, and soperformed his facrifice: there is good reason and consequence, that if men be covered before their enemies, they should be bare when they encounter either their friends, or men of worth and honour: for this manner of being covered before the gods is not properly respective unto them, but occasioned by accident, and hath, since that example of Aneas, been observed and continued.

But if we must say somewhat elie beside, consider whether it be not sufficient to enquire only of this point: namely, why they cover their heads when they worthin the gods, feeing the other confequently dependent hereupon: for they stand bare before men of dignity and authority, not to do themany more honor therby, but contrariwise to diminish their envy, for sear they might be thought to require as much reverence and the same honor as is exhibited to the gods, or suffer themselves, and take pleafure to be observed and reverenced equally with them; as for the gods, they adored them after this fort; either by way of lowlinesse and humbling themselves before their majesty, in covering and hiding their heads; or rather because they feared lest as they made their prayers, there should come unto their hearing, from without, any finister voice or inauspicate and ominous offe: and to prevent such an object they drew their hood over their ears: And how true it is, that they had a careful eye and regard to meet with allfuch accidents, it may appear by this, that when they went to any Oracle tor to be refolved by answer from theme upon a forupulous doubt, they caused a great noise to be made all about them, with ringing of pans or brasen basons.
